INDEX ISSUED IN A SEPARATE VOLUME

DEBATES OF THE SENATE

The Speaker

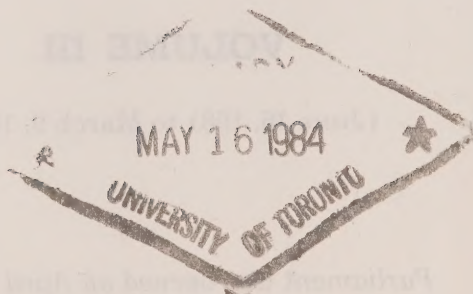

THE HONOURABLE JEAN MARCHAND, P.C.

The Leader of the Government

THE HONOURABLE HORACE ANDREW OLSON, P.C.

The Leader of the Opposition

THE HONOURABLE JACQUES FLYNN, P.C.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, June 16, 1981

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

DISTINGUISHED VISITOR IN GALLERY

HONOURABLE JOSEPH R. SMALLWOOD, P.C.

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: Honourable senators, I would like to draw your attention to the fact that we have in the gallery tonight one of Canada's most distinguished citizens in the person of the Honourable J. R. Smallwood, the only living Father of Confederation.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

PRIVILEGE

STATEMENT BY SENATOR BONNELL

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of personal privilege, to call your attention to remarks that I have read in Debates of the Senate of Wednesday, June 10, 1981, at page 2501, by the Honourable Jean-Paul Deschatelets as follows:

I have therefore been authorized by Honourable Senators Cameron, Inman, Molson, Beaubien, Cook, Lang, Deschatelets, Thompson, Bell, Manning, Lafond, Lawson, and Bonnell, who subscribe to this declaration of independence, to request you, Mr. Speaker, to permit them to be seated together in the Senate Chamber.

Honourable senators, I should like to state emphatically that at no time did I discuss with the Honourable Senator Deschatelets the declaration of independence or ask that I be permitted to change my seating arrangement, and at no time did I discuss with the Honourable Senator Deschatelets the constitutional resolution which is now before the courts, either its pros or its cons.

I should further like to state that at the time the amendments were before the Senate I did not vote either pro or con, because I was out of the country at the time the vote on the amendments was taken.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): That's a good reason.

Senator Bonnell: However, if I could have been present, I would have voted in support of the constitutional resolution and its amendments.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Strike one out.

Senator Bonnell: Let me further state that if the Supreme Court of Canada should find the constitutional resolution and its amendments within the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada, I intend to support same.

Senator Flynn: The honourable senator's point of privilege should be on what Senator Deschatelets said. However, if he wants to start a debate, I have no objection.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): He spoke about the Constitution.

Senator Flynn: Very good. Your Honour, if the honourable senator wants to raise a question of privilege because he was misquoted or misunderstood regarding sitting with the new group, that is his own business; but if he wants to discuss the constitutional package at this time, he will have to allow everyone to get into the debate.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Senator Bonnell deserves the full parliamentary courtesies which should be extended to any member under circumstances of this kind. I am shocked to think that the Leader of the Opposition would rise in his place to dispute the matter.

Senator Flynn: I am never shocked when I am criticized by someone like the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, on page 2501, in the fourth paragraph, Senator Deschatelets states:

We believe that over the years we have lost sight of the original role that the Fathers of Confederation expected the Upper House to play—

I should like to state that I do not believe that I have lost sight of the original role that the Fathers of Confederation expected the Senate to play.

● (2005)

Senator Flynn: That is what the Prime Minister said!

Senator Bonnell: I have also found in my ten years in this chamber that I have been able to speak and vote with freedom of action. I have never been told, at any time, by the leader or the whip how I should vote on any issue.

I should further like to state that I have full confidence in the leadership of the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau and of the Leader of the Government in the Senate, as well as of the honourable senators who are cabinet ministers.

An Hon. Senator: And our whip.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Bonnell: And I include the deputy leader and our whip. Therefore, honourable senators, I would ask—

Senator Flynn: To stay where you are.

Senator Bonnell:—that my name be removed from the record of the statement made by Senator Jean-Paul Deschatelets on June 10, 1981, which is to be found at page 2501 of Debates of the Senate, line 6, with respect to the senators who authorized Senator Deschatelets to say they subscribed to a declaration of independence.

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. What I have to say covers two points.

First, may I say that the statement made by the Honourable Senator Bonnell speaks for itself, and, of course, I accept it.

Secondly, last Wednesday I asked, on behalf of a number of senators, that we be seated together in the chamber, and I am told that though the matter has been discussed by both whips a decision has been delayed. Would the government leader, or his deputy, inform us of the reason for this delay?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, apart from the fact that I have received no formal, personal request from any senator to relocate in this chamber, the matter is clearly within the jurisdiction of the Honourable Senator Petten, who is the government whip.

Senator Flynn: No, no.

Senator Frith: And within the jurisdiction of the Honourable Senator Macdonald, the opposition whip.

Senator Perrault: Senator Petten may wish to discuss the matter.

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, Senator Macdonald and I did discuss briefly the matter of relocating senators in this chamber. However, in light of what Senator Bonnell has just had to say, I do not think he has left us in any doubt that his name was included in error.

Senator Flynn: We thought at the time that it was in error.

Senator Perrault: Let Senator Petten make his statement.

Senator Asselin: You're so nervous, Ray.

Senator Petten: I think, in light of what we have just heard, each individual senator who would like his seat moved should speak to me directly, and I, together with Senator Macdonald, will try to accommodate such honourable senators.

Senator Deschatelets: Honourable senators, I should like to know if the Honourable Senator Petten could see that the seating arrangements are completed for Thursday next at 2 o'clock. Although Senator Bonnell has explained that his name should not be included in the list, I should imagine that the Honourable Senator Petten could make room for about 16 honourable senators.

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, I will do my best to accommodate honourable senators, but I cannot give an undertaking now that it will be accomplished by next Thursday, or even the following Thursday. Senators who wish to be seated in a different place in this chamber must also realize that we have to get other senators to move in order to accommodate them. It will therefore take more than two or three days to do this.

Senator Flynn: On this question of privilege, it seems to me that the government whip is attributing to himself much more authority than he in fact has. Of course, I am willing to give him a lot of authority, but the decision in this matter is up to His Honour the Speaker. Of course, His Honour will require co-operation from the whips and from the leaders on both sides of the house. That is what was offered last week. However, when Senator Petten says that nobody spoke to him, and they must come to him and beg—

● (2010)

Senator Petten: I did not say that.

Senator Flynn:—I suggest that that is somewhat exaggerated. Senator Deschatelets made a request of the Speaker. I suggest that the whips should have gone to see the Speaker to offer their co-operation if he needed it, because the Speaker can decide these matters. It has been the tradition of the British Parliament that whenever a member wants to sit in a different seat, the matter is resolved by the Speaker.

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, I was not suggesting that anybody should come to me on bended knee and ask for a seat. I have been doing this job on behalf of the government for some six and a half years now.

Senator Perrault: And you have been doing it very well.

Senator Petten: It was my understanding, rightly or wrongly, that the government whip has the responsibility—and it is a responsibility that I have shared jointly with my friend, Senator John Macdonald, for the past six and a half years—for the seating of senators in the chamber. If I am in error I stand subject to correction.

Senator Flynn: Well, this is a correction.

Senator Petten: That may well be. I repeat what I said earlier; I have always tried to accommodate honourable senators to the best of my ability in any of their requests. I cannot say to my honourable colleague, Senator Deschatelets, that his request will be complied with by next Thursday. Again, I have to refer to what our colleague, Senator Bonnell, has said. His name was used in error, and perhaps there are others—I do not know, and I am not suggesting there are. If honourable senators would make individual requests, I am sure things would be made a lot easier.

Senator Flynn: A request directed to His Honour the Speaker or to you?

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, although I am not ready to say that I have authority or do not have authority, I will say that I have never been consulted about the seating arrangement of the Senate. I was informed of it at the first sitting. I saw where you were seated. That is the only role I played. I do not know if my predecessor had a different experience. However, I would like the Honourable Leader of the Opposition to find a precedent that indicates that I have this authority. If I do, I shall make a decision; if I do not, I shall make no decision.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I would add an additional comment. I have been contacted by Senator Edward Lawson, the independent from British Columbia, who has expressly stated that he does not want to change his seat in the Senate and that he fully intends to support the constitutional proposals of the government. He will make a statement when he is next in the chamber.

Senator Flynn: When will that be?

Hon. Jack Marshall: There will be a change in government by that time.

Senator Perrault: I have conveyed this information because, apparently, there are some senators who do not want to change their seating arrangements. Indeed, Senator Inman, as well, has informed the government that she wishes to remain in her present location in the chamber. Whether the honourable and distinguished senator has changed her mind on that point, I do not know.

Because of these events, I rather question the role that Senator Deschatelets appears to have assumed—that he is the spokesman for every member in the group of senators named by him the other day. Certainly, the whips do not appear to have received the same requests as those which, apparently, have been communicated to Senator Deschatelets.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I wonder whether the Leader of the Government has any right to make that statement. All of those names were given to Senator Deschatelets. Senator Bonnell, who was away, says now that he did not subscribe to the declaration, and we take his word for it. However, the Leader of the Government has absolutely no right to say that Senator Deschatelets is speaking off the top of this head. Senator Deschatelets is a sincere, honourable senator who has a longer history in Parliament than that of Senator Perrault. He has been a Speaker of this house, a former minister, and a member of the leader's party for 27 years. I do not think that the leader has any right at all to ascribe to him any motive that is not the most honourable.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

• (2015)

Senator Perrault: The point, Senator Molson, is that some senators have indicated to the government whip that they do not want their physical locations in this chamber changed. That is the only point to which I am addressing myself.

Senator Molson: It is not. You are addressing yourself to Senator Deschatelets.

Senator Perrault: Senator Molson, I have the floor at the present time.

Senator Asselin: You are nervous. Why are you so nervous?

Senator Perrault: May I suggest, then, that in order to clarify the situation the honourable senators in that group may wish to make their seating preferences known to their respective whips personally?

Senator Molson: May I just say that you are dragging your feet? It has been very apparent, and it is all around Ottawa, "Just watch it. They are just going to drag and drag their feet so that this gets downplayed." But that is not my point here.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Who is ascribing motives now?

Senator Molson: My point is that you have no right, Senator Perrault, to ascribe motives that are less than honourable to Senator Deschatelets.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Donald Cameron: Honourable senators—

Senator Flynn: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Cameron.

Senator Cameron: Honourable senators, I have heard rumours to the effect that I am moving my seat. I want to say quite emphatically that I am quite happy where I am, and I am going to stay here.

Senator Perrault: That makes three.

Senator Flynn: I agree that this is the way to do it. If they do not want to move, they should rise right away. I suggest to Senator Inman that, if it is her wish to stay where she is, she should rise right away. It is a question of privilege.

With respect to Senator Lawson, if he is not able to be here, it will be too late to raise a question of privilege when he comes, if he ever comes.

Hon. Daniel Riley: That is a most unfair statement.

Senator Flynn: No, it is not.

Senator Riley: Yes, it is.

Senator Flynn: No, it is not. Can you deny that Senator Lawson is very seldom here?

Hon. F. Elsie Inman: Honourable senators, I said I would prefer to stay in my own seat until the fall. I have to change then to go down lower because I am finding it difficult to walk up this far and back. I mentioned to the Whip quite a long time ago that I was going to have to change in the fall because I was finding it difficult to walk down this far.

Senator Flynn: That is not clear. I don't think Senator Inman has made her point clear.

Senator Marshall: Mr. Speaker, I should like to raise a point of order, for clarification. When Senator Deschatelets made his statement this evening, I understood him to request a change in location for 16 members of the Senate. Could he clarify that, please?

Senator Deschatelets: Certainly there was no mistake there. I surely mentioned that I would like to have room made for 16 senators. There might be 12; there might be 14 in a week from now. I don't know. I am just asking that room be made for 16. That is all.

Hon. Charles McElman: Is the Honourable Senator Deschatelets speaking as head of a group?

Senator Deschatelets: I made it perfectly clear, Senator McElman, if you will refer to the statement I read on Wednesday last, that I was speaking on behalf of a number of honourable senators, and I have no authority whatsoever to go outside the statement I made then.

Senator McElman: On the question of privilege before the house, honourable senators, it seems from what has taken place thus far this evening that one cannot tell the players without a program.

Senator Marshall: That's right.

● (2020)

Senator McElman: Without suggesting anything untoward with respect to my honoured and honourable friend, Senator Jean-Paul Deschatelets, it seems to me that doubts have been created in many minds.

Senator Flynn: They haven't been created in your mind, so you have no problem.

Senator McElman: I know that there is doubt in my mind and that there is doubt in the minds of others. It seems only fair for those who are directly involved, as well as for other senators who are—

Senator Molson: You are not involved.

Senator McElman: Excuse me, Senator Molson. You have always given me the consideration that I have given you—that of not interrupting when you speak. In your capacity as the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, I think you should observe that courtesy.

It seems to me only fair to the Senate as a whole, especially those senators who have been named, that, instead of being represented by a spokesman, those who are here should rise individually in their places and state either that they wish a change in seating or that they do not wish a change in seating. It seems to me that this is the only fair way to dispose of this entire question. Senators are responsible people, and they should speak for themselves.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I would like to make one reference to complete the contributions on the question of the role of the whip on the question of seating. I remind honourable senators of the declaration made on June 10, 1981 by Senator Deschatelets, who is reported at page 2500 of Hansard as saying:

These senators are not changing party affiliation, nor are they forming or joining a new party—

Those words should be remembered when considering the role of both party whips. Apparently none of the senators is changing party affiliation.

Senator Asselin: What do you want to prove by that?

Senator Flynn: What is your interpretation?

Senator Frith: My interpretation is—

Senator Asselin: What are you trying to prove?

Senator Frith: Give me a chance.

[Senator McElman.]

Senator Flynn: It's about time.

Senator Frith: It's about time? I have not had a chance.

Senator Perrault: Oh come on; you are all in a bad mood.

Senator Frith: During the period I have been here—and I realize that is not as long as certain other honourable senators, have been here—this is the first time that the question of the seating of senators who do not wish to change party affiliation has been raised on the floor of the chamber rather than privately with the party whips.

Hon. John Morrow Godfrey: Honourable senators, I would like to know how those of us who have an eye on the seats that are being vacated can make an application. To be specific, I have my eye on Senator Cook's seat, because I want to sit next to Senator Neiman.

Hon. Eric Cook: If the request is granted, the honourable senator may have my seat.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR ACT

BILL TO AMEND—MESSAGE FROM COMMONS

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons returning Bill S-4, to amend the Department of Labour Act, and acquainting the Senate that they had passed the bill without amendment.

PROHIBITION OF INTERNATIONAL AIR SERVICES BILL

MESSAGE FROM COMMONS

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons returning Bill S-7, to provide for the prohibition of certain international air services, and acquainting the Senate that they had passed the bill without amendment.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

SEVENTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the seventh report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see appendix, p. 2553.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, I move that this report be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Deputy Leader of the Government concerning the business of the Senate this week and next week. Last Thursday, as I recall, the Deputy Leader mentioned that we were to receive Bill C-57. As we all know from the official record of the House, it has been decided to allow a certain time for the consideration of Bill C-57. If use had been made of the time that elapsed since then the bill would have already been passed in the other place and would certainly have been referred to us by now in view of the majority enjoyed by the government in the other place. It is even more loyal than its majority here!

The point I wanted to make is this: it now seems that the other place does not plan to proceed with Bill C-57 before next week. In view of the general schedule given to us by the Deputy Leader—and I am not suggesting that he should be bound by it—it seems to me that if the government intends to adjourn for the summer recess let us say at the end of this month, by sending this bill to us so late, this might create a problem for the Senate because of the vital importance of the bill.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the information that I received this week, including what I said last week, agrees in nearly every detail with the information of the Leader of the Opposition. It is not correct that this bill will not be considered at all in the other place this week; it is simply that it will not be disposed of.

I plan to ask the leadership of the other place tomorrow for more precise information as to when exactly we can expect Bill C-57, as well perhaps as other bills. According to my information—and that is not only what I have heard personally—and to the rumours which are going around, Bill C-57 will receive final consideration with third reading on division next Monday or Tuesday. If it should be Monday afternoon, nothing will be changed for us since we intend to sit Monday evening. If it should be Monday evening or even Tuesday afternoon, I quite agree that we have to discuss other arrangements.

Senator Flynn: When the deputy leader asks the Leader of the House of Commons for this information, would he tell him that it is not fair for the House of Commons to delay unduly passage of a bill and refer it to the Senate only a few days or a few hours before the time set for adjournment. Of course, there would be no difficulty in the Senate sitting after the House of Commons has adjourned, but we must remember that it would have to be called back for royal assent.

Senator Frith: Agreed.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

STRIKE BY FRANCOPHONE JOURNALISTS

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. Does he have a reply to my question concerning the strike by francophone journalists of the French network of the CBC, and to my suggestion that the problem be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications to inquire into what is really blocking the settlement? That strike has now gone on for four months, if not five.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not have a current report on the state of negotiations. Hopefully, that might be forthcoming tomorrow.

Senator Flynn: Hopefully. This is the third time I have asked this question.

ENERGY

OIL—CANADA-MEXICO AGREEMENT

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. In the last few weeks many major oil producing nations have lowered the price of their production, and spot market prices have tumbled. Is the minister able to tell us if Canada's agreement with Mexico provides for downward adjustment of the price to reflect falling international prices?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I will take that question as notice because I want to be very precise in the answer. I cannot give an answer off the top of my head with respect to the terms and conditions of either upward or downward movement.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

TEMPORARY RELOCATION OF SENATORS IN EAST BLOCK

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, last week I asked Senator Perrault a question about the fact that senators located in the East Block were asked to move out and be relocated in a new building. I mentioned that we were told that the members of the House of Commons who were in the East Block were supposed to be treated the same way, or is this a fact. We know now that only senators are going to be moved out. I would like to know from the Leader of the Government why senators have to suffer this injustice.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the honourable senator asked that question the other day and it is an important question. Senator Graham was contacted and he has some information on that matter. He is not in the chamber at the moment but I know he is in the building. Perhaps we can defer a reply until later this evening. I believe the essence of his reply will be that he has contacted authorities organizing the economic summit. It is his proposal that these authorities be called before a meeting of the Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration for cross-examination on certain points. As well, there may be additional information available at the present moment of which I am not aware. However, a message will be sent to Senator Graham's office to ascertain whether he may be able to provide further information this evening.

Senator Asselin: Are you aware that the members of the other place will not move out?

Senator Perrault: I am not familiar with all of the details. The chronology of events is not completely known to me. However, Senator Graham has given priority to the matter and, as I have said, he may be in a position to provide information for all honourable senators later this evening.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Could the Leader of the Government extract from Senator Graham or those other wise individuals why it is necessary to move senators out of their offices for seven weeks when the summit conference is held within those confines for only one day, and to go to the expense of providing desks for 10 or 12 senators and the added expense of other services when it is so unnecessary, and to relocate them in places which are an embarrassment to their position. These senators are being relocated in offices which are worse than those occupied by the security guards and messengers.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, those are very pertinent and relevant questions and an opportunity will be found to answer them.

Senator Asselin: Who is going to answer them?

THE ECONOMY

REGULATION—REPORT OF ECONOMIC COUNCIL OF CANADA

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Last week the Economic Council of Canada presented its study on regulations and their effect on the Canadian economy. Some of the conclusions drawn in that study were very far-reaching and serious. Would the honourable senator indicate which minister has specific responsibility for the numerous recommendations of that report, and when those recommendations will be implemented?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, like all such reports, it is of interest to the government. There is no obligation that all of the recommendations of any report prepared for the government by any advisory body should be implemented by that government. The honourable senator is aware of that fact, in view of his extensive experience in government. I am sure during his period as a minister he did not accept all of the recommendations contained in any royal commission report or in any other advisory report. However, may I suggest that the question be answered by Senator Olson who is doing a magnificent job as Minister of State for Economic Development?

Senator Roblin: He sure is.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, Senator Doody ought to remember that the reference was made to the Economic Council of Canada by a first minister's meeting. Therefore, I suppose it is in keeping with that that some indication with respect to some of the recommendations for deregulation be considered by both levels of government. Senator Doody asked a couple of other questions that are not applicable. He asked if any minister has been designated to implement those recommendations but, of course, there is no decision at this point in time to implement any of the recommendations. These are recommendations and some of the cost factors as to the studies, and subsequently, the Economic Council itself put forward something less than a majority report. However, the matter has not reached the stage of designating a minister or even which, if any, recommendation ought to be implemented.

Senator Doody: I certainly thank the minister for applying himself so assiduously to avoiding the answer to the question. It is the first time I have had two ministers simultaneously decline to answer, and that takes so much time. If my memory serves me correctly, the reference was instigated on the recommendation of the Prime Minister himself. Would it be fair to say that he would be the minister responsible for reporting on it?

Senator Olson: No, I did not say that I would be the minister reporting on the study. The other part of my honourable friend's memory is inaccurate too. The reference did, in fact, come directly from a first minister's meeting, and, obviously, the Prime Minister carried that reference to the Economic Council of Canada. I would also like to remind my honourable friend that even though he was unable to detect the answer, if he will carefully review it tomorrow, he will find that it was a very complete and accurate answer in the circumstances.

Senator Doody: If I cannot detect the answer tomorrow, will the honourable senator give me another clue for the game as it progresses?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I shall never cease to try.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

TEMPORARY RELOCATION OF SENATORS IN EAST BLOCK

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Graham is now in the chamber and has some information on the question that was raised earlier. May I say for the record that Senator Graham was here earlier this evening and left only very briefly on an important matter.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): He also does a magnificent job.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, with respect to the questions asked about the summit conference and the allocation of space in the East Block and elsewhere, immediately upon hearing of the concerns expressed in this chamber last week I contacted Mr. Derek Burney, the administrator for the 1981 summit conference. I will be meeting with him tomorrow, and he will be meeting with the full Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration Committee on Thursday morning at 11 o'clock to explain fully the situation, the program and the plans for the summit conference with respect to space that will be required.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the chairman of the committee. Is it not true that when we asked to meet with you and the members of your committee, you told us that if we were going to move, the members of the House of Commons on the first floor were going to move also?

Senator Graham: Honourable senators, my understanding at that particular time was that there would be some movement. At that time I could not give, nor would I undertake to give—nor would I be in a position to do so—a blanket assurance that all members of the other place who occupy space in the East Block would be required to move at exactly the same time and on exactly the same date as honourable senators who occupy space on the second floor. My understanding was that at some point in time, for security reasons, the building would, for the most part, be vacated by all people who occupied space in the building.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I believe it might be wise to await the outcome of the meeting on Thursday morning; but I would not want to let Senator Graham be under the false impression that we are all wrong and he is right in this sense. At that first meeting of the committee of which he is chairman the question was asked—and many honourable senators mentioned the fact—as to why senators were being moved and members of the other place were to remain on the main floor. One senator, in particular—in fact, it was a member of the opposition—requested that the information be obtained to assure the senators that not only senators would be moved but that all would be moved at that time.

I should like to tell Senator Graham, and other honourable senators, that my hearing is very good, and I recall very well—and I am not asking anyone to support me in this—that at a subsequent meeting we were told that not only senators would be moved but also members of the other place.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Guay: I am telling Senator Graham that now so that on Thursday morning he, and also the administrator, will be in a better position to tell us why there has been a change of mind on this particular matter.

Senator Graham: Honourable senators, on that particular point, it should be recognized that the main meetings with respect to the summit conference to be held in Ottawa will be held in chambers provided on the second floor, and that the leaders of the various countries participating will occupy space that is now occupied by senators on the second floor. Honourable senators have to vacate their offices in that building earlier than honourable members of the other place, for reasons of security and because of the elaborate communications system that has to be installed in that space.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question dealing with the matter of security. It was my understanding that the reason we were moved out so early was in order that security measures could be taken, and I can understand that; but it is difficult for me to reconcile how there can be security provided for those attending the summit conference when there will still be people not only on the first floor—such as members of Parliament and ministers of the government in the other place—but also on the third floor, where there are public servants, clerks, messengers and security people. How can we reconcile the fact that we are a security risk and the others are not?

Further, it is difficult to reconcile the fact that a summit conference that will take place for one day on the second floor is so vital to the world and to the economic situation that we senators, who do not cause anyone any harm, should be asked to move out because we are a security risk.

Senator Graham: Honourable senators, I believe that those and other questions should be properly addressed to the administrator of the summit conference at the meeting on Thursday morning. Since Senator Marshall is also a valuable member of that committee, I am sure he will be able to get the information he seeks at that time.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Chairman of the Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration Committee. I assume, without knowing it to be the case, that the Government of Canada has jurisdiction over all Canadian property, including these two chambers. I wonder if the honourable senator can inform us specifically who is exercising that authority in commanding senators to do this or that at the present time, because it seems to me to be a matter which concerns all honourable senators. I am not in that building and will not be affected by that arrangement in any way, so far as I now know, although if things continue the way they are, perhaps they will come over here and move out members of the opposition. In any event, who has that authority?

Senator Graham: Honourable senators know that a special secretariat has been set up under the chairmanship of a former distinguished ambassador in this country, Mr. Derek Burney. Several months ago, when we had the initial indication that they would require this particular space, a meeting was held of the Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration Committee, when the requirements, as we even knew them at that time, were explained to all members of the committee. We then voted to accept the proposition that was put forward with respect to allowing the people who required this space to take it over between the dates that had been given and those on which we would be returning to that space.

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, as one of those honourable senators who has been moved, I would like to know why the second floor is more of a security risk than either the first or third floors. It would seem that it was agreed that the second floor was a security risk; so we were moved out last Friday. Why should it not apply also to the first floor? I understand that for security purposes it is much easier to look after the first floor than the second floor. I have been moved, and I have accepted the situation, but I do not like it.

Senator Graham: Honourable senators, again I am sure that all of these questions will be answered on Thursday morning. Those honourable senators who are members of the committee will recall that the actual meetings of the leaders at the summit conference to be held in Ottawa are to be held on the second floor of the East Block, and the leaders themselves, for the purpose of carrying on their ordinary work, will be occupying space that is now occupied by honourable senators.

Senator Asselin: Who is going to get mine?

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a supplementary question. I am not sure that I understood correctly the answer given by the Chairman of the Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration Committee to my earlier supplementary question.

Perhaps I could state what I think he said, and ask him if it is correct. I think he said, in effect, that the administrator of the secretariat of this conference, to whom he referred as "the distinguished former ambassador", but whose name I do not recall, was responsible for finding the space to accommodate the people who will be attending this conference, and those accompanying them, that that administrator had made a request of the Internal Economy Committee of this Senate that certain space be made available so far as the Senate was concerned, and that the Internal Economy Committee agreed to certain things. I wonder if he would confirm whether my general understanding of that is correct, and, if so, will he tell us what the Internal Economy Committee did agree to, because I am not a member of that committee, and I would like to know?

Senator Graham: Honourable senators, I do not have instant recall, and I believe it would probably be more appropriate to table, at a future date—if necessary, tomorrow or Thursday—the minutes of the meeting at which that particular discussion took place. Perhaps we could also table the request for space as well as the conclusions reached during the deliberations of the Internal Economy Committee.

Senator Smith: I would certainly agree to that; but perhaps the honourable chairman would not mind telling me whether my recollection of what he said about who asked for this, and who is in charge, and so on, is correct.

Senator Graham: Yes. My understanding is very similar to yours.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

SACCHARIN—BAN ON USE

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I am sure honourable senators will be pleased to know that this refers to a much sweeter subject than some of those things we have been discussing this evening.

I refer to the ban in Canada on the use of saccharin. Honourable senators will recall that the Senate took a very real interest in this subject several years ago, referring the matter to our Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, and some of us felt that the Government of Canada at that time, through the Minister of National Health and Welfare, perhaps acted prematurely, and, indeed, perhaps over-reacted, to the situation.

The reason for my question at this time is that according to a recent news despatch—and I am quoting from a newspaper, if honourable senators will allow me to do it—our American friends have continued to extend what they call the moratorium on the ban against saccharin for another two years. In other words, they have not as yet seen fit to ban saccharin as an additive for the use of those individuals who find it a very important food substitute.

My question to the honourable the leader is: Is Canada considering a removal of the ban? Are there any other countries in the world that ban saccharin as Canada does? Is there any new information that might be useful with regard to the results of the ban in Canada, and is there any other scientific information that could be made available?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, because of the technical nature of the question it will be taken as notice. I know that all honourable senators are in accord with the Honourable Senator Buckwold that this is an important question, and it certainly will be given priority attention.

ENERGY

NUCLEAR ENERGY—INTERDEPARTMENTAL REPORT

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development.

In view of the fact that the interdepartmental report on the nuclear industry has been leaked to the press—in fact, portions of it are carried in this morning's Le Devoir—will the minister undertake to obtain a copy of that report and table it in the Senate?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): No, honourable senators, I will not undertake to obtain a copy of a leaked document—an allegedly leaked document—but I will refer the matter to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who plays the leading role with respect to that matter, and will get his comments respecting the authenticity of the alleged leak.

Senator Murray: May I ask the Minister of State for Economic Development whether, in fact, the interdepartmental committee on the nuclear industry has reported?

Senator Olson: I will obtain that information too.

Senator Murray: Well, the departments for which the minister has some responsibility in the economic policy field are represented on that interdepartmental committee. Surely the minister must know whether or not there is a report in existence.

Senator Olson: The minister gave an undertaking less than half a minute ago that he will obtain that information, too, because what is important here, of course, is whether that interdepartmental committee has in fact completed its report and presented it to the minister, or to a group of ministers. When I have ascertained that, I will let the honourable senator know.

INDUSTRY

INDUSTRIAL STRATEGY—MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. Is he the minister responsible for the development of an industrial strategy for Canada?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): No, he is not.

Senator Smith: Would the honourable the minister say who is the minister responsible for the development of that industrial strategy?

Senator Olson: The honourable senator will know that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has made a number of comments respecting that matter, and, furthermore, he will also know that when a complete policy—an acceptable, complete and approved policy—is reached by the government, on all its aspects, which are many and varied, then the announcement no doubt will be made by that minister—namely, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, I cannot refrain from observing that perhaps I know as much about what I know as the honourable the minister knows about what I know. I might suggest that he refrain from allegations as to what I know, unless he is willing to maintain for himself the same kind of accuracy he says we should follow, and he should be very careful with regard to making allegations about what anybody knows.

Having made that little dissertation, which is only about half as long as the honourable the minister would have made in similar circumstances, I would like to ask him if he can say what progress has been made in the formulation of this industrial strategy.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, in response to the first part of the honourable senator's remarks, I want to say that I did not wish to offer any discourtesy to my honourable friend at all. It is just that I find it useful from time to time to fill in the gaps on things that I am sure honourable senators know. I hope he does not take offence at the way I put it.

With regard to the question concerning the progress that has been made, I think this is relative. I could say that a great deal of progress has been made, but perhaps my honourable friend would not agree with me; so it is something of a subjective reply.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, is the honourable the minister able to say whether some basic tenets or principles with regard to this policy have been developed and accepted by the Government of Canada?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, a great deal of that was outlined by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, I think, more than a year ago.

Senator Smith: Well, I am not surprised that it takes over a year to make very much progress. That is no surprise at all, so I will not say that I am surprised. It is most interesting to note, however, that after a year the minister is not able to give me a more complete and satisfactory answer than he has been able to do.

POST OFFICE

POSSIBLE DISRUPTION OF SERVICE

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, I would like to raise a question with the Leader of the Government in the Senate on a matter that may be of serious public importance in the next few weeks. I am sure we have all seen the rather disturbing reports in the last few days to the effect that the inside postal workers are moving to a position where we may see the mail service of Canada tied up by the end of this month. I am sure we all hope that that will not happen, but my reason for raising this question now is the timetable that has been mentioned here with regard to the adjournment of Parliament. Past experience has indicated that those who engineer these disruptions make a habit of having them start just after Parliament has adjourned, so that Parliament is not in a position to deal with a situation that can become very serious for the public unless Parliament is recalled.

I would ask, honourable senators, first of all, whether the government is giving consideration to this possible disruption and what it will mean to the Canadian people. Secondly, does the government now have the legislative power necessary to deal with the situation, should it arise, without having to recall Parliament? In view of the summit conference coming up, I think the recalling of Parliament would be extremely difficult. Honourable senators will surely agree that, in light of the difficulties facing, in particular, small business people in this country today in terms of financial problems, high interest costs and all of those things, it would be absolutely disastrous—in my view, at least—for the government to permit the essential mail services of this country to be disrupted for any period of time. Even a matter of a week would be extremely serious.

My question really is: Is the government aware of the possibilities? Particularly, does the government now possess all the legislative authority necessary to deal with such an emergency if it should arise? If the government does not possess that power, and in view of the timetable that has been announced, it seems to me that it would have to be addressed immediately in order for that authority to be obtained before Parliament adjourns. This would seem to me the logical thing to do, rather than to take a chance on the disruption not occurring and then having to recall Parliament to head off a serious national emergency.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the government is monitoring the situation very closely. However, I will take the question as notice. Certainly, there is no power held by the government which would enable it, in some unilateral fashion, to forestall a work stoppage of the kind described. However, we will await detailed information from the Minister of Labour.

Senator Manning: May I ask one supplementary question? In view of past experience, not just with regard to the Post Office but also with regard to those occasional serious disruptions that occur in other vital public services, would it not be desirable for the government to consider some form of emergency legislation which could be invoked in situations of this kind to prevent serious public harm being done, without having to recall Parliament and incurring the costs and the inevitable delay before that long process could be gone through?

I raise this second point because, if the government is going to look at this in connection with a threatened postal strike, I would suggest that any examination might be broadened to see whether, as a general principle, there should be some authority of that kind to take care of this type of national situation between the time Parliament adjourns and it reconvenes.

Senator Perrault: Certainly, the Honourable Senator Manning advances an interesting proposal. The question of strikes and lockouts in relation to the public interest has attracted a great deal of attention, not only from all of Canada's political parties but also from individual senators and members of Parliament who serve in the House of Commons. The government would welcome the views of any honourable senator on this important subject.

As I am sure the Honourable Senator Manning is aware, a great many work stoppages occur in sectors which are not within federal jurisdiction. Certainly, the Post Office is within federal jurisdiction, but such incidents as the police strike which occurred in Halifax or in the maritime provinces are under provincial jurisdiction.

This is an important question and it may well be that at some point a committee of the Senate should focus its attention on what has become a vital issue for many Canadians.

Hon. Robert Muir: I have listened with great interest to the distinguished and Honourable Senator Manning. To clarify something in my mind, may I ask the government leader this question? Is it not correct that it is the law of the land that the Government of Canada, in the other place and in this place, gave those in government employment the right to strike after due negotiations? I realize there are many problems and inconveniences involved in recalling Parliament during an adjournment. However, we have the law to consider. As the Leader of the Government has said, quite a number of other disruptions—lockouts, wildcat strikes and so on—have nothing to do with federal government employees. Therefore, the federal government has no jurisdiction over such disputes.

Simply to affirm my own understanding, didn't the government of the day and, I presume, this Senate pass that law?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the Honourable Senator Muir has made a valid point. As I recall, when the right to collective bargaining was extended to federal employees it had the support of all of Canada's political parties. Therefore, it would be inappropriate to have machinery in place which would remove the right to collective bargaining should some public inconvenience be caused. Of course, situations arise where the public interest is affected so gravely that governments must take extraordinary action. Indeed, the Senate has assisted in the resolution of such problems, as all of us are aware.

However, Senator Muir makes a good point. We cannot, on the one hand, extend the right of free, collective bargaining and, on the other hand, remove that right arbitrarily and capriciously.

NORTHERN PIPELINE

FINANCING

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have three delayed answers to questions asked on June 9, 1981. I believe that the answers contain fairly important information to a number of senators here. Though I am prepared to read the answers in their entirety, because they are rather lengthy I would ask that they be taken as read.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Olson: Senator Roblin asked a question with regard to the costs for the Canadian segments of the pipeline project.

In my reply to Senator Roblin's question of June 9, 1981, I indicated that the costs for the Canadian segments of the pipeline had not increased significantly from the estimates prepared by Foothills earlier. Further details have been brought to my attention which I would like to provide to the honourable senators.

Foothills Pipe Lines (Yukon) Ltd.'s most recent estimate of $8.367 billion for the Canadian segments of the pipeline was filed with the National Energy Board in April, 1980. The company is now in the process of revising its estimates to take into account the increases in inflation and interest rates which have occurred since the time when the last estimates were calculated. It is my understanding that the company will be in a position to file revised estimates with the National Energy Board before the end of 1981.

As honourable senators may be aware, in March and April of this year, the NEB held public hearings to consider the final design cost estimates for the eastern and western legs. Costs for Phase I of the project were estimated by Foothills to be $821,321,000. The board's decision is expected in the next several weeks.

Senator Olson: Senator Manning asked what the cost of Alaskan gas would be when it begins to flow through the pipeline system.

Honourable senators should understand that it is difficult to determine the initial cost of the Alaskan gas which is expected to be delivered to the lower 48 states in the mid-1980s.

I think it is important to consider what alternate fuels may cost at that time and the fact that these other sources of supply may not be readily accessible to consumers in the lower 48 states.

While it is anticipated that Alaskan gas may cost more than competing fuels in the early years, there is a provision in the United States for the rolling in of the price of Alaskan gas with that of other supplies available. Further, a major proportion of the costs of Alaskan gas will, in the initial years of delivery, reflect the high cost of transportation. As the capital costs of the pipeline system are depreciated, the price of Alaskan gas will begin to decrease significantly.

Senator Olson: Senator Buckwold asked what the position of Canadian gas producers would be when Alaskan gas begins to flow through the Alaska Highway gas pipeline system.

As I indicated to the honourable senator on June 9, 1981, the National Energy Board authorized last year the export of surplus Canadian gas through the southern segments of the pipeline system. For the western leg, the total authorized export on a firm and conditional basis between 1980-81 and 1987-88 amounts to 702.7 billion cubic feet ($19,906.5 \times 10^6 \text{ m}^3$). For the eastern leg, total authorized volumes on a firm and conditional basis over the period 1981-82 to 1987-88 amounts to 2.6 trillion cubic feet ($73,663.2 \times 10^6 \text{ m}^3$).

Gas exports may continue for the full period of time specified in the licence, if the mainline system has been completed and Alaskan gas is flowing, provided that additional loading is not required to accommodate both flows.

As set out in the NEB's Phase IV (b) "Reasons for Decisions" of May, 1980, additional facilities to carry Alberta gas were not certificated under the Northern Pipeline Act. The companies would be required to file another application with the NEB to seek a Certificate of Public Convenience and Necessity if additional facilities were required.

Gas is expected to begin to flow through the western leg by October, 1981. In the fall of 1982, gas is scheduled to begin to flow through the eastern leg.

There was a take-or-pay provision included in the export licence issued by the NEB which would obligate the U.S. shippers to take-or-pay 85 per cent of the contracted volumes of gas in any given year.

In April, 1980, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission in the United States ruled that, in view of the fact that it had no control over the price of Canadian gas, it could not permit the U.S. shipper to enter into a contract with this level of take-or-pay. Instead, FERC developed a "minimum bill" system which, in effect, imposed a revenue cap on the take-or-pay contracts. U.S. shippers would be obligated to take-or-pay 85 per cent of the contracted volumes of gas at the former Canadian border price of $3.45 per thousand cubic feet. FERC subsequently included an escalation provision which allows the revenue cap to increase according to the U.S. Natural Gas Policy Act inflation factor. Under the FERC formula, the minimum assured revenue for the eastern and western legs would amount to $1.113 billion per year. This amount would increase annually according to the inflation factor.

TRANSPORT

GOVERNMENT POLICY RE INTERNATIONAL AND DOMESTIC AIR ROUTES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Nurgitz on April 2, 1981, concerning the government's international air policy; the dropping of unprofitable routes by Air Canada; and government policy on deregulation. I ask that the answer be taken as read.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Government policy on international air services continues to be based on the existence of two flag carriers operating under a single integrated plan. This plan consists of a division of the world into geographic areas where each carrier is entitled to operate. At present, the government believes that the needs of the travelling public are adequately served by this two-carrier policy. The remarks by the President of Air Canada, to which the honourable senator refers, were based on the president's own views and did not reflect government policy.

In recent years, Air Canada has been allowed to suspend service to the following points, but retains the right to reintroduce service at some future date: Brussels, Prague and Moscow (January 1977), Vienna (March 1977), Shannon (November 1979), and Copenhagen (January 1981).

With respect to domestic air services, the Minister has endorsed the previous government's policy of controlled deregulation, under which competition should be allowed to increase progressively as markets mature. This policy is based on the recognition that competition can yield real benefits to the public, but that it can also lead to carrier instability and inadequate service in low density markets.

AIR FREIGHT RATES BETWEEN NORTHERN COMMUNITIES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Adams on May 21, 1981, concerning air freight rates between northern communities. The answer is rather long, and I ask that it be taken as read.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The honourable senator's remarks of May 21, 1981 are factually correct. However, they present a very fragmented view of the air freight rate situation which demands clarification.

Firstly, for certain given situations all over the country rate anomalies do exist. What one must consider, in looking at freight rates for a given region, is the normal way in which goods are moving as opposed to these anomalies or exceptions. The honourable senator surely knows that the situation he has represented is, indeed, the exception rather than the rule. He knows that to move a small package in the north, one would tend to use the mails as opposed to air freight, as air freight for such small items is expensive—as it is in the south. The fixed administrative costs as a proportion of the value of the shipment for the movement of small packages are, relatively speaking, higher than those for larger volume shipments. However, the honourable senator should be well aware that it is exactly those large volume consignments, or shipments over 200 pounds, that make up the majority of the air freight business in the north. I am happy to inform the honourable senator that freight rates for large volume consignments have been relatively stable. In fact, these rates have risen only an average of about 10 per cent in 1980-81 and these rates filed by Calmair as of May 8, 1981, are less than the Transair rates of 1979 and the PWA rates filed on January 28, 1980. For the benefit of the honourable senator I have obtained copies of the freight rate increases for large volume shipments and I would be happy to make them available to him.

The overall subject of air freight rates in the north is one that has received very close attention from the Canadian Transport Commission as is indicated by the recent hearings on air services in the Keewatin District January 13 to January 23, 1981. While the recent bankruptcy of Lambair, a carrier which provided charter service to this region, has upset, to some extent, the balance between chartered and scheduled services, I am sure that other carriers will enter this market. I would like to reassure the honourable senator that this situation in the north is not one which is at rest within this government but is receiving very active attention.

HEALTH OF JAMES BAY CREE INDIANS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Nurgitz on May 26, 1981, concerning the health of the James Bay Cree Indians. Since the answer is quite lengthy, I ask that it be taken as read.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The responsibility for health care of the Cree Indian people in the James Bay area was finally transferred on March 31, 1981, under the James Bay and Northern Quebec Agreement, to the Quebec government and the Cree Board of Health and Social Services.

There has been considerable debate on medical, legal and political issues relating to the agreement, on the services that are being provided and on responsibilities for these services. Although responsibility for health matters now rests with the Government of Quebec, the Minister of National Health and Welfare has on a number of occasions stated that, in response to a request by Quebec and the Cree Health Board, she would be very happy to have officials and consultants in her department provide advice in specialized health areas.

Following a standing committee meeting of Health, Welfare and Social Affairs on Tuesday, May 26, 1981, a motion was adopted which called on the Minister of National Health and Welfare to convene meetings involving Health and Welfare, Indian Affairs and Northern Development, authorities of the Province of Quebec responsible for health, and representatives of the James Bay Cree, in order to resolve some of the problems. The Minister of National Health and Welfare has therefore written to the Honourable Pierre-Marc Johnson, Minister of Social Affairs, suggesting that they should meet together with the Honourable John Munro and representatives of the Cree people.

It is hoped that at such a meeting it will be possible to resolve a number of the questions regarding responsibilities and services. In the meantime the Minister of National Health and Welfare will continue to volunteer the use of departmental consultants upon request from all concerned parties and ensure that the departmental hospital at Moose Factory continues to make its services available for referral of patients.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

CANADIAN INVOLVEMENT IN PROPOSED CARIBBEAN AID PROGRAM

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Macquarrie on June 10, 1981, concerning Canadian involvement in a proposed Caribbean economic aid program. I ask that the answer be taken as read.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Prime Minister Trudeau has discussed with the Presidents of Mexico and the United States a summit meeting of Canada, the United States and Mexico at a date to be determined.

While the agenda has not been fixed, Canada would, in principle, favour the discussion of the situation in the Caribbean Basin, an area of common interest to the three participants.

During the course of recent discussions with the United States, the American proposal was explained in detail to Canadian officials. These ideas are presently being examined and a response is being prepared.

However, in general, Canada supports efforts to assist the states of the region with their economic development. In Jamaica in January, the Secretary of State for External Affairs announced that Canada intended to intensify and deepen its economic and political relationships with the states of the Commonwealth Caribbean in particular.

HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN

MOTION CONDEMNING ACT OF VIOLENCE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I seek leave of the Senate to move a motion with respect to Her Majesty the Queen.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Yes.

Senator Perrault: In the other place yesterday there was unanimous support for a resolution which deplored the wanton act of violence which occurred during the recent official birthday ceremonies in London.

● (2110)

Honourable senators, with leave, seconded by the Leader of the Opposition, I would like to move—

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted?

Senator Roblin: To what page of Hansard are you referring?

Senator Perrault: I am referring to page 10577 of House of Commons Debates for Monday, June 15.

Senator Asselin: Are you proposing the same motion?

Senator Perrault: It is the same motion, yes, as it appears in Votes and Proceedings.

Senator Asselin: Why not have a different motion?

Senator Perrault: No, honourable senators, I would like to use the words used in the other place, and then we will have the unanimous view of the Canadian Parliament.

I wish to move a motion relating to the wanton act of violence perpetrated against Her Majesty the Queen during her official birthday ceremonies. I therefore move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Flynn, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(h):

That this House expresses to Her Majesty its extreme shock at the violence which occurred during her official birthday celebrations;

That this House expresses its admiration to Her Majesty for her outstanding courage during the ordeal; and

That this House condemns all such violent acts, especially those acts against public figures during the discharging of their duties.

Senator Asselin: We should have passed the same motion respecting the Pope.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I understood that instead of speaking on the first first order I would yield to Senator Everett, who is prepared to speak on Order No. 3. I can proceed now, but I believe that was the understanding.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Well, the intention with regard to Orders 3 and 5 was that they should be dealt with together. They appear on the Order Paper separated by Order No. 4 which stands in my name, and I did discuss with Senator Macdonald whether we would start the day with Orders 3 and 5 and deal with them together. I think that was our understanding, so I ask that Order 4 stand and that Orders 3 and 5 be called first?

Senator Flynn: Are you asking also that Orders 1 and 2 stand?

Senator Frith: I am sorry, yes, that is correct. I had intended having them called first to see what would happen, but we could have them stand.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that Orders 1, 2 and 4 stand and that Orders 3 and 5 be called together?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

THE ESTIMATES

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A)—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on supplementary estimates (A) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1982, which was presented on June 11, 1981.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I will deal briefly with supplementary estimates (A). The report of the committee is an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of June 11, which you have before you now. There is only one item in the supplementary estimates, although it is a rather large one that concerns the petroleum compensation payments. The amount of the estimate is $2.1433 billion, raising the total of the petroleum compensation payments to $5.1587 billion.

If senators consult the report, they will see that it does give a breakdown of the items that go into that increase, and I might just say that legislation will be introduced to permit the compensation fund to operate as a revolving fund and receive revenues through the petroleum and special compensation charges, and, as it does now, make payments which are called petroleum compensation payments. The only item that will appear in the budget will be the difference between those two items.

I might say that had this method been followed for the main estimates for 1981-82, the total of the main estimates would have been reduced by over $2.5 billion, and if it had applied to the main estimates and to this supplementary estimate (A), the total of these two estimates would have been reduced by over $4.81 billion.

I think that is all I need to say on that particular subject. If there are any questions, I will do my best to answer them.

On motion of Senator Lamontagne, debate adjourned.

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON MAIN ESTIMATES

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on the estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1982, which was presented on June 10, 1981.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I should like to deal with the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on the main estimates, which was presented and printed as an appendix on June 10.

Senator Roblin: You will find that referred to at page 2500 of Hansard.

Senator Everett: Yes, that is right. It is at page 1265 of the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate for June 10.

Under the heading of the estimates for the year ending March 31, 1982, we have been continuing our hearings in the National Finance Committee on the subject of government policy and regional disparities. I believe we have had 41 hearings on that particular study. Today we concluded those hearings with the appearance of the Minister of Finance and President of the Treasury Board of the Province of Newfoundland. The committee will be meeting during the next two days and we hope that the first draft of our report will be completed during the summer recess.

Also in respect of the main estimates we heard from the Chairman of the Economic Council of Canada; the Governor of the Bank of Canada; the Deputy Minister of Finance, and the President of the Treasury Board. If honourable senators consult the report, which can be found in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate for June 10, they will see a report of the evidence given by those witnesses. I will not go over that because it is there to be read, but I should like to give honourable senators some brief thoughts on the position of the Canadian economy at this time, as I see it.

I suppose it is true to say that it is hard to think of an economy being in a worse position. We have high and accelerating inflation. Today businesses raise prices and everybody just treats them with a shrug. You go to a hotel at which you previously paid a rate of $65 a day and find that you now have to pay $85, $90 or $100 a day, and you just say, "Oh, that is inflation." You go for a meal and find that the price has increased by $4 or $5, and you say, "That is inflation."

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

I remember a time when, if somebody raised a price, very often he would lose his market. But that does not seem to be happening today. If you look at wage demands, you see they are starting to run at 17 per cent to 20 per cent per year; and in our economy we still have to absorb a considerable amount of the mandated energy price increases that have not been absorbed already. In addition to that, we are operating well below our potential capacity. It is true that our growth rate was high in the first quarter, but almost everybody who comments on the economy expects it to fall during the rest of the year. Our productivity increases are extremely low. Our exchange rate is under pressure. The high U.S. interest rates are the basic cause of this, but it is also exacerbated by the fact that we have no oil-sharing agreement and by our constitutional disputes.

As far as the exchange rate is concerned, we will probably be unhappy no matter what happens. Let us assume for a moment that it stays where it is. What we would have is an exchange rate that today is adequate for our manufacturers to sell into the export market but lower than required for the producers of primary products to sell into those export markets. As a result, when wage demands are made on those primary producers, they are not resisted in the way they are normally resisted, and they are transmitted quite quickly to other businesses across Canada. So it is even difficult to leave our exchange rate where it is. If our exchange rate falls, it contributes to greater inflation. If it rises, it puts our manufacturing industries in difficulty as far as their export business is concerned.

In addition to that, the control of the money supply is becoming increasingly stringent, and we have extremely high interest rates which are not helped by the fact that large amounts of money have to be borrowed by the federal government to finance its deficit. There is no question that the continuing stringent money supply control will contribute even more to the economic slowdown.

Roughly, that is the situation we are in today. It is a very serious and difficult situation. It is true that the Bank of Canada has been applying a restrictive monetary policy. Many suggestions have been made towards the possibility of squeezing inflation out of the economy without any pain to anybody. There are those who say, "Let us just live with inflation. As far as the distributive effect of inflation is concerned, studies show that no particular group has suffered from inflation, so why not just decide that we will live with inflation?"

The Governor of the Bank of Canada told us that the problem with that suggestion is that one can never be assured that inflation will be controlled at any particular rate. In addition, it means that as long as there is continuing inflation, more and more funds will be applied to the acquisition of assets rather than to investment in productive resources. In such a scenario longer term financing becomes increasingly difficult, as it is today with lenders being very reluctant to lend money other than on the very shortest terms.

Under such a scenario, there would be constant uncertainty about the policies of the Government and the Bank of Canada, and there would be a heightened possibility of a disastrous mistake in policy in such a climate. If we say that we are prepared to live with inflation and if inflation continues to mount, as it most certainly would, there would come a time, as historically it has always come, where it would become totally outrageous and where a disaster might well result in a total breakdown of the economy.

There are those who say, "Well, let us reduce interest rates. We will have a tight monetary policy, but we will reduce interest rates." But suppose lower interest rates were mandated through government action. In other words, the government merely says that certain interest rates will be reduced. Which segment of the economy would they choose? Whatever segment or sector that it did choose, demand would immediately flow to that sector. Let us assume for the moment that the government has decided that it will mandate a lowering of interest rates on home mortgages. There are already speculative excesses in housing, which would become worse as a result of such an announcement. I suppose the government could ease monetary policy and in that way reduce interest rates, but it seems to me that that would be extremely short-term relief, for inflation would accelerate and the interest rates in the longer term would tend to reflect that inflation. In addition to that, of course, our exchange rate would drop, which would also contribute to inflation. There have also been suggestions that we should lower our interest rates and let the exchange rate drop. Governor Bouey said that he did not think that we could be sure that the exchange rate would stop at any determinable level. If we decided to reduce interest rates by a more accommodative monetary policy, the expectations that are already embedded in this economy would clearly become rampant.

There are also those who say, "Well, what we ought to do is balance the federal budget. The root of all inflation is our running a deficit." This is a favourite argument of the businessman. Governor Bouey said that the fact that we are running a deficit has no effect on our monetary policy; that we are not monetizing that deficit. The Economic Council of Canada showed us studies from its most recent report which indicate that balancing the deficit would have very little effect on our inflation rate. In fact, if one thinks about it, those who say that balancing the budget would cure inflation must logically look at the situation right across the country, and if one looks at the combined provincial budgets and federal budgets, I believe one will find them in surplus. As a matter of fact, you can go back in history and find situations of inflation with the budget in surplus. There are very good and valid reasons to balance a budget, but to suggest that by doing so you will cure inflation is, in my judgment, totally misleading.

There are those who say that what we ought to have is a tax-based incomes policy—the acronym is "TIP." This is the latest concept in incomes policies. We have tried controls in Canada. They have not stopped inflation. I think you would agree, whether you are for or against controls, that they distort investment patterns and the very perception that there may be controls can start off, as it may be doing today, a new round of price and wage increases. Once you get into controls—and we found this the last time—you either have to abandon them and return to inflation rates that are probably higher than the ones you started with, or you have to make them more and more stringent and run the risk of gradually strangling a free economy. We are presented with this TIP idea which is made to look extremely attractive by its proponents and which looks very simple because it uses the tax system. I suggest to you that, as simple as it looks, when it is put into operation it will be complex and suffer from every defect of the control system. I do not believe that any control system should be used except in the most serious of circumstances and certainly should not be used as a threat, for all it does is accelerate price and wage increases.

There are also those who say we can get through this without pain if we have what are called “supply-side measures.” They say, “What you want to do is increase the supply to meet the demand. If you do that, nobody is going to be hurt; everybody is going to be happy.” They suggest measures to increase investment; measures to ensure the efficient operation of the economy; and measures to improve productivity. There is a school of economists now in the United States who have great influence on American policy. They are the supply-side economists and they are saying that if you put supply policies into operation you can lick the inflationary problem.

I agree that supply policies are absolutely necessary to achieve an efficient economy, but they may take a long time to be effective since their one quality is that they operate in the medium to long term, and they do not operate in the short term. I do not believe they will be effective in controlling inflation, although they are necessary for other reasons. I think it is a cruel hoax to suggest that, through supply policies, it will be possible to control the rate of inflation. I do not think it is true.

There are those who suggest we can get through this by what they call “gradualism”—we can do what we must, but we will do it over a long period of time and it will not hurt very many people. The fact of the matter is that we have been doing that now for four or five years. It has not worked, and the agony is being prolonged. Gradualism very much contributes to the “stagflation” that we are suffering from today and, in the end, as the gradualism becomes more and more stringent, it eventually works and the very crunch that you try to avoid you are confronted with.

Finally, there are those who say, “Really, what we need to control inflation is a combination of all of these measures.” That sounds very effective. Why not employ all of the measures? It seems to me that if we do, we will get the feeling that everyone is being treated equally and that nobody is being made to suffer by having to pay more than the other fellow. It is fine to use all the measures, providing you are not using all the measures in a way that causes you to misuse the one effective policy available to you.

[Senator Everett.]

Running through this whole problem of our economy is the great difficulty of expectations. Expectations of continuing inflation are extremely high. That is one of the reasons for “stagflation.” It is one of the reasons that some of the best brains in the country are not spending their time trying to analyze how they can increase investment in productive resources. They are spending their time trying to analyze how they can beat inflation by buying collectables, land, gold, and so forth. That is what the brains are doing, and they are doing it, for the most part, fairly successfully, but it is not doing much for the economy of the country.

How people feel about an economy is crucial to its operation. We have to destroy those inflationary expectations. We have to convince people that, when they invest their money in anything, there are winners and there are losers. People today are convinced that, if they put their money into Vancouver real estate, they cannot do anything but win, and until they are convinced that their investments can result in losses as well as profits, those expectations will continue. In doing this, somehow or other we must maintain public buoyancy—that is, the feeling that the economy is sound and growing—and we must try, if possible, to avoid public panic and despair. This is a tall order, and the question is: How should we go about it?

A number of policies are available to us. It seems to me that what is important is to know just how they are effective. In generic terms, it seems to me that there are two types of policies. There are those that will improve the general operation of the economy such as incentives to encourage productive investment; the reduction of regulations; measures to improve the functioning of our labour markets such as manpower training programs; even balancing the budget; and reducing the size of government. All of those policies can contribute to a more efficient economy, but they take time to be effective, and they are only effective if they are applied evenly over the medium-to-long term.

They will assist our economy to grow and through growth we can provide greater benefits to society and, indeed, they will reduce the inflationary tendencies in our economy. But they will not reduce inflation. The only way to reduce inflation is to reduce demand, and the only way I know to reduce demand is a restrictive monetary policy which works by slowing down the economy. I admit it is uneven in its application. It has the potential to go too far. When we find every country in the free world applying restrictive monetary policies, there are real dangers. But it will do the job and it will do it in the short-to-medium term.

I believe our stance should be one of recognizing that a restrictive monetary policy applied over the necessary period of time is absolutely essential to destroy expectations and to destroy inflation. We should support the governor and encourage him to continue the policy until it does work. We should not confuse the idea that because we balance the budget, reduce taxes, conclude an energy agreement with Alberta, spend money on manpower training, or adopt all the other supply policies that are available to us, that we are going to reduce inflation. Those initiatives are necessary. They have always been necessary. They will make the economy work better. But to use those policies to avoid doing the right thing to reduce inflation—which is a restrictive monetary policy applied until inflation is brought under control—is to really almost come close to destroying the fabric of this economy. If we do not do it now, then people are going to become so convinced that the central bank and the government do not mean business, that there will be no stopping inflation. I do not think there is any painless way of doing it. I think we have to suffer pain. I think we have to take risks. If there is any stance that the government should take over all the other policies it is to support the Governor of the Bank of Canada in the correct policy for reducing inflation.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to ask Senator Everett a question relating to the supplementary estimates (A), but before I do so, although I could find many things to disagree with him in his very well thought-out speech, I want to congratulate him on the thoughtfulness and eloquence with which he presented it.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Smith: My question relates to the last paragraph in the committee's report concerning supplementary estimates (A) which is found at page 2531 of Hansard for June 11. It has to do with what I think he referred to as the probability of legislation being introduced to create a revolving fund in relation to the petroleum and special compensation charges. The last sentence of this report reads:

If it had been applied—

That is the revolving fund idea.

—to the Main Estimates and these Supplementary Estimates, the total of these two estimates would have been reduced by over $4.81 billion.

That is a very large sum of money. My question is: Does that mean, therefore, the government would be able to spend, if this comes about, $4.81 billion without a vote in the estimates?

Senator Everett: What it means is that the revenue, prior to the legislation that is intended, came from the Consolidated Revenue Fund. Therefore, the expenditure would show in the estimates. What will happen now is the revenues will be derived from petroleum and special compensation charges to the oil industry, and those charges will go into a revolving fund. The petroleum compensation payments will be paid out of that revolving fund. By virtue of the way in which the Financial Administration Act works, all that would be shown in the estimates then is the difference between what goes into the revolving fund and what is paid out.

Senator Smith: I am not arguing the point but only seeking enlightenment, but on the basis of the figure presented in this last sentence of the report, it seems to mean that $4.81 billion would be paid out of the revolving fund without a vote in the expenditure estimates of the government.

Senator Everett: If they balance that probably would be the case; if they do not balance, the amount will appear as an estimate. That is the difference between the payments out of, and the payments into, the revolving fund.

Senator Smith: I appreciate if there was a deficit in the revolving fund it would have to be made up by a vote from the Consolidated Revenue Fund or some other fund, in any event. What I am really asking about is whether this figure of $4.81 billion used here as an illustration of the decreased amount would need to be shown in the estimates. Does that not mean that, using the illustration in the report, there would be, indeed, $4.81 billion that would not have to be shown in the estimates and, therefore, would not require an estimate vote?

Senator Everett: I think essentially, you are correct about the $4.81 billion. I would like to check on that and perhaps give you an enlarged answer at a later date. My understanding is that it would not appear as part of the estimates. The only thing that would appear would be that amount needed to make up the revolving fund.

Senator Smith: I look forward to that answer, and I thank the honourable senator.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I would like to raise a point with Senator Everett which bothers me. I listened to his argument very closely supporting the position taken by the Governor of the Bank of Canada. Although I am not an economist and not as knowledgeable as some other senators in this chamber about economic matters, I understand the argument that you curb inflation by increasing the cost of money. Hence, people do not spend so much and the cycle comes around and prices do not continue to ascend. What bothers me is that in the present climate, even though interest rates are very high and money is very expensive, people continue to borrow and pay the high interest rates because of the confidence they have in the economy or because of the sureness with which they feel that inflation is going to go on in any case. I think that high interest rates are in themselves inflationary because they add to the cost of money and, hence, add to the cost of goods. Would Senator Everett be prepared to enlighten me in my understanding or misunderstanding of this situation?

Senator Everett: It is my belief that high interest rates are the result of normal jockeying between the supply of money and the demand for money. In a sense it is wrong to say that what the central bank does is say that the interest rate is going to be at a certain level. What is truer is that they try to keep the growth of the money supply, or whatever aggregates they look at, at a certain level. Dependent upon the demand for money at that time that can cause interest rates to increase or decrease.

It is true that they use an interest rate to determine how fast the aggregates grow, but that is a mechanism that is used. In fact, what they are trying to do is target a certain growth for the aggregates, and within that growth there is a demand for money; and if that demand is high it will cause interest rates to be high. It is obviously true that since interest is a cost of doing business in the initial stages, it does add to costs—

Senator Hicks: And to inflation.

Senator Everett: —and to prices and to the price level; but the effect of controlling the supply of money, and indeed the high interest rates themselves, in time does mean that the economy slows down and that people are less willing to make those investment decisions.

At this particular point, if you can buy a house and your perception is that the house will increase in value by, say, 25 per cent a year, you may well not think it very bad to take a mortgage at 18 per cent a year. I will admit that the high interest rates are a cost and a factor in prices, and they do have an effect of changing the price level, but I would argue that in time what happens is that the economy does start to dampen down; and as it dampens down the supply of funds is reduced and the interest rates, as a consequence, drop—unless the central bank further tightens the supply of money, in which case it can keep those interest rates riding high for a longer time, but the drop in the economy will be even greater.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, there are many questions that I would like to ask Senator Everett following his excellent speech, but I will confine myself to one or two. I would like to return, first, to the matter that was raised by our colleague, Senator Smith, a few moments ago in connection with supplementary estimates (A), and the fact that henceforth only the difference between the amounts paid in compensation and the amounts collected through the petroleum and special compensation charges will be reported in the estimates.

I want to ask the honourable senator, frankly, what he thinks of this as a matter of budgetary practice. If the government raises $4 billion or $5 billion in a tax, whatever the nature of the tax, and spends it, whatever the program, no spending item will be shown in the estimates, and I suggest that, in principle it is wrong and that when you are dealing with sums of that order of magnitude this practice gives quite a false impression of the budgetary position of the government.

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, I do not think it is true to say that the amounts involved are not shown in the blue book of estimates. I believe that the amount received by the revolving fund and the amount expended from the revolving fund will be shown in the estimates; but the budgetary amount will be the shortfall, and therefore your budgetary expenditures will be reduced, as we see it, by the amount of the payment by the oil industry into the compensation revolving fund.

Senator Murray: I do not want to enter into a debate at this point, but I cannot think of a single argument to be advanced in favour of this practice, to be perfectly frank about it. I would like the committee, of which I am a member, to have a close look at this practice, because if it can be done with the oil import compensation fund, the government can start earmarking various taxes for various purposes all over the lot, and before we know it they will be netting out their expenditures in all kinds of areas. I would like to see the committee take a closer look at this, to see whether it is done in respect of other tax and spending measures, and express a judgment as to the propriety of this in terms of the government's accountability and its responsibility to Parliament for these spending programs.

Senator Everett: The honourable senator makes a very good point. It is something that has come up before in our hearings. It might be something on which it would be worthwhile to hold a few special hearings. There are other areas that are not dissimilar. For example, it is possible, if the government is making a payment which would be included in budgetary expenditures, to make that into some sort of tax relief, which then, so far as the recipient is concerned, may still be of similar value, but the government, on the other hand, has quite changed its budgetary practices by doing that.

So the point is well taken and, in fact, I would endorse the idea of perhaps having two or three hearings and exploring the whole issue of what should or should not be in. It is not something that has not been gone over by Parliament over many years, but perhaps the time has come to have another close look at it.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, I would like to ask a supplementary question on that point. My memory was jogged by Senator Everett's reply. Does he recall that, in fact, this matter was discussed at some length approximately two or three years ago, and particularly addressed by Senator Grosart, and that as a result of that discussion even representatives of the Department of Finance were willing to agree that they should retreat from any such practices?

Senator Everett: I do recall that very vaguely, but it was in respect of user fees. I believe the subject was in respect of some sort of user fees in harbours.

Senator Roblin: The user fee par excellence.

Senator Everett: That is true. We did get an agreement on that, and so far as I know the Treasury Board has lived up to that agreement. But that would be another subject for the hearings.

Senator Murray: There is one matter relating to Senator Everett's comments on the state of the Canadian economy. He said, as I understood him, that wage demands are now in the area of 17 per cent to 20 per cent per year. He is not suggesting, I presume, that wage settlements are at that level. In any case, I wanted to ask him what the source of that information is, and, secondly, whether he will agree that in each of the last three years average wage settlements in this country have been considerably below the inflation rate.

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, I think there has been a reduction in real wages in this country. I think what I specifically said was that wage demands are starting to run in the area of 17 to 20 per cent per annum. In fact, I think there have been settlements that have run to 33 or 34 per cent over a period of two years. I believe I could produce details of some settlements of this magnitude.

I do not think it has been endorsed by the Government of British Columbia, but I read in the Globe and Mail today that the doctors in British Columbia will settle for a 40 per cent increase over two years. I suppose the doctors might not like my lumping them in with the rest of the trade unions, but nonetheless that is a wage increase, and it would appear to be 40 per cent over two years. The burden of the article was that it would be accepted.

Senator Murray: I cannot resist asking the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance whether, in view of his statement to the effect that a balancing of our budget would have very little effect on the inflation rate, from which I infer that he thinks the size of the federal deficit is not an important element in Canadian inflation, what he thinks the principal elements are in the prolonged high rate of inflation that we have in this country today.

Senator Everett: I would like to say that my argument was that the idea of balancing the budget would not reduce inflation. I did not argue—in fact, I argued the other way—in favour of balancing the budget. My argument was that it was beneficial in the medium-to-long term in creating a more productive and growing economy.

I think there are good reasons for balancing the budget, but I think those people who say, as many businessmen do, that all that is wrong with this country is we have a budgetary deficit, and if we could only get the budget balanced our inflation problems would be over, are wrong. History does not support that. It is not true.

In that respect one of the things we came across when we were examining the budget—and this is nothing that is not public—was that out of roughly $62 billion of total spending, if you take out the transfer payments to people, the transfer payments to the provinces, the interest on the public debt and what we spend on national defence, you are left with $18 billion that is directly controllable by the federal government. I would like to see us operating with a more balanced budget, but I am always challenged by what it is that you cut. We can cut some of the $18 billion, but in relation to the $62 billion it is not going to be a devil of a lot. We then get down to the problem of what social programs we are going to cut, but who wants to bite the bullet on that? Then we get into the area that we are already into of discussion with the provinces as to who foots the bill there.

In this regard we are going to be discussing equalization and the question of the Established Programs Financing Act. I do not know who can go to the public and say, "This should be done," or "That should be done". It is my feeling that while we ought to be prudent about our expenditures—and I noticed that the Minister of Finance, the other day, was saying that there are no new programs that are going to be available to us because we just do not have the money—I really do not know where it is that we can make the kind of stringent cuts that would have to be made in order to balance the budget.

The only thing that is open to us is an increase in revenue. As the Economic Council said, how do we increase taxes when one of the major things that we want to do is reduce taxes in order to encourage investment? It seems to me that that takes us in one direction, and that is that we have got to get more oil revenues flowing to the federal government.

I am entranced with Mr. Lougheed's public relations, and his perception that everything that has gone wrong with energy in this country has been the fault of Mr. Trudeau and the Liberals. I just do not believe that. I think Mr. Lougheed is being intransigent. I do not think he is acting in the best interests of Canada. I do not think he is talking in terms of equalization. His province, like my province, was dependent on equalization at one time. Where is his feeling of history with regard to that fact? It seems just to have gone out of the window.

I apologize; I have departed a bit from your point. Nonetheless, I think that this problem of a budgetary deficit should be cured. I suspect that while we have to be a great deal more prudent about our expenditures—we are forced to do that—it is an energy-pricing agreement and a sharing of revenues that are necessary to put us on the right side.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask the honourable Senator Everett a further question, to which I will perhaps make the preliminary comment that I am sure he recognizes that in his last remarks he challenged us to a debate on a subject on which some of us have very strong feelings. I will avoid that challenge, not because I am afraid to take it up, but because this is perhaps not the proper occasion on which to do so. I want him to know that we do not all think as he does about that.

I was intrigued, however, as he talked about controlling the money supply, as to the mechanisms which he believes—"believes" is the way I guess I want to put it—are available to the Bank of Canada to control the money supply in the way in which I thought he was talking about, namely, a sort of a fine tuning, involving doing something as a consequence of which the money supply is tightened, and then loosening up a bit, as a consequence of which the money supply grows. That leads me to ask just what it is that he believes is the mechanism that can be applied to achieve this.

Senator Everett: I am not sure that I understand the honourable senator's question, and I apologize for that.

Senator Smith: It probably was not very well put.

Senator Everett: I am sure it was well put.

The Bank of Canada has had target ranges for the growth of the money supply—I believe largely M1—and it has been very successful in staying within those ranges. I do not know what I can add to that. In other words, the bank has been capable of setting targets and meeting those targets. All I am suggesting is that we support the governor of the bank in the fairly stringent range that he has now.

Senator Smith: Perhaps I will try to put my question a little more clearly, and perhaps the honourable senator's answer has clarified it in my own mind.

The Honourable Senator Everett has just said—no doubt correctly—that the central bank sets targets for the money supply and it has been successful in achieving those targets. I do not quarrel with that assertion at all. I am merely asking him what the bank has done, after setting those targets, which has enabled it to achieve them?

Senator Everett: I suspect that I am getting on to fairly dangerous ground, but the bank does control the monetary base, which is reserves to the banking system plus currency. The governor has always said that their most reliable indicator of the success of controlling the aggregates is M1 or M1-B, which is currency plus demand deposits. I think their method of doing it is rather arcane—and Senator Lamontagne can probably correct me if I am wrong—but I believe they try to establish an interest rate at which they can either buy or sell government securities. By doing so, they can drain off deposits, thereby tightening the money supply, or add to those deposits, thereby having a more liberal money supply.

Senator Smith: That is a poor word to use.

Senator Everett: I beg your pardon?

Senator Smith: I apologize, I only meant to make a joke about the use of the word "liberal." Obviously it was not very successful.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator has said that our economy is operating at well below potential, yet he went on to say that the only way to attack inflation is to reduce demand. Let me put Senator Godfrey's question to you, then, Senator Everett. If 7 per cent unemployment is not enough slack in the economy, how much unemployment would be sufficient to attack inflation?

Senator Everett: When we conducted our hearings 10 years ago on Growth, Employment and Price Stability, I believe the accepted rate of unemployment was 3 per cent. We concluded, because of the several landing nets that were available to people, that probably the full employment on a disaggregated basis across Canada—which is a fairly vague figure—was probably 4 to 4½ per cent. The governor, when he appeared before us, indicated that it was somewhere in the neighbourhood of 6 to 7 per cent. I do not think I am misquoting him; Senator Roblin will correct me if I am.

The neighbourhood of 6 to 7 per cent is probably as low as you are going to get the disaggregated Canadian figure, because I think that indicates—one hesitates to use these figures today—the prime male unemployment rate running around 3 to 4 per cent or 2½ to 3½ per cent.

We have provided a lot of opportunities through unemployment insurance, with a high participation rate in employment in our economy, which means very often two members of a family or more are working. People can be unemployed at their option. I am not trying to be cruel or to ignore the plight of people who are unemployed. However, as I understand it, the fact of the matter is that unemployment figures arise out of a survey conducted by Statistics Canada in which they ask, "Are you looking for a job and have you been out of work for one week or more?" That is a fairly subjective test. However, I think there are a lot of people who have the option on that test to stay unemployed.

Therefore, I would think that yes, probably 6 to 7 per cent is about as low as we can reasonably get, unless we change some of the underlying rules, especially as they relate to unemployment insurance. Yes, I think that we would probably start to bump our heads against the top of the economy at that stage.

On motion of Senator Lamontagne, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

SEVENTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE

Tuesday, June 16, 1981

The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments has the honour to present its Seventh Report as follows:

(Statutory Instruments No. 12)

1. In accordance with its permanent reference, section 26 of the Statutory Instruments Act, S.C. 1970-71-72, C. 38, your Joint Committee has determined to draw to the special attention of both Houses:

SOR/77-869—as extended by SOR/81-25, Railway Passenger Services Adjustment Assistance Regulations.

SOR/78-286—Railway Passenger Services Contract Regulations.

SOR/78-287—Schedule D to the Financial Administration Act, amendment.

2. Your Committee's objections to these regulations are four fold.

(i) VIA Rail Canada Inc. has been established and set up in business—and in consequence almost all the railway passenger services of the country have been brought into government ownership, control and funding—pursuant to an involved use of subordinate powers, a dollar vote in an Appropriation Act and the three slim regulations under report. At no time has Parliament had the opportunity to debate and to settle what are very significant matters.

(ii) The operative dollar vote, Vote 52d, Department of Transport, Appropriation Act No. 1, 1977, refers only to "selected rail passenger services", yet SOR/78-286, made under that vote, purports to apply not only to passenger services operated over railway lines but also to other passenger services, and not only those in substitution for rail services but also those ancillary to them.

(iii) An item critical to the funding of the services provided by VIA Rail Canada Inc., the "prescribed portion" of the employee costs of the railway companies (for severance benefits, early retirement benefits and the like) in implementing the changeover to VIA Rail control of passenger services, has never been prescribed by a regulation made under Vote 52d, but is contained in an unpublished and, hence unscrutinized, statutory instrument.

(iv) The prerequisites to or limitations on payment of the "prescribed portion" need not be set out in a regulation. Any terms or conditions subject to which payment is to be made that are set by the Governor in Council by regulation must be obeyed, but if the minister sets any others, they may, without their being embodied in any regulation, be embodied in the arrangements entered into with the railway companies. Thus, the very terms of what was a vital part of the VIA Rail programme were left to the minister to determine in conjunction with the railway companies.

3. To explain its objections, your Committee must set out the rather complicated path followed in revamping railway passenger services under public auspices and funding without recourse being had to Parliament in any real way. The very provenance of VIA Rail Canada Inc., makes out the Committee's chief objection, that Parliament has been bypassed by the executive.

On 12 January 1977 Canadian National Railways incorporated a subsidiary, VIA Rail Canada Inc., under the provisions of the Canada Business Corporations Act.

By Vote 52d, Department of Transport, Appropriation Act No. 1, 1977 (a dollar vote), VIA Rail Canada Inc., was deemed to be a railway company for the purposes of section 11 of the Railway Act, thus bypassing the Canadian Transport Commission and the public hearing process.

By Vote L56a, Department of Transport, Appropriation Act No. 3, 1977-78, the Minister of Transport was authorized to purchase "on behalf of and to hold in trust for Her Majesty in Right of Canada all of the issued common shares of VIA Rail Canada Inc. and to pay $100,000.00 in consideration thereof". Upon the completion of that purchase, VIA Rail Canada Inc. became a company the shares in which were all beneficially owned by the Queen. As such, it also became a Government Company within the meaning of the Government Companies Operation Act (as amended by item 4 of the Schedule to the Canada Business Corporations Act, S.C. 1974-75-76 cap. 33). As a Government Company, VIA Rail Canada Inc. became by virtue of section 3 of the Government Companies Operation Act an agent of Her Majesty and its powers could only be exercisable as an agent of Her Majesty.

By Order in Council, SOR/78-287, VIA Rail Canada Inc. was made a Crown Corporation by the addition of its name to Schedule D to the Financial Administration Act.

The whole authority for public funding of the VIA Rail operation and its takeover of railway passenger services provided by railway companies rests in the dollar vote, Vote 52d, Department of Transport, Appropriation Act No. 1, 1977, which reads as follows:

52d Surface Transportation—With respect to surface transportation:

(a) to deem VIA Rail Canada Inc., a railway company incorporated pursuant to Section 11 of the Railway Act;

(b) to authorize, subject to the approval of the Minister, VIA Rail Canada Inc. and any railway company to enter into contracts for the purpose of providing a unified management and control of rail passenger services in Canada; and

(c) to authorize the Minister, subject to such terms and conditions as the Governor in Council may prescribe by regulations

(i) to enter into a contract with VIA Rail Canada Inc. with respect to

(a) the provision, management, or the operation of selected rail passenger services in such a manner as to improve efficiency, effectiveness and economy in rail passenger services in Canada;

(b) the reimbursement of the net cost to the corporation of operating a rail passenger service in accordance with the provisions of the contract;

(c) incentive payments for the efficient operation of the rail passenger services in accordance with the provisions of the contract;

(ii) to reimburse, out of monies to be appropriated by Parliament, a railway company for the prescribed portion of the cost incurred by the company for the provision of income maintenance benefits, layoff benefits, relocation expenses, early retirement benefits, severance benefits and other benefits to its employees where such costs are incurred as a result of the implementation of the provisions of the contract or discontinuance of a rail passenger service provided that the aggregate of the amounts payable annually pursuant to this authority for the purposes set out in Clauses (b) and (c) does not exceed $240,000,000—$1.

Upon this foundation hangs now all the law and the administration of almost all railway passenger services in Canada.

4. While your Committee questions the validity of the Railway Passenger Services Contract Regulations extending to non-rail services, its principal objection to the regulations under report is made in terms of its tenth criterion for the scrutiny of statutory instruments:

Whether any Regulation or other Statutory Instrument within its term of reference, in the judgment of the Committee: . . .

10. in the absence of express authority to that effect in the enabling statute or prerogative, appears to amount to the exercise of a substantive legislative power properly the subject of direct parliamentary enactment, and not merely to the formulation of subordinate provisions of the technical or administrative character properly the subject of delegated legislation;

In your Committee's judgment, the settling of the legal regime to govern the now publicly owned, controlled and funded railway passenger service is too important a matter to be left to the corporate policy, and virtually unlimited corporate powers, of VIA Rail Canada Inc., a corporation wholly owned by the Crown, and to skeletal regulations made under a dollar vote which in the nature of procedure in the House of Commons cannot have been subjected to significant debate. Parliament should have been, and still should be, given the opportunity to debate the future and structure of railway passenger services in Canada and the manner of their management and control; and your committee is inclined to believe that this should include the maintenance of the jurisdiction of the Canadian Transport Commission over VIA Rail Canada. As things stand now, even if a bill to regulate railway passenger services and VIA Rail Canada Inc. were to be introduced, many important matters have been effectively foreclosed from Parliament's debate and disposition by the extensive and pre-emptive executive action that has already been taken. It is objectionable in principle that relationships between the new public railway passenger authority and the railway companies, and the takeover of services, should have been settled without parliamentary involvement.

5. It might well be thought unfortunate that your Committee has taken so long to raise these important considerations in a report to the Houses. Your Committee's predecessor but one was dealing with the VIA Rail issue at the dissolution of the Thirtieth Parliament in March 1979. Your Committee's immediate predecessor had but little time to do anything. By the opening of the Thirty-second Parliament the new VIA Rail system was fully in place and it was decided that what should be sought was the introduction of legislation to place the new system on a statutory footing. It may be that your Committee has been too patient in seeking assurances from the Minister of Transport that a bill to regularize VIA Rail Canada Inc.'s activities and powers would be introduced. Indications of the preparation of such a bill were received but lately it has become apparent that legislative action has become a retreating vision. Your Committee's joint chairmen's most recent correspondence with the Minister of Transport is attached as Appendix A to this report.

6. In objecting to the use of the regulations under report and to Vote 52d, Department of Transport, Appropriation Act No. 1, 1977, your Committee is doing no more than particularizing its predecessors' and its own general and principled objections to the making of regulations under votes in Appropriation Acts. In its Second Report for the Second Session of the Thirtieth Parliament (Statutory Instruments No. 1), the then Committee said:

"In the review of statutory instruments the Committee has been struck by the number of instances of the use of Votes in Appropriation Acts as vehicles for the conferring of subordinate law-making powers, usually upon the Governor in Council. From 1st January 1972 to 30th June 1976 at least one hundred and four items of delegated legislation have to the knowledge of the Committee, been made pursuant to Votes. (The task of adding up the number is not easy since spent regulations are removed from the Index to Part II of the Canada Gazette at the end of each calendar year in which their effect became spent.) The Committee fears that many, many more examples exist which have not been classed by the Crown's legal advisers as statutory instruments and of the existence of which the Committee has neither knowledge nor the means of knowledge.

The type of power to which the Committee is referring arises when moneys are voted by Parliament to be disbursed for a stated purpose but all the rules governing that expenditure, the determination of eligible recipients and so on, are left to be made by a subordinate authority. Parliament simply hands a sum of money to a subordinate with authority to spend it for a particular purpose, often vaguely stated, as that authority sees fit. The authority then makes a set of rules, often very elaborate, governing the expenditure of the money and, in effect, defining the purpose and objects of Parliament's bounty. Often the financial basis which gives the legal justification for the use of a Vote in an Appropriation Act is a fiction since the money voted is only one dollar.

The Committee has objected to ... the "filling up" and extension of old Votes, and old enabling powers, under a series of Votes commencing at some point in the intermediate or distant past which are then amplified in scope or altered in some one or more particulars by succeeding Votes. These successive Votes are often expressed "to extend the purpose" of an earlier Vote and the extensions in some instances are but barely related to the particular objects of the original Vote. The combination of the accumulation of extensions and the extreme generality of language in which almost all enabling powers in Votes are expressed renders the task of the Standing Joint Committee so difficult as to negate any effective scrutiny. To the extent that scrutiny is rendered ineffective, Parliament's control of the purse is subverted. The Committee has seen instances of deplorable vagueness and uncertainty as to the true extent of enabling power arising from such constant tinkering. Moreover, the Committee concludes that this practice shows that normal, substantive legislation is necessary to cover the particular subject matter dealt with by the series of Votes."

In its Fourth Report for the First Session of the Thirty-second Parliament (Statutory Instruments No. 10) your committee reported:

"The making of extensive subordinate laws on important matters such as VIA Rail Canada Inc. under Votes in Appropriation Acts also produces laws and policies never debated by Parliament. Your Committee's predecessor called for an end to this practice inimical to parliamentary sovereignty. It should stop and all existing subordinate laws made under Votes should be the subject of review as to merits by the appropriate Parliamentary Standing Committees."

The Honourable Jean-Luc Pepin, Minister of Transport,
House of Commons,
Ottawa.

Dear Mr. Pepin:

Re: SOR/77-869, Railway Passenger Services Adjustment Assistance Regulations
SOR/78-286, Railway Passenger Services Contract Regulations
SOR/78-287, Schedule D to the Financial Administration Act, amendment

The Committee has considered your letter of 17th April last to its counsel, Mr. G. C. Eglington. We are instructed to enquire of the progress of the policy review to which you referred. The Committee is anxious to know whether and when a Bill for An Act to provide for VIA Rail Canada Inc. will be introduced.

Yours sincerely,

John M. Godfrey,
Joint Chairman,
Perrin Beatty,
Joint Chairman.

Dear Senator Godfrey:

I would like to thank you and Mr. Beatty for your letter of June 26, 1980, as joint chairmen of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

With respect to the possible introduction of a Bill to provide for a VIA Rail Canada Act, a Cabinet Submission which will seek decisions in respect of rail passenger services and of VIA Rail Canada Inc. in particular is now in the advanced stages of interdepartmental consultation.

The scheduling of such deliberations is always subject to possible interruptions; however, I anticipate that a Cabinet Decision on the issues raised in that Submission will be available to us by about the end of September.

Upon receipt of the Cabinet Decision, I shall be in a position to respond directly to your Committee on whether a VIA Rail Canada Act will likely be introduced.

Yours sincerely,

Jean-Luc Pepin

 SOR/78-286, Railway Passenger Services Contract Regulations
 SOR/78-287, Schedule D to the Financial Administration Act, amendment Jan. 12, 1981

Thank you for your letter of 19th August 1980 which the Committee considered at its meeting of 30th October.

We were instructed to ask whether the Cabinet decision to which you referred has been taken and when you will respond to the Committee's position on the need for the introduction of a VIA Rail Canada Bill.

Yours sincerely,

John M. Godfrey,
 Perrin Beatty,
 Joint Chairmen.

 Joint Chairmen,
 Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, c/o The Senate,
 Ottawa, Ontario
 K1A 0A4

Dear Sirs:

I refer to your letter dated November 6 in which you questioned the status of the Cabinet decision pertaining to rail passenger services and the impact such a decision would have on the introduction of a VIA Rail Canada Bill.

The Cabinet has not as yet considered the submission to which I referred in previous correspondence. I expect the matter to be discussed early in the new year. Once a decision has been reached, I will advise your Committee on the requirement for a VIA Rail Canada Bill.

Yours sincerely,

Jean-Luc Pepin

 Dear Mr. Pepin:

Re: SOR/77-869, Railway Passenger Services Adjustment Assistance Regulations
 SOR/78-286, Railway Passenger Services Contract Regulations
 SOR/78-287, Schedule D to the Financial Administration Act, amendment

Your letter of 12th January last was before the Committee on 12th instant together with SOR/81-25 which extended the effective date of the Railway Passenger Services Adjustment Assistance Regulations to December 31, 1983.

The Committee wishes to have some definite time frame within which it can work and we are instructed to ask once again for some definite if not precise date by which a decision whether or not to proceed with a VIA Rail Canada Bill will be taken. Mindful of the fact that its position in this matter has been in suspense as it were since just before the March 1979 dissolution the Committee has adopted a time limit of 6 May 1981 on the decision to place a special report before both Houses.

Yours sincerely,

John M. Godfrey,
 Perrin Beatty,
 Joint Chairmen.

 Commons on Regulations & other Statutory Instruments
 The Senate
 Room 477-S
 Ottawa, K1A 0A4
 Dear Senator Godfrey,

Thank you for your letter of March 19, 1981, in which you seek a definite date for a decision on whether there is a requirement for a VIA Rail Canada Bill.

At present, there does not appear to be an immediate requirement for a VIA Rail Canada Act. Once the existing legislative framework has been sufficiently tested, it should be possible to establish whether a constituent act is definitely needed. I regret to inform you that, at this time, a decision on the matter is not possible.

Yours sincerely,

Jean-Luc Pepin

 Dear Mr. Pepin:

Re: SOR/77-869, Railway Passenger Services Adjustment Assistance Regulations
 SOR/78-286, Railway Passenger Services Contract Regulations
 SOR/78-287, Schedule D to the Financial Administration Act, amendment

The Committee considered your letter of 7th instant on Thursday last.

The Committee is of the view that there is an immediate requirement for a VIA Rail Canada Act and that the existing legislative framework, consisting of votes in Appropriation Acts which may not even support all the Regulations already made, is inadequate. Your letter appeared to the Committee to avoid answering the issue it has raised. Consequently, the Committee feels that a report to the Houses is needed and will be considering this matter again on 28th May and 4th June. In the meantime, we shall appreciate receiving immediate clarification of your statement that "a decision on the matter is not possible". Does this mean that the Committee has been told nothing is now being done to bring in a VIA Rail Canada Bill?

As instructed by the Committee, we are sending a copy of this letter to the Government House Leader so that he will be on notice of the Committee's opinion that speedy action should be taken to introduce VIA Rail Canada legislation.

Yours sincerely,

John M. Godfrey,
Joint Chairman.
Perrin Beatty,
Joint Chairman.

AVIATION SAFETY—COMMISSION OF INQUIRY—REFERENCE OF REPORT TO DEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I regret that I was unable to give him notice of my question and, therefore, it may be difficult for him to reply on the spur of the moment. I refer to the report rendered by Mr. Justice C. L. Dubin, Chairman of the Commission of Inquiry on Aviation Safety, and the fact that that report has been referred to a departmental committee by the minister. I would ask the Leader of the Government if he is able to provide us with the terms of reference under which this particular report has been referred to the committee.

There are two other points on which I would request some information. I should like to know whether any consideration was given to the establishment of a committee in which representatives of the main interested parties that appeared before the commission might have some input; and why it has been thought advisable to include the Air Administrator as a member of this review committee, in view of the fact that he has an undoubted conflict of interest arising from the commission's report.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice. While, of course, I am cognizant of the fact that a broad range of groups associated with the airline industry have made certain representations to the government with respect to actions which they would like to see taken, the details requested by the honourable senator must be obtained from the Minister of Transport. They will be obtained as quickly as possible.

Senator Roblin: Perhaps I could add that the minister is correct in his statement about the representation of the industry. My questions were indeed based on the views they presented at that time. It is a particularly prestigious delegation representing that industry because it includes the Air Transport Association of Canada, Canadian Air Line Pilots' Association, Canadian Air Traffic Control Association, Aircraft Operations Group, Canadian Air Line Flight Attendants Association, Canadian Owners and Pilots Association, Canadian Air Line Dispatchers Association, l'Association des Gens de l'Air du Québec, and the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers.

I am sure that the government recognizes that these views must receive serious consideration. I would urge the minister to provide us with an answer as soon as he can.

AGRICULTURE

DROUGHT RELIEF PROGRAM ACTION BY SASKATCHEWAN CATTLE FARMERS

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question that I should perhaps put to the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, but I could perhaps put it to the minister responsible for economic development.

There is a report that the Saskatchewan cattle farmers have concluded that they have no alternative but to withhold their cattle—that is, in effect, to strike—because of alleged foot-dragging on the part of the federal government with respect to the 1980 drought relief payments. Could the minister indicate if he is prepared to accept this strike action on behalf of the cattle producers, or, alternatively, whether the government is proposing to announce payments to all those who believe they would be eligible for them?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, we do not, of course, comment on whether or not there is validity to this kind of action being taken by anyone. I can say, however, that payments were made on the basis of the criteria set out for eligibility, and this includes a very high percentage of the number of people claiming distress arising from the drought in 1980.

There are always cases along the border of the geographical area, or, indeed, along the border, if you like, of the criteria, which require examination by a review committee. That has been done, and those files are now in the hands of the departments responsible—namely, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, and the Department of Agriculture. Perhaps some modification has to be made to the rules in order to give a little more flexibility in these borderline cases.

I will try to obtain a report as to how many cases are left; but quite obviously we want to be fair, just and reasonable, and, as far as possible, to apply the criteria uniformly. My friend should realize, though, that there will always be problems in this kind of matter because of where you go from what is clearly a case within the qualifications to a case that is just slightly to one side. We want to be fair in this, too, but unfortunately there may be circumstances in which some rough justice has to be applied. We do want to try to be fair, though.

Senator Nurgitz: I wonder if the minister can assure us that every person clearly within the guidelines established by the government has been paid, and, consequently, that the statements being made by the Western Canada Cow-Calf Association are therefore totally in error, since there is a suggestion by that group that people within the guidelines have not been paid.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators know that anyone clearly within the guidelines has been paid. There are some people who thought they might be within the guidelines, but when the review board or the assessors looked over the applications perhaps they did not qualify for one reason or another. As my honourable friend knows, one of the criteria had to do with more than 50 per cent of normal precipitation falling during a certain period. The other had to do with harvesting more than 80 per cent of a normal crop during the period, which has been adjusted two or three percentage points—in fact, I think four percentage points—to try to accommodate that.

Therefore, I do not think there is anyone left who has not been paid who was clearly within the guidelines. However, there may be a few more who equally qualify but who, as he said, did not fall clearly within the guidelines as set out in the original application and the criteria related to it.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): May I ask a supplementary question of the minister? Is it true that there are some 3,000 cases now under review or appeal? If so, who is responsible for deciding those cases?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am not sure of the exact number of cases, but I would not be surprised if that were the number. The last time it was reported to me, I believe something like 22,000 applicants had been paid. There may be 2,000 or 3,000 cases outstanding, a figure generally in that area. I suppose that the minister will have to look at some modification, if we find that there are criteria which are disqualifying people who ought to be eligible, and make some change in those rules so that we can give instructions, if I may use that term, to Treasury Board to authorize payment.

Senator Roblin: I wonder if I could ask the minister to report to us, at his convenience, as to when these matters will be dealt with. After all, it is a long time since the event which concerns us occurred. The Minister of Agriculture—who, incidentally, left his blind calf back in Saskatchewan, I believe; it did not reach Ottawa—is reported to have admitted that the matter has been handled somewhat poorly by the federal government. I do not know whether or not my honourable friend would care to agree with that opinion, if it is correctly ascribed to the minister, as I think it is. However, I should like to know from him when these decisions will be made. Will he please provide us with a statement of the terms of reference under which these awards are made? Perhaps he could let us know how much money has been paid out.

Senator Olson: I can obtain some of those figures. I will give an undertaking now to do so. However, perhaps this is one case where I could publicly disagree with the Minister of Agriculture, if it is correct that he said the government has handled this matter somewhat poorly. I think the government did a magnificent job of handling the whole situation, which is the usual kind of delivery system we expect.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): That is Senator Flynn's favourite phrase.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): A magnificent job!

Senator Olson: I know that we were breaking new ground along the way, what with bringing in new personnel in an effort to respond to a very difficult situation. As a matter of fact—and Senator Roblin will appreciate this—when the drought was completely assessed in western Canada, some areas were found to be fairly clearly defined by weather patterns. However, many of the areas where some of these payments were made looked like a polka-dot arrangement, with regard to precipitation, because of some heavy showers that relieved the drought situation. That factor makes it particularly difficult to set down uniform criteria. I think that under all the circumstances it was handled rather well.

Senator Nurgitz: I have one final supplementary on that very topic. Would the minister also confirm for us whether, of the many cases heard by the government-established appeal board, there were roughly 3,000 cases in which the appeal board recommended payment on which no payment has been made to date?

Senator Olson: The appeal board might have recommended payment in a number of cases, and that number might be 3,000. I have already given an undertaking to get the numbers involved. However, I think, to be more precise, it meant that there should be some amendment made to the regulation so that payment could be made.

DART CONTAINER LINE—ACQUISITION OF INTEREST BY CANADIAN PACIFIC

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Leader of the Government with respect to events he may not be aware of taking place in Nova Scotia that have serious implications both for the province and the Port of Halifax. I am referring to the acquisition by Canadian Pacific of a one-third interest in the United States shipping company, Dart Container Line.

The result of that move might well be that Dart Container Line, which has been a mainstay of the transportation business in Halifax, will transfer its operations to the St. Lawrence and to Montreal. Obviously, Nova Scotians are greatly concerned about this, and the Canadian Transport Commission has been holding an inquiry into the matter with a view to determining the propriety of what is taking place.

My question relates to that hearing because, in the course of that hearing, on behalf of the Province of Nova Scotia there was subpoenaed to appear before the Canadian Transport Commission a gentleman by the name of Mr. Bandeen. You will all be familiar with that name and the official position he occupies. My question stems from the fact that Mr. Bandeen has refused point blank to respect the subpoena; he has refused to appear before the commission; he has refused to give evidence before the commission relating to the transaction, and has, in effect, thumbed his nose at the Province of Nova Scotia and the commission as well.

One might understand that, but the reason advanced as to why he did not appear was that the subpoena had no legal effect on Mr. Bandeen, having been issued in Nova Scotia and served on him in another jurisdiction, and that, therefore, he could, based on that legalistic excuse, ignore the hearing.

Does the government, which the honourable leader represents in this house, approve of that kind of conduct on the part of the leader of a crown corporation which holds itself out as serving the interests of all of the people of Canada and not only the people of one region?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the honourable senator mentioned at the outset of his questioning that Canadian Pacific had acquired partial ownership in the Dart company; he then mentioned Mr. Bandeen's name. Of course, Mr. Bandeen is President of the CNR, and I am unclear whether both the CNR and the CPR were involved in a CTC hearing. The honourable senator may wish to clarify that part of his remarks. However, may I say that the honourable senator appears to be seeking a legal opinion and that—

Senator Donahoe: No, no, not a legal opinion; merely an attitudinal opinion. What is the attitude of the government?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): You are supposed to ask for facts, not opinions or attitudes.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, there seems to be a hypothetical question raised here. I will, however, take the question as notice.

Senator Donahoe: It is not hypothetical about Mr. Bandeen's refusal.

Senator Perrault: I should like to take the question as notice. I am not in possession of a copy of any letters allegedly sent by Mr. Bandeen to the CTC. I am not in possession of the records of the hearings held before the CTC. Under the circumstances, it would be most unfair, for the Leader of the Government in the Senate, or, indeed, any senator to offer opinions on such a matter.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Unless they want to appear before the CTC.

Senator Perrault: But, honourable senators, an inquiry will go forward to the office of the Minister of Transport to obtain any information that may be available.

Senator Donahoe: Honourable senators, by way of a supplementary and in reply to the question, I should like to outline CN's position in this matter. CNR is a shareholder in some of these operations which are about to be transferred up the St. Lawrence, and there is no question about it. I did not include this fact in my opening remarks because I felt that someone would take exception and say that the nature of the question was argumentative or that I was entering into debate. I do not wish to enter into debate. I merely wish to know whether such conduct on the part of a head of a crown corporation meets with the approval of the government.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, is it fair for the honourable senator to parade before the Senate a number of allegations concerning a distinguished public servant of good reputation, and then to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether he approves of some alleged misconduct or lack of responsiveness on the part of that person? I do not have available to me a transcript of any of the remarks allegedly made by the public servant or any copies of the correspondence. In light of the honourable senator's record as a minister in a provincial government, I appeal to his sense of fair play. Surely the honourable senator does not expect a response from this side, at this time, on such a matter.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): To whom is he responsible, if not to you?

SASKATCHEWAN—REGINA AIRPORT EXPANSION

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, I direct my question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Will he ascertain whether the government has any intention of honouring the promises of three successive ministers of transport to undertake substantial work to expand the facilities at Regina Airport and, also, whether the so-called abbreviated proposal now before Treasury Board is considered an interim or stop-gap measure, or is it the ultimate or maximum that southern Saskatchewan can expect?

Senator Stuart: Hear, hear.

Senator Asselin: Now it is your turn, Senator Stuart.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Minister of Transport has developed a program to provide airport facilities in this country second to none. I must, however, take as notice the honourable senator's question because I do not have the information regarding the schedule of the improvements at the present time.

Senator Asselin: Senator Stuart has a supplementary.

ENERGY

NUCLEAR ENERGY—INTERDEPARTMENTAL REPORT

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, last evening Senator Murray raised a question concerning what he referred to as an inter-departmental report on nuclear development which, he said, had been leaked to the press or to someone.

I contacted the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, and they confirmed that they have completed the first draft of the nuclear industry review which is dated April 27, 1981. This draft has been distributed to various departments for their comment. Mr. Lalonde has not officially seen the report and, of course, would not agree to table it, even though parts of it have been leaked. Of course, we are not sure that it is a leak because such documents can never be confirmed as authentic. I am informed that officials of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources are drafting a report on the nuclear industry. My colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, does not expect to see a copy of this report until it has been completed. We would not, of course, table a report that has not been finalized and seen by the minister responsible.

EFFECT OF NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I have one other delayed answer in response to a question raised on May 20 by Senator Balfour which concerns the value of drilling equipment that has been exported from Canada.

According to Statistics Canada, in the first four months of 1981 equipment to the value of $97 million has been exported from Canada under the classification: "Earth drilling, earth boring and related machinery and parts not otherwise specified". That has to be compared with total exports of such equipment during the calendar year 1980 worth $94.8 million.

While the greatest percentage of equipment contained under this heading would be utilized in petroleum-related drilling, non-petroleum drilling equipment—that is, equipment used for drilling water wells—would also be included in this grouping. Of this $97 million-worth of exports, over $78 million-worth was exported to the United States, with the remainder destined elsewhere, including Australia and Ethiopia.

To attribute this increase in the export of this domestic drilling equipment solely to the National Energy Program would be inaccurate. The excess of the natural gas supply over demand in this country has resulted in a downturn in the drilling industry which some industry spokesmen have ascribed to the National Energy Program. However, long before the National Energy Program was unveiled, the Oil and Gas Journal quoted the executive director of the Canadian Association of Oilwell Drilling Contractors, who predicted that no more than 5,000 wells will be drilled in Canada in 1981 compared with 8,300 last year. That is a drop of 40 per cent, and that has nothing to do with the federal government's National Energy Program.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

CANERTECH—MANDATE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on May 20, Senator Sherwood asked why Canertech had not been given a precise mandate to assign budget priority to the pursuit of the most environmentally attractive alternative technologies.

I should like to refer to the remarks made by the Honourable Marc Lalonde on the occasion of the opening of the Canertech office in Winnipeg on May 12. At that time, he clearly stated that Canertech's mandate is:

—the commercialization of products and processes in conservation and renewable energy technologies.

Canertech Canada will concentrate on supporting commercial production of renewable energy and conservation technology, and it will reinforce the work of Canadian businesses engaged in this field by joint ventures and equity investments to fill the so-called "risk capital gap" and by offering other assistance in commercialization and marketing. This crown corporation may also enter into shared ventures with energy corporations established by provincial governments, or it may undertake commercial production on its own. Wherever necessary, the corporation will carry out research, development and demonstrations.

I think that the federal government's position relative to environmental protection is very well known and, in this regard, Canertech will place particular emphasis on such environmentally compatible projects as biomass energy conversion technology, and solar and wind energy systems.

May I say, additionally, honourable senators, that very soon dramatic new evidence will be presented to the Canadian people of the determination of this government to promote and to develop various forms of alternative energy in this country.

GOVERNMENT OF CANADA

PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES—VISITS TO UNITED KINGDOM

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): In response to Senator Molson's question regarding visits of parliamentary secretaries to the United Kingdom during the last two months, I am informed that over this period the following parliamentary secretaries have visited the United Kingdom on official government business:

Mr. Ron Irwin, Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General and Minister of State for Social Development;

Mr. Serge Joyal, Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board;

Mr. David Collenette, Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council;

Mr. John Evans, Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance; and Mr. Doug Frith, Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Each of these parliamentary secretaries was in the United Kingdom for official government business related to their onerous departmental responsibilities as parliamentary secretaries.

Senator Asselin: On Constitution business.

Senator Perrault: In addition, Mr. Joyal represented Mr. Chrétien at the seminar on the Constitution at All Soul's College, Oxford University. I am given to understand that he made a very constructive contribution to that meeting. Given his knowledge of the government's Constitution project from his co-chairmanship of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution, he was also, fortunately, available for meetings and discussions with British parliamentarians and members of the press to respond to questions about the project and to provide explanations as necessary. Of course, in Great Britain there is a lively interest in this entire process.

Senator Flynn: Indeed.

STRIKE BY FRANCOPHONE JOURNALISTS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I know that this will bring joy to the heart of the distinguished Leader of the Opposition—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): What heart?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I am willing to compete with Senator Frith.

Senator Frith: He'll get me for that one.

Senator Perrault: —when I inform him that there will be a meeting this afternoon involving the director of mediation and conciliation for the Department of Labour, the journalists of

[Senator Perrault.]

Syndicat National du Cinéma et de la Télévision and other representatives to endeavour again to find a solution to the long-standing dispute between the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and some of its journalists.

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, could the Leader of the Government tell us whether this meeting will be held in Montreal or Ottawa?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I spoke personally with the mediator just an hour ago, so I presume the meeting will be in Ottawa. As I have said, representatives of the Department of Labour will be directly involved in the discussions.

TRANSPORT

AIRLINES—SALE OF NORDAIR

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, could the Leader of the Government answer now the question I asked him last week concerning possible new developments with regard to the sale of Nordair shares, or could he report progress on the situation? Also, would he accept a motion calling for the whole matter to be referred to the Committee on Transport and Communications, so that the minister and other interested parties may be heard with a view to finding a solution?

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, an inquiry has gone forward but, as yet, I have not obtained the information requested by Senator Asselin. I was hopeful that we would have it today.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

LICENSING POLICY FOR FISHERMEN—COMPOSITION OF REVIEW AND APPEAL COMMITTEES

Question No. 58 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

1. In the formation of the licensing policy for fishermen under the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, what are the names of those individuals who comprise the first level review committee, viz. the four full-time fishermen, the independent person, and the representative from the Department in the Province of Newfoundland?

2. What are the names of those individuals who comprise that committee which deals with (i) second level appeals (ii) final level appeals?

Reply by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans:

1. DISTRICT 1 (ST. JOHN'S)

Committee 1:

Chairman: Thomas Best, Jr., Petty Harbour.

Independent Members: Thomas Griffiths, St. John's; John Moriarity, St. John's.

Fishermen: George E. Chafe, Petty Harbour; Joseph O'Leary, Trepassey; Peter Maher, Torbay; Gerard Chidley, Renew's; Alex Day, Portugal Cove; Charles Roberts, St. John's.

Committee 2:

Chairman: James Corcoran, Riverhead.

Independent Members: Robert Halleran, St. Mary's Bay; Kevin Larner, Whitbourne.

Fishermen: Raymond Caul, Placentia Bay; Cyril Gibbons, St. Vincent's, S.M.B.; Adrian Canning, Placentia Bay; Philip A. Dohey, St. Bridges, Placentia Bay; Eric Bolt, Arnold's Cove; Freeman Cramm, Fair Haven, Placentia Bay.

Committee 3:

Chairman: Samuel B. Anthony, Grates Cove, Trinity Bay.

Independent Members: Harry Green, Green's Harbour, Trinity Bay; Graham Bursey, Clarke's Beach, Conception Bay.

Fishermen: Ray Dalton, Harbour Main; Norman Harnum, New Harbour, Trinity Bay; Harry Strong, Old Perlican, Trinity Bay; John Temple, Sunnyside; Lester Petten, Port-de-Grave, Conception Bay; Harold Parsons, Carbonear, Conception Bay.

DISTRICT 2 (MARYSTOWN)

Committee 1:

Chairman: Eric Miller, Fortune, F.B.

Independent Member: Cecil Legge, Fortune, F.B.

Alternate Independent: Willard Senior, Red Harbour.

Fishermen: Earl Reid, Baine Harbour; Don Paul, Burin; Lorne Whittle, St. Bernards; John Slaney, St. Lawrence.

Alternate Member: Eli Pike, St. Lawrence.

Committee 2:

Chairman: Max Lambert, Southport.

Independent Member: Max Balsom, Clarendville.

Alternate Independent: Gus Mifflin, Clarendville.

Fishermen: Ralph Simms, Hickman's Harbour; George Brown, St. Jones Within; John March, Lower Lance Cove; Rick Jackman, Canning's Cove.

Alternate Member: Austin King, Hickman's Harbour.

Committee 3:

Chairman: Ivan Russell, Bonavista, B.B.

Independent Member: William Maidment, Catalina.

Fishermen: William J. Randell, Bonavista, B.B.; Henry T. Verge, Old Bonaventure; Roy Sweet, Catalina; Pius Snow, Summerville.

Alternate Member: Albert M. Johnson, Little Catalina.

Committee 4:

Chairman: Wilfred Bartlett, Brighton.

Alternate Chairman: Ernest Pittman, Beachside.

Independent Member: Arthur Thoms, LaScie.

Alternate Independent: Ford Paddock, Beaumont.

Fishermen: James Shelley, Fleur De Lys; Rudy Noble, Nippers Harbour.

Committee 5:

Chairman: Edison Easton, Noggin Cove.

Alternate Chairman: Cyril Dalley, Durrells.

Independent Member: Harold Starkes, Lewisporte.

Alternate Independents: David Ings, Virgin Arm; Fred Cooze, Hillgrade; Ford Rideout, Embree.

Fishermen: Calvin Waterman, Twillingate; Harris Clarke, Cottrell's Cove.

DISTRICT 3 (GRAND FALLS)

Committee 1:

Chairman: Morley Rowe, Seldom.

Alternate Chairman: Cyril Coles, Deep Bay.

Independent Member: Father Edward Brophy, Tilting.

Alternate Independents: Frank Harnett, Seldom; Maxwell Barnes, Joe Batt's Arm.

Fishermen: Dan Decker, Joe Batt's Arm; Lloyd Hart, Fogo.

Committee 2:

Chairman: James Matchim, Eastport, B.B.

Alternate Chairman: Kenneth Lane, St. Chads.

Independent Member: Lloyd Hatcher, Lumsden.

Alternate Independent: Eugene Moss, Happy Adventure.

Fishermen: Arthur Sturge, Valleyfield, B.B.; George Collins, Dover, B.B.

Committee 3:

Chairman: John Hollett, Harbour Breton.

Alternate Chairman: Eldred Bambury, Pool's Cove.

Independent Member: Kevin Verge, Hermitage.

Alternate Independents: Donald Wagner, Harbour Breton; Claude Fever, McCallum.

Fishermen: Guy Herritt, Sandyville; Wilfred Roberts, Hermitage.

DISTRICT 4 (GOOSE BAY)

Committee 1:

Chairman: Ricky Rumbolt, Mary's Harbour, Labrador.

Independent Members: Rev. Donald Fowler, Mary's Harbour, Labrador; Pastor L. Day, Charlottetown, Labrador; Mrs. L. Campbell, Charlottetown, Labrador.

Fishermen: Harrison Campbell, Pinsents Arm, Labrador; David Chubbs, St. Lewis, Labrador; Paul Pye, Lodge Bay, Labrador; Earl Stone, Charlottetown, Labrador.

Committee 2:

Chairman: Howard Mesher, Cartwright, Labrador.

Independent Members: Howard Fequet, Cartwright, Labrador; Helen Michelin, Rigolet, Labrador.

Committee 3:

Chairman: Toby Anderson, Makkovik, Labrador.

Independent Members: Rev. Father L. Paradis, Davis Inlet, Labrador; Sister Bosman, Davis Inlet, Labrador; Pastor Gillette, Postville, Labrador; Rev. R. Hunter, Nain, Labrador; Rev. L. Robinson, Makkovik, Labrador.

Fishermen: Chesley Flowers, Hopedale, Labrador; August Anderson, Nain, Labrador; Douglas Jacque, Postville, Labrador; Mervin Anderson, Makkovik, Labrador.

Committee 4:

Chairman: Wilson Gear, Happy Valley, Labrador.

Independent Member: Rev. Father Conway, Goose Bay, Labrador.

Fishermen: Rita Webber, Goose Bay, Labrador; John Webber, Goose Bay, Labrador; Cyril Michelin, Northwest River, Labrador; Richard Michelin, Northwest River, Labrador.

DISTRICT 5 (CORNER BROOK)

Committee 1:

Chairman: Dan Duffy, Port-au-Port.

Co-Chairman: Edgar Jones, Jacksons Arm.

Independent Members: Thomas McCarthy, Port-au-Port; Ike Davis, Port-aux-Basques; Rev. Edward King, Burgeo.

Committee 2:

Chairman: Clifford Doyle, New Ferrolle.

Co-Chairman: Asaph Payne, New Ferrolle.

Independent Member: Ralph Hoddinott, Brig Bay.

Fishermen: John Nedderson, Straitsview; Augustus Pynn, Quirpon; Gordon Parrell, Eddies Cove East; Garfield Way, Savage Cove.

Committee 3:

Chairman: Eric O'Brien, L'Anse-au-Loup.

Independent Member: Melvin Hancock, Forteau.

Fishermen: George Letto, L'Anse Au Clair; James Marshall, West Ste. Modeste; James Hudson, Jr., Pinware.

Although there were Departmental Co-ordinators to provide administrative assistance and advice on policies and procedures to the committees, these persons were not voting members of the committees.

2. (a) Committees which will deal with second level appeals have not yet been established.

(b) The final appeal is to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Austin, seconded by the Honourable Senator Goldenberg, for the second reading of the Bill S-11, intituled: "An Act to amend the Canada Elections Act".—(Honourable Senator Macdonald).

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I ask that this order stand until Senator Lamontagne has spoken to Orders No. 3 and 4.

Senator Asselin: Not again!

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, since Senator Macdonald accommodated me last evening, and is now extending the same courtesy to Senator Lamontagne, I think the Senate should recognize what a fine fellow he is.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You didn't have to wait until today to find that out.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): We already knew, but it was worthwhile verifying it.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Our whip is very popular.

Senator Flynn: Our own whip.

Order stands.

THE ESTIMATES

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on the estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1982, which was presented on June 10, 1981.

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: Honourable senators, I certainly support what Senator Everett has said, and I thank Senator Macdonald for his co-operation today.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I intend to make a fairly lengthy statement on our monetary policy, which may seem quite academic at times, and I certainly apologize for that at the outset.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Quite scholarly.

Senator Lamontagne: First of all, I want to congratulate Senator Everett on his vigilance as chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. In presenting the latest report of his committee last night, Senator Everett expressed several views which I share entirely, and this will become obvious as I proceed with my statement.

Senator Everett spoke as a Liberal and according to the dictates of his conscience, of that I have no doubt. I intend to follow his example, although my views will be completely opposed to his on one basic point, because I am firmly opposed to the present monetary policy. This difference of opinion will only serve to prove, once again, that it is possible and even normal to have differing views on specific points within a democratic party, and that one does not have to seek refuge in an isolated corner of this chamber to live with one's conscience and to defend one's personal convictions.

Senator Asselin: To defend our point of view.

[English]

Senator Lamontagne:

MONETARY POLICY ON TRIAL

In recent years, monetary policy has become one of our most controversial subjects. The conversion of the Bank of Canada to monetarism in 1975 was seen by many people as a novel experiment. This so-called new theory, in its simple form, merely reaffirms the old proposition that inflation results from too many dollars chasing too few goods. Therefore, the remedy, is obvious. The growth of the money supply has to be reduced and the level of interest rates must be increased. Recent years have shown quite clearly that the medicine, even applied at high doses, does not work in today's world. But we are told to be patient, that inflation has become chronic, and it will take more time and more doses before the patient is cured.

I, like many others, do not share this belief. Monetarism is new only in name. It is an old prescription that has failed in the past when it has been applied to conditions such as ours. This was the case in the late 1950s. In an article published in 1960, Nobel Prize winner Professor Paul A. Samuelson presented the following report card for the U.S. monetary authorities:

—the performance of the Federal Reserve over the last few years, its laboratory work so to speak, would rate only a B; the Fed's rationalization of what it is doing, its essay questions, earn for it, I fear, a bare gentleman's C.

If I were making my own report card for the Bank of Canada today, I would give it a D for its performance because, as I will claim later, its remedy is applied to the wrong disease, but I would give it an A for the rationalization of what it is doing because the arguments it has used for its justification have convinced an impressive number of people, including two consecutive Canadian governments.

Before I deal specifically with current monetary policy, I would like to review recent economic trends and to make a distinction between demand-pull inflation and supply-push inflation because this distinction, in my view, is absolutely essential to an understanding of what is happening today.

Stagflation and Demand-Pull Inflation

The industrialized countries of the western world experienced a long period of economic growth and stability between 1950 and 1970. Towards the end of the 1960s, this rapid and sustained growth was perceived as normal. In 1970, for instance, the Economic Council of Canada was urging the government to abandon its role as a "balance wheel" in the economy because it was thought that serious slowdowns were something of the past.

The 1970s caught most observers by surprise. A recession in 1970 was followed by a boom, then by a more severe recession in 1974-75, a mild recovery and another recession in 1979-80. In spite of these three rather serious downturns in a decade, high inflation persisted throughout the 1970s; the consumer price index rose by 113 points during these 10 years, compared with only 34 points during the preceding 20 years.

A new word, "stagflation", that was mentioned by Senator Everett yesterday, was invented to characterize this paradoxical situation. For the conventional wisdom, the new expression represented really a contradiction in terms. Indeed, it claimed that there was only one type of inflation, namely demand-pull inflation, caused by an excessive effective demand and an overheated economy, accompanied by a rapid expansion of the money supply. Hence, persistent rising prices could not coincide with stagnation and excess productive capacity. In its puzzlement, the conventional wisdom explained the inflation that took place in the first part of the 1970s as a temporary consequence of so-called "accidental" factors such as crop failures and the oil embargo.

These unusual events certainly had a significant impact at that time, but stagflation had existed before and has survived since. It was detected, for instance, during the major economic slowdown of 1957-1961 when prices continued to rise although at a slower rate. The same phenomenon re-appeared with more vehemence during the 1970-1971 recession. As the 1970s unrolled, prices became more and more insensitive to economic downturns. During the 1950-1975 period, the average annual increase in real GNP exceeded 5 per cent; yet prices were relatively stable during that period. Since 1975, the annual increase in real GNP has averaged only 2.5 per cent, which is significantly below the potentialities of the Canadian economy, but the consumer price index rose by 72 points.

More recent figures reveal the same situation which worried Senator Everett last evening. During the last recession of 1979-80, the consumer price index continued to climb at an accelerated rate: 8.9 per cent in 1978, 9.1 per cent in 1979, 10.2 per cent in 1980, and 12.3 per cent last month. But in the last two years, unemployment stood at about 7.5 per cent. In 1980, real GNP rose by only 0.1 per cent, the worst performance since 1954. In that same year, housing starts in centres of 10,000 population and more fell to 125,013 units, compared with an annual average of 184,208 in the 1970s. Last month, housing starts stood at 168,000 units, on a seasonally-adjusted annual rate basis, compared to more than 209,000 in 1976, when the rate of inflation was relatively low. In the last three quarters of 1980, and in the first quarter of 1981, capacity-utilization rates in manufacturing industries were below 80 per cent. Our merchandise trade surplus, which was exceptionally high, on a seasonally-adjusted basis, in the last quarter of 1980, dropped by about $1 billion to $1.7 billion in the first quarter of 1981. In March 1981 industrial production in Canada and in the U.S. had not yet reached its previous cyclical peak level of October 1979.

In spite of these figures, it is true that the Canadian economy is now on the road to recovery, but forecasters claim that the increase in real GNP will not exceed 2 per cent in 1981, which compares favourably only against the very poor performance of 1980.

The conclusion to be derived from these observations is obvious: contrary to the views expressed by the Bank of Canada, the rapid rise in prices experienced in recent years cannot be explained by an overheated economy and strong demand pressures. More generally, while I recognize that demand-pull inflation has occurred during rather brief intervals in the last 35 years, I claim it cannot account for the accelerating long-term trend of rising prices that has developed, more particularly since the late 1960s.

Supply-Push Inflation

Many economists who do not accept the conventional wisdom have identified another type of inflation, which they have described as cost-push or supply-push. It can be defined as an increase in consumer prices resulting from cost or profit increases generated by the exercise of monopoly power or, more generally, by a regime of administered prices. This concept is not new. It was used, for instance, by Fritz Machlup in an article entitled "Another View of Cost-Push and Demand-Pull Inflation" published in 1960. Professor Machlup, who is of Austrian origin and has taught in the United States for many years, stated:

I believe that for an explanation of the consumer-price inflation from 1945 to 1948, and from 1950 to 1952, the basic model of the demand-pull inflation does as well, or better than, any of the other models, simple or complicated. On the other hand, for the period 1955-59, . . . I am prepared to regard the consumer-price increases of these four years as a result of cost-push inflation.

It is surprising that the phenomenon of supply-push inflation has not yet been more widely recognized. Microeconomic theory since Adam Smith has shown that, contrary to the abstract model of perfect competition, individual suppliers of goods and services enjoying a monopolistic position, or members of a cartel arrangement, can disrupt the free market mechanism and can, for instance, increase their prices even without a rise in demand, especially if those suppliers are prepared to reduce production and employment. The automobile industry, we all know, goes on increasing its prices, reacting to a fall in demand by cutting production. Three-year labour contracts provide for rising wage rates and cost-of-living adjustments irrespective of demand conditions. Cost-plus and mark-up pricing are widespread practices in the retail business and in other sectors of the economy.

The postwar period has witnessed the accelerated rise of monopolistic power, often supported by government policies, and the diffusion of practices enabling suppliers to control their prices at least within a certain range. Industrial concentration intensified throughout the period, but has accelerated in recent years. The trade union movement became much stronger. Marketing boards and government stabilization programs have multiplied to strengthen the position of agricultural producers. OPEC and other international cartel arrangements have deeply changed the market structure of various commodities.

Demand-pull inflation is cyclical and, therefore, temporary. Supply-push inflation is structural and, therefore, when it appears, is permanent, unless, of course, the structure of the economy is changed. That is why this second kind of inflation is so worrying. Because it pushes prices up and restrains production and employment, it is the only type of inflation that is compatible with a stagnating economy. Indeed, it is an important cause of stagflation. I claim that it has been the main culprit, rather than demand-pull inflation, during most of the 1970s. This is still true today. In my view, therefore, the Governor of the Bank of Canada has been making and is still making the wrong diagnosis of our price situation when he persists, as he did in his recent annual reports and again when he appeared before the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on May 26, in describing that situation as demand-pull generated by an overheated economy. He said before the Senate committee:

I think the economy is not that far off being as close to potential as it should be. There are some weak spots . . . If you take that out you will find that the economy is very hard pressed in many areas of the country.

With such statements, as the bank continues to apply the wrong remedy, it is in serious danger, in my view, of completely losing its credibility.

Current Monetary Policy and the Two Types of Inflation

Before assessing in greater detail the soundness of the bank's current policy in the context of the domestic economy, it is useful to recall how monetary policy, in general, operates to influence economic activity and its price parameters. Monetary policy is designed to influence aggregate demand or over-all spending. It can do so, however, only by affecting new domestic borrowings and savings. A tight money supply can reduce the flow of new funds needed by potential borrowers. High interest rates increase the cost of new borrowings but can also stimulate savings. Monetary policy is much more blunt and limited in scope than fiscal policy which can have a selective impact on all types of spending.

Moreover, the influence of monetary policy on the supply and demand of credit is not necessarily definitive. A reduction in the money supply can be fully or partially compensated by an increase in the velocity of circulation, which always occurs under tight money conditions. There is no doubt that the turnover of money has been rising rapidly with the recent emphasis on shorter term loans. High interest rates are intended to cut spending by increasing the cost of borrowing and reducing the demand for credit; but, especially in an economy characterized by monopolistic power, suppliers can simply shift the higher cost of money to consumers in the form of increased prices.

When this happens, as it does on a large scale today, unduly high interest rates feed inflation instead of combating it, in spite of Mr. Bouey's claim before the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance that "this proposition will not stand critical examination any better than the common-sense proposition that the world is flat because it looks flat." What the governor of the bank does not see is that, under tight money conditions, the higher prices generated by the rising cost of borrowing by suppliers can be maintained by the use of market power, and force consumers, if necessary, to reduce their over-all spending in real terms, thus producing a further depressed economy but with a higher price structure.

The governor of the bank went on to say to the members of the committee:

No proposition in economics is more certain than that a move of the bank to allow significantly higher rates of monetary expansion in an effort to lower short-term interest rates would increase the rate of inflation.

This proposition would be valid, of course, under conditions of demand-pull inflation; but I could refer to other circumstances in which it is definitely not valid. How is it, for instance, that the bank rate was reduced by about 33 per cent in mid-year 1980 without any visible effect on the consumer price index?

Nevertheless, there is a general consensus among economists that a tight money policy has a depressing effect on the economy and that it properly belongs in our arsenal of weapons with which to fight over-all excessive demand and demand-pull inflation. We should also expect, however, that monetary policy should be much less restrictive during recessions, and when the performance of the economy is below its potentialities, as it is today.

I would like to add, however, that even under conditions of demand-pull inflation, fiscal policy should be our main weapon because it can be more effective and more balanced than monetary policy, which has a particularly unfair impact on certain specific economic sectors such as housing, small business and durable consumer goods.

Extreme tight money can, of course, choke the economy. Applied within more or less tolerable limits, it has little effect on supply-push inflation, as we can see today. It is the wrong tool to use under such conditions. It has no direct impact on the price of imports. It has no significant effect on the conservation of energy or on the administered price of oil. Its downward influence on the price of food is minimal. It certainly curtails residential construction, but by contributing to an increase in the price of new homes and the housing shortage, it makes shelter more expensive. If one looks at the consumer price index, broken down by goods and services, it becomes obvious that the sector of non-durable goods has been the most responsible for the rise in the total index, but there is not much that monetary policy can do in this area.

More generally, under conditions of supply-push inflation, demand management policies are ineffective. Tight money, like restrictive fiscal policy, cannot effectively curb this type of inflation. It can even worsen the situation. Indeed, when the economy operates below its potentialities, tight money can intensify supply-push inflation, or further depress the economy or, more likely, it can have both effects, thus contributing to more stagflation. I fully share the bank's concern about rapidly rising prices. I maintain, however, that the weapon it is using under present circumstances does more harm than good, as the experiment conducted during the last six years clearly shows.

Monetary policy should, in the long run, provide an adequate money supply to satisfy the needs of the economy at moderate rates of interest compatible with a proper level of savings, and, in the short term, monetary policy should stimulate the economy when it is depressed and curb demand-pull inflation when the economy is overheated. In other words, monetary policy should be neutral in the long term and anti-cyclical in the short run.

Ultimately, of course—and Senator Everett referred to this yesterday—if we want our economy to reach its full potentialities without causing inflation, we will have to improve productivity and launch, at last, a general industrial strategy with specific goals by sectors. Canada, with its great dependence on external trade, cannot afford to stay behind in the so-called international technological race.

THE CANADIAN DOLLAR AND THE WORLD MONETARY JUNGLE

On reflection, I believe that the bank's conversion to monetarism has been more apparent than real, and that it has been less than candid with the Canadian people. The bank, in my view, cannot be convinced that tight money will lick supply-push inflation and the so-called inflation psychology. It is pursuing its current policy for another more compelling reason. In his presentation to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, Mr. Bouey made the following intriguing remarks:

With respect to Bank of Canada responsibility, looking over the current situation one could say, if one wanted, that it would be nice if events in the United States had evolved differently and the Americans were not now experiencing such high and volatile interest rates... However, saying what would be nice doesn't get you very far. It is always necessary to look forward, to focus on what can in fact be done in the light of the conditions that prevail. . . . The Bank has to use its powers in the world as it finds it, and to face up squarely to the implications of what it finds there for the integrity of the nation's money.

I interpret these remarks, which followed the governor's sermon on the domestic necessity of tight money, as meaning that if the Americans were not experiencing such high and volatile interest rates, Canada could then have a decent monetary policy. I must admit that there is more truth in this observation than there is in the sermon on inflation. In other words, Canada must pursue more or less the same monetary policy as the United States if it wants to maintain the external value of the Canadian dollar; Canada must follow suit even if the U.S. policy is silly and mistaken.

This close relationship is easy to understand. Canada has a chronic deficit mainly with the United States in the current account of its balance of international payments. To compensate for this deficit while preventing our exchange rate from falling, we must import foreign capital. In order to attract this capital, interest rates in Canada must be higher than those in the United States. We are obliged, therefore, to reproduce the vagaries of U.S. monetary policy, unless we are prepared to let the exchange rate of the Canadian dollar go down.

Most other countries are subjected to the same aberrations because the U.S. dollar is still in a dominant position as an international unit of exchange, more particularly because oil is priced in this currency. At the recent meeting of the International Monetary Fund, hard-pressed countries of the Third World protested violently against U.S. tight money policy because it is leaving them on the verge of bankruptcy. I am sure that this topic will be high on their priority list when the North-South dialogue is renewed. In his last visit to Washington, Chancellor Schmidt made similar protests. In an article dated June 1, 1981, entitled "U.S. Monetarism Scares Europe," Business Week claimed that European central bankers were sounding the alarm:

They are warning publicly and privately that the current system of U.S. monetary control is a prescription for disaster because they believe it guarantees interest-rate volatility. They believe the Federal Reserve Board is attempting in vain to control monetary measures, such as M1-B, that are inherently unstable. Each time these measures fly off track—and Europeans believe they will regularly—world financial markets will defensively trigger new interest-rate shocks. They thus see no chance for the Fed to bridge its huge credibility gap with Wall Street, and they believe that the current round of high rates—U.S. banks pushed the prime to 20 per cent on May 18—is only the latest, not the last, for this year.

The Bretton Woods Agreements reached at the end of World War II were based on an adjustable-peg exchange system that produced a fairly stable monetary order during the post-war period. This order was seriously shaken in August 1971, when President Nixon suspended the dollar's gold convertibility, and it was completely destroyed by 1973 when all major OECD countries had adopted a managed floating rate. This new system, which provided an incentive to "beggar-thy-neighbour" policies, replaced the former world monetary order by a jungle that led, with the spreading of the monetarist dogma, to an international spiral of interest rates.

Recently, European countries, suffering from a serious recession, high unemployment and political instability, found that they could not follow the United States in the international interest-rates war. The European Monetary System had to accept a depreciation of up to 30 per cent against the dollar since last summer and growing balance-of-payments deficits. The rising dollar has pushed the cost of oil imports up to 30 per cent for many of these countries in spite of a softening in the world market.

According to an article in the June 8 edition of Business Week:

After spending nearly $11 billion in eight weeks to bolster the French franc, the Deutschemmark, and other Continental currencies, many European central bankers are resigning themselves to the fact that tighter monetary policy—meaning higher interest rates and even slower growth—is the only option left to stop their money from sliding.

Thus, if the United States persists in leading the race to disaster, European countries will have no choice but to renew the interest-rates war at a time when their unemployment is 35 per cent higher than last year. The economic and political consequences of such a move could be dramatic indeed.

• (1510)

In Canada the bank could lower its rate and let the Canadian dollar further depreciate as the Europeans have been doing. Recently the bank rate has been about 30 per cent higher than the Fed's discount rate. This differential is, therefore, substantial. Mr. Bouey has estimated that a 1 per cent decline in the exchange rate would cause consumer prices to rise by roughly 0.3 per cent. This negative effect, in my view, would certainly be more than compensated for by the benefits that a decline in the exchange rate resulting from lower interest rates would bring to the Canadian economy. A decline in the exchange rate would stimulate exports and discourage imports. Lower interest rates would have a beneficial effect throughout the economy. A satisfactory agreement on Canadian oil prices and on a new national energy policy would greatly help reduce our balance of payments deficit, strengthen the Canadian dollar and therefore make us less dependent on the vagaries of U.S. monetary policy.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Lamontagne: Our freedom to manoeuvre in respect of this whole range of policies, however, is rather limited. As Canadians, we should add our efforts to those of others who are now trying to convince the American authorities that they are pursuing a monetary policy contrary to their best interests as well as to those of other industrialized countries and of the Third World. The least the Bank of Canada can do is to stop proclaiming the virtues of monetarism at home and join with others in denouncing its disastrous consequences in Washington. The monetarist dogma is too simplistic to fit the complexities of our present monetary problems. Recently, President Reagan promised Chancellor Schmidt that U.S. interest rates would come down later in 1981. We, as Canadians, should try to make sure that that undertaking will be respected. But even such a move in the right direction will not be good enough.

What the industrialized world desperately needs as a matter of the highest priority, not only in its own interest but as an essential requirement for a meaningful North-South dialogue, is to build a new world monetary order to replace the present jungle. Canada and its prime minister, as hosts to the forthcoming economic summit, have a wonderful opportunity to initiate the difficult process that is required to attain such a goal. We should not expect, of course, that the economic summit will in a few days launch this new monetary order. It could, however, after a general discussion of the issue, assign this task in its complex technical aspects to an international group of experts. If that is done, it is not unrealistic to expect that in 1983 we could celebrate the 50th anniversary of the Economic Conference held in Washington in 1933 by laying, as was done then, the foundation of a new world monetary order that could, I hope, last for the remainder of this century.

THE FIGHT AGAINST SUPPLY-PUSH INFLATION

I would like, finally, to refer to the fight against supply-push inflation. Before I do, however, I want to say that the Bank of Canada, in its recent statements, has not been really fair with its opponents. When he appeared before the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, Mr. Bouey referred to those people who say, "Yes, of course, we must deal with inflation, but first let somebody devise a painless way of doing it." He continued, "Then there are others who say it will be easier to learn to live with inflation than to arrest it."

I do not know those people to whom Mr. Bouey referred. The people I know, who, like me, are opposed to the bank's current policies, are all deeply concerned with inflation. They do not believe that we should learn to live with it, and they do not claim that we should wait to fight it until a painless cure has been found. They are convinced that tight money will not cure supply-push inflation, and they are afraid that if monetary policy is used for that purpose, as it is today, it will lose its credibility and it will not be able to play its essential long-term and anticyclical roles. Such a misuse of monetary policy will not only leave structural inflation unchecked but will create another unfortunate gap in our arsenal of weapons to promote greater economic stability. With its present tight money policy, what could the Bank of Canada do if the Canadian economy became overheated in the months to come? Would it dare, for instance, to further increase its rate to perhaps 30 per cent?

A growing number of observers who still support tight money agree that it does not work against the kind of inflation we have been experiencing in recent years. But they hasten to ask: What is the alternative? My immediate answer is: If the present cure does not work or, more likely, if it makes the patient worse, then the first step must be to stop using it, even if there is no adequate alternative remedy for the disease.

I regret that we have devoted little research effort to finding alternative cures and that our approach to this challenge has been more negative than positive; we have been more inclined to reject proposals than to improve them when possible. I am realistic enough to know that there is no foolproof, simple and easy solution for structural or supply-push inflation. But I am not prepared to give up the search: I am like those who persist in trying to improve cancer treatment.

The disease of structural inflation has spread throughout the western world, including the United States, with varying degrees of virulence. Canada, with its great dependence on external trade, cannot cope adequately with this problem by going it alone. There is not much we can do about import prices without international co-operation, more particularly co-operation with the United States. This topic, therefore, should also have a high priority on the agenda of the economic summit in July.

Our great reliance on external trade does not mean, however, that there is nothing we can do on our own against structural inflation. But here again we are facing some constraints. For instance, energy prices are largely determined by public authorities; but, whether we like it or not, they will continue to go up, although conservation and conversion from oil may help.

Some people believe that government deficits have been the major cause of inflation. I am glad to note that Senator Everett does not share that view. As he observed yesterday evening, we have experienced rising prices in the past—during the 1974 recession, for instance—with substantial surpluses. Government deficits can, of course, cause demand-pull inflation if they occur when the economy is operating at full capacity and if government borrowing exerts strong pressures on money markets. But such conditions have not existed in recent years. This does not mean that governments should not try to cut their expenditures and their taxes, but this is not an appropriate time, in my view, to have a restrictive fiscal policy designed to substantially reduce the budgetary deficit. Drastic action should be taken, however, to eliminate unnecessary government regulations. A recent study published by the Economic Council of Canada claims that such a move would represent annual savings of several billion dollars.

The existence and the use of market power in many sectors of the economy have been the major cause of supply-push inflation. A more vigorous competition policy could slow down the spreading of market power by preventing mergers and takeovers that are not compatible with the public interest. But a realistic policy in this area faces definite limitations. Industrial concentration has distinct advantages. Labour unions, agricultural marketing boards and producers' co-operatives are here to stay.

A more realistic goal is to prevent the irresponsible use rather than the existence of market power. In a free society, the ideal means of achieving this objective is self-restraint through voluntary co-operation between the different economic agents. This approach has produced very good results in such countries as West Germany where restraint has been achieved through regular discussions between the government, the central bank, labour unions, employers' associations and an independent group of economists.

This system of voluntary co-operation, however, requires a high degree of consensus that does not exist in factious societies. It was tried in Canada before the imposition of controls in 1975 and it failed. But this failure is not a sufficient reason for not trying again. Too much is at stake for not making another and better planned attempt at launching a successful dialogue.

The climate may now be more favourable than it was in 1974. There is much more evidence today that structural inflation has become chronic and that demand-management policies cannot effectively cope with it except by choking the economy. Moreover, the participants in the dialogue would know this time that if they do not accept voluntary co-operation, the Canadian government can and might impose wage and price controls.

In 1974 negotiations were conducted by the federal government only in secret and on a bi-partite basis with the provinces, business groups or organized labour. This approach is not sufficient. I would propose, therefore, that a Canadian economic summit be held early next fall with participants representing the main sectors of the economy, including the provinces, of course, and with a powerful secretariat composed of a small group of independent experts. The main purpose of this meeting would be to get the participants to agree on the principle of voluntary co-operation and on the mechanisms and the institutional arrangements required to apply it.

If voluntary co-operation is not accepted and if we are all really serious about the necessity of controlling inflation, then the government will have to intervene more directly, and its choices will be rather limited. Government guidelines will not work under such circumstances and the rolling-back of unfair price increases is too limited.

The concept of a tax-based incomes policy, identified by the acronym TIP, represents a more direct and comprehensive method of curbing the use of market power. Senator Everett referred to this concept last evening. As originally proposed by Sidney Weintraub and Henry Wallich, now a Federal Reserve governor, and as recently described by Weintraub:

TIP contemplates an extra corporate income tax, say of 5 per cent, on firms whose average pay hike—including executive, managerial, clerical and production employees—exceeded a guideline of perhaps 5 per cent a year. The surtax could be designed along progressive lines . . . Also, to ensure that corporate income tax revenues were not raised in the aggregate, and total investment capital from retained earnings eroded, the ordinary corporate tax bite of, say, 45 per cent could be cut initially to 40 per cent. Hence the total tax intake would not be increased.

The scheme would apply only to the largest employers. Variations from this original proposal can be envisaged to take productivity gains, profits or even prices into account. Weintraub concludes:

Others may be able to improve on the TIP ideas, or arrange them in a new pattern. But the crucial point is that unless we curb unreasonable income increases, our economies are destined for perpetual anguish.

The ultimate recourse is wage and price controls. Senator Everett did not express great confidence in such controls and he is not alone in that view. Indeed, nobody likes controls. Those who are directly affected by them, because they detain market power, much prefer inflation or tight money because they are quite immune from either. But when collective irresponsibility prevails over voluntary co-operation, controls may become necessary if more direct methods of intervention fail. If we are really serious about fighting structural inflation, we must apply a structural remedy. Moreover, as Kenneth Galbraith asserted recently:

No market principles are violated when the state moves in to fix those prices that, as the product of industrial concentration, are already fixed.

It is obvious that the controls imposed in 1975 have prevented the most abusive uses of market power. If we must resort to them again, I hope that the government will profit from that experience and not repeat the mistakes that were made during the implementation of that program. But the fact that prices have risen faster after it ended should not be used as an argument against it. As Galbraith said recently:

It is not a case against controls that prices rise when you do not have them.

Mr. Bouey himself has recognized, at least implicitly, that it might be necessary to fight supply-push inflation by specific policies other than monetary policy. He said before the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance that "a host of more specific policies affecting the way that individuals, businesses, trade unions and others operate in the market place" might be used in conjunction with appropriate monetary and fiscal policies. Unfortunately, he did not elaborate on what these more specific policies might be.

CONCLUSION

It is surprising to see that monetarism has gained so much acceptance in our so-called sophisticated world because, as an economic doctrine, it is fundamentally as simplistic as social credit. Major Douglas was saying: Print more money and you will get full employment. Professor Friedman tells us: Print less money and you will have price stability.

Unfortunately, we live in a complex world where market power is spreading and where powerful factions of suppliers of goods and services are fighting against each other to get a larger slice of a shrinking pie. This is at least one of the important dimensions of economic reality that monetarism has failed to see. In such a world, even with no increase in the money supply, we can still have inflation but with a depressed economy which means that the weak suffer from both while the powerful are immune.

Today, we are still faced with "stagflation." To bring our economy and those of the rest of the western world closer to their potentialities, we need a much less restrictive monetary policy. We should begin immediately to reduce interest rates in Canada, even if U.S. monetary authorities continue to apply their mistaken policy. The negative effect that such a move would have on import prices would certainly be more than compensated by the benefits that a decline in the exchange rate resulting from lower interest rates would bring to the Canadian economy.

But the only effective way to get a sensible monetary policy on a more permanent basis is to convince other industrialized countries, mainly the United States, to abandon monetarism and to begin, at the next economic summit to be held in Ottawa next July, the building of a new world monetary order to replace the present jungle and the futile but alarming international interest-rate war.

While restraint on public expenditures accompanied, if possible, by tax cuts is most desirable, this is not the time to launch a restrictive fiscal policy. In Canada, more particularly, we need a consensus on a new energy policy as a matter of high priority and especially a satisfactory agreement on oil prices as soon as possible so as to stimulate investment, reduce our balance-of-payments deficit and make our monetary policy more independent from the United States.

The fight against supply-push or structural inflation is equally imperative. Here again, especially for Canada, international co-operation, mainly with the United States, is required. On the domestic front, voluntary co-operation among the main decision-makers represents, by far, the ideal cure against the unjustified use of market power. The government should try again, in spite of past failures, to obtain such co-operation and, for this purpose, call a Canadian economic summit for early next fall. If no consensus is reached, then the government should not hesitate to resort to some form of tax-based incomes policy and, ultimately, to selective wage and price controls. Such drastic measures may be necessary if we are really serious about combating structural inflation and if we are irresponsible enough, collectively, not to curb it on a voluntary basis. A more vigorous competition policy and the elimination of unnecessary government regulations would also help in restoring free market forces.

Present economic trends cannot continue. The monetarists, after six years of trial and error, still tell us to wait and to be patient. But we already know that even excessive restraint in monetary growth cannot cure "stagflation"; it can only make it worse. "Stagflation" must be fought on two separate fronts at the same time, but not with the same policies. Starting in July, the Canadian government has a wonderful opportunity to initiate this two-dimensional approach. This is the time to initiate a new economic policy.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, before we adjourn, I should like to ask a question of Senator Lamontagne.

[Translation]

Honourable Senator Lamontagne, first of all, I want to congratulate you on your outstanding presentation. I share several of the views you have expressed. However, there is one point on which I should like to have your opinion. You believe Canada could in fact lower its bank rates, at the risk of bringing down the Canadian dollar, which would be good for exports. So, how do we deal with the major argument put forward by the Bank of Canada and those in agreement with it that Canada should have roughly the same high interest rates as the United States? They also claim that should the interest rate be 5 or 6 per cent lower in Canada than in the States, investors would still lend their money down south, that nothing would keep them from doing so because they would not be penalized on the profits made. How would you deal with that particular argument?

Senator Lamontagne: What I tried to indicate in my remarks was that, in that connection, Canada has some leeway, granted, but it is still very limited so that I really see no real or permanent solution in that direction.

That is why I quickly went on to the international scene, to the real cause of the problem, that is, Washington.

Senator Asselin: You mean that you barely touched upon the main problem.

[English]

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I also should like to pose a question to Senator Lamontagne. I listened very carefully to his learned dissertation. However, I was out of the chamber for a few moments. I should like to follow up on some pertinent and important questions put by Senator Murray last night.

What does Senator Lamontagne believe the unemployment rate should be in this country in order to attack inflation? He may have dealt with that during the few moments I was out of the chamber, but, if not, I should like to hear his opinion on that.

Senator Lamontagne: Contrary to what I have called "conventional wisdom", I do not see fighting inflation by increasing unemployment as a wise policy.

Senator Muir: I am happy to hear the honourable senator say that. He, therefore, does not agree with Senator Everett, the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, who seems to think that an unemployment rate of six to seven per cent would be a great assistance.

I did not want to delay the Senate last night, since I thought Senator Murray did very well and received some terrible answers. Last night Senator Everett stated:

People can be unemployed at their option.

He also made mention of the fact that very often two members of a family, or more, are working.

Honourable senators, overnight I contemplated the fact that the rate of unemployment in Cape Breton Island is 20 per cent, and in the maritime provinces and Quebec it is much higher than six or seven per cent. Surely Senator Everett is living in an unreal world, and he should familiarize himself with what is, in fact, happening.

Does Senator Lamontagne agree with Senator Everett's comments, and was Senator Everett speaking on behalf of the government? On the one hand, Senator Everett states that people can be unemployed at their option and, on the other hand, he says that he is not trying to be cruel or ignore the plight of people who are unemployed. He also stated that six to seven per cent unemployment is probably as low as it is reasonable to expect.

However, in a small island such as Cape Breton, there are over 3,000 applicants for work with the Cape Breton Development Corporation alone. Those are men who are eager to get work in the coal mines. The same situation prevails with applications for employment in the steel mills in Sydney and throughout Quebec, excluding the metropolitan area.

Does Senator Lamontagne agree with the statements of Senator Everett and was he pronouncing government policy that the unemployment rate should be six or seven per cent?

Senator Lamontagne: I believe that the honourable senator is, perhaps unconsciously, misinterpreting what Senator Everett meant. I think he was answering a question that was posed by Senator Murray, and he started by referring to the definition by economists of "full employment" immediately after World War II when most economists were agreeing that a rate of unemployment of about 3 per cent corresponded to what we could call "full employment." He went on to say that since the post-war period things had changed drastically, and he listed a number of factors to show that what corresponds to the 3 per cent then may be significantly higher today. I am quite sure that Senator Everett would agree with me and with Senator Muir that a rate of employment in the region of 15 to 20 per cent is really intolerable.

● (1540)

Senator Muir: Honourable senators, I thank the honourable gentleman for his fine answer, and I agree with him that it is completely intolerable. I also thank him for trying to get Senator Everett out of the mess he has got himself into, because I would like to invite Senator Everett down to Nova Scotia and take him into the areas where the unemployment rate is 20 per cent, and he can then tell them that 7 per cent is wonderful.

Senator Lamontagne: You should take him fishing; it would be much more amusing.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I think it is fair to conclude from what Senator Everett said last evening that he feels an unemployment rate of 6 or 7 per cent could represent full employment.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Everett said that he agreed with Governor Bouey when he said that.

[Senator Muir.]

Senator Murray: Senator Frith says that in saying that Senator Everett was agreeing with the Governor of the Bank of Canada. That may be so.

The observation I want to make is that the experts cannot seem to agree whether we are operating now at our potential in economic terms or whether, in fact, there is a great deal of slack in the economy. Senator Everett, in answer to a question asked following his speech, indicated that 6 or 7 per cent represented reasonably full employment and he said earlier that the economy is functioning considerably below potential. He also indicated that the relatively rapid rate of growth in the first quarter of this year was really an aberration and that everybody expects activity to slow down considerably.

The Governor of the Bank of Canada not only thinks that we are functioning very close to potential, but that the potential itself is very low. Although the governor of the bank says the difference is more apparent than real, I read the Department of Finance as indicating that, in fact, we are operating considerably below potential.

What is Senator Lamontagne's view of the state of the Canadian economy at the moment? Are we functioning considerably below potential, or are we in a situation close to full employment?

Senator Lamontagne: The first part of my speech dealt very clearly with that subject. I am convinced that at the moment our economy is operating well below its potential. I have given the most recent official statistics that I could find, and, in spite of the recovery which occurred during the first quarter of 1981, it is still a very slow recovery. I believe that all the forecasters agree with Senator Everett when he said the first quarter was an aberration. I would not call it an aberration, really.

Senator Murray: That was my word.

Senator Lamontagne: It is quite normal as the economy moves from the bottom of a recession to grow quite rapidly, on a percentage basis, at the beginning of the recovery, and then the rate of growth starts to stabilize.

Senator Frith: The figure it is based on is low to start with.

Senator Lamontagne: I disagree with the assessment of the bank. I agree with the assessment of the Economic Council and the others.

Senator Murray: If I understood Senator Lamontagne correctly, he also said that monetary policy is much too blunt an instrument, and that fiscal policy should be our main weapon in the fight against inflation.

Senator Frith: He did not say that at all.

Senator Lamontagne: I said that monetary policy and fiscal policy were in the category of what we usually call demand management policies. These policies are effective when we fight demand-pull inflation and when the economy reaches its potential corresponding more or less to full employment. Then, of course, those demand management policies can be effective. Under such conditions, my claim is that fiscal policy can be much more effective than monetary policy, because monetary policy, as I said, can influence, in a very indirect way, new borrowings and savings as compared with fiscal policy, which can affect all types of spending.

I claim also that these two kinds of demand management policies are not effective to curb the kind of supply-push inflation or structural inflation that we have been experiencing, especially in the last six or seven years.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Roblin, debate adjourned.

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, June 9, the debate on the motion of Senator Austin, for second reading of Bill S-11, to amend the Canada Elections Act.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, it is not my intention to overly prolong the sitting. I certainly realize that speaking on an amendment to the Canada Elections Act would not hold the same interest as the debate which has taken place this afternoon and last evening.

Senator Murray: I wouldn't say that.

Senator Macdonald: As you know, Bill S-11 is a bill to amend the Canada Elections Act. At first glance, it may seem surprising that such a bill would be introduced in this chamber, when honourable senators do not have the direct and personal interest in the provisions of the Canada Elections Act that the members of the House of Commons have. Yet, this very fact enables honourable senators to examine and, indeed, to improve on the Canada Elections Act since we can look at its provisions in an objective way and propose changes which would carry out the main purposes of the act in a more effective manner.

Of course, the main purpose and underlying principle of the act is to enable those entitled to vote in a federal election to do so. In doing this, care has to be taken not to lessen or downgrade the obligation and responsibility of the voter.

Honourable senators, while Bill S-11 does not deal with the requirements for voting or the procedures to be followed in the voting process, it does deal with a very important principle; that is, that all votes are or should be of equal value. Each voter is entitled to know that his or her vote is as valuable as the next voter's. It has been a long-standing source of dissatisfaction that it can be known that elections have been decided before voting has ceased in parts of western Canada. I agree with the statement of the sponsor who, in moving second reading, said this:

All Canadians should feel emotionally that they participate equally in the great democratic act of electing a government;

Obviously, if a voter knows that his or her vote cannot have any effect on the election, there cannot be such a feeling.

● (1550)

Under the present provisions of the Canada Elections Act, all polling stations in Canada open at 9 o'clock in the morning close at 8 o'clock in the evening, local time. Consequently, due to the various time zones, the votes in eastern and central Canada can be counted and the results known while voting is still going on in western Canada. Indeed, it may well be that the result of an election—the re-election or defeat of a government—is known before the polls are closed in parts of western Canada. The steps taken to prevent such results from becoming known have not been effective, and I do not think they can be made effective.

Bill S-11 attacks the problem from another angle or point of view. It would change the hours of voting in the different time zones so that in practice the results of voting in eastern and central Canada would not be compiled until all voting had ceased. For example, in the maritimes the polls would open at 10 o'clock in the morning and close at 9 o'clock in the evening.

Honourable senators, I believe that the principle of the bill should receive general acceptance. I also believe that there could be some modification of the voting hours, which would be more acceptable than those which are set out. In the constituency in which I live, and which I know best, I believe there would be fairly strong objection to the polls remaining open until 9 o'clock in the evening. Indeed, there is even some objection to their remaining open until 8 p.m. However, I believe it would be acceptable, when the reason is explained, if the hours remained from, say, 9 a.m. until 8 p.m. but the counting of the ballots would not begin until 9 p.m. That proposal is set out in one of the bills in the other place—I believe it is Bill C-626—although perhaps not in exactly the same form.

Of course, objection can be taken that this would make a very long day for the election officials—the deputy returning officers, the poll clerks and the agents of the various candidates. Of course, that is true. In my opinion, their day is already too long. To prepare for the opening of the polls, the deputy returning officers and the clerks must be at the polling stations at least 30 minutes before the opening in order to prepare for the taking of the vote, and at least an hour must be allowed after the voting to deal with the counting and the other matters which must be attended to. Consequently, at the present time, for the officials, their day may well be between 12 and 13 hours. So adding an hour to that could not be considered; it would make an already long day altogether too long.

The solution to the problem of a long work day is very simple—indeed, it should be adopted even if no other change is made. The solution is to have two shifts at each polling station for the election. Instead of having one deputy returning officer and one poll clerk, there should be two of each.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Macdonald: Honourable senators, as I mentioned, I believe that Bill S-11 is certainly worthy of support in principle and deserves consideration to overcome any practical objections that may be raised.

As has been mentioned, there are in the other place two bills dealing with this very matter. The principal one is Bill C-237.

I do not propose to speak to its provisions, except to say that I think the hours of voting proposed in that bill would never be acceptable in eastern Canada. Some of the other provisions of the bill deserve consideration, such as mobile polls and changes in proxy voting procedures.

Indeed, if Bill S-11 should go to committee, I would like to see some of the provisions of the act studied, particularly those concerning proxy voting. In my opinion, the present procedure is too complicated and, indeed, often frustrates the very purpose of proxy voting. Again, when I speak of proxy voting, I am speaking only of the way it works in the constituency where I live, which is partly urban and partly rural.

Proxy voting is a commendable procedure. It is dealt with in section 46(1) of the Canada Elections Act. It is not long, and I would like to quote it. It says:

Where an elector whose name appears on the list of electors for a polling division at an election is qualified to vote in the polling division at the election and has reason to believe that he will be unable to vote in the polling division at the election, during the hours for voting on the ordinary polling day and on the days fixed for the advance poll and for the taking of votes in the office of the returning officer by reason of

- (a) his absence from the polling division in the course of his employment as a fisherman, mariner, member of an aircrew, member of a forestry crew, member of a topographical survey crew, prospector or trapper,
- (b) his illness or physical incapacity, or
- (c) his absence from the polling division while a full-time student duly registered at a recognized educational institution in Canada during an academic term, he may, in the prescribed form, appoint another elector whose name appears on that list of electors and is qualified to vote in the polling division at the election to be his proxy voter to vote for and in place of him at the election.

The section is somewhat long. I believe it could be cut in two without affecting its meaning. However, there are some practical difficulties. One is that someone must certify that the voter belongs in one of those categories. Let us take, for example, the case of a voter who is ill. The voter must name another voter from the same poll to act as a proxy. The proxy must then consent to so act and take the form to the returning officer; and proof must be presented that the voter is entitled to vote by proxy. In the case of illness, this requires a certificate from a duly qualified medical practitioner stating that he has seen the voter and that the voter is unable to vote because of illness. That certificate must be on the doctor's own letterhead, and on that letterhead must be shown the doctor's address and telephone number.

It must also be remembered that a person can act as a proxy for only one voter. This makes it somewhat difficult. Let me give honourable senators an example. Bear in mind that I am speaking of a constituency that is partly rural and partly urban, and one where the urban centres are not so large. In the last federal election I received word that there were some voters in the hospital who wanted to vote by proxy. I saw them and had them sign the necessary forms. However, I could act as a proxy for only one. So, for all the others I had to get someone from that polling station to agree to so act. Sydney is the centre where the returning officer has his office, and someone had to go to the office in Sydney. In one case the proxy voter had to travel between 25 and 30 miles to get to the returning officer's office in order to obtain a certificate to vote by proxy.

Let us take the case of a student. Again, here the procedure could be improved. For a student at university who wishes to vote by proxy the act sets out the procedure. There must be a statement by the registrar of a recognized educational institution in Canada that the voter is a full-time student. I may say that these are all forms that have to be filled out. The returning officer provides the forms. Then, of course, the student must name someone to act as his proxy, and, again that person must go to the returning officer to obtain the necessary certificate. Surely it would be sufficient, for example, for the parent to certify that the voter was such a student, and I believe it certainly would be helpful if the same person could act as a proxy for any number of voters at any poll.

• (1600)

I think, too, that a Canadian student qualified to vote who is attending a university outside of Canada should be allowed to vote in Canada. I do not see the necessity for the voter or the proxy voter having to attend personally before the returning officer. I know of no reason why, for example, the official agent of the candidate could not attend before the returning officer with all the completed forms in order to obtain the certificate.

This procedure is complicated. I have had some experience with it. You have to have a reliable person to act as a proxy; otherwise, if you are not careful, he might vote the wrong way.

In any event, the procedures are cumbersome, and most of the parties, when they have gone through them half a dozen times, say that it is not worth it; they stop doing it, and some people are thus not able to vote. As most of these are cases of patients in hospital, it would be quite easy to arrange a different procedure, as I will describe.

Bill C-237 mentioned mobile polls, which means that polls would go to places like hospitals in order to allow people to vote who could not come to the ordinary polling station. Let me explain. In the town where I live we have a home for senior citizens. Some 90 people reside there, and a polling station is established in the home. Those who can come to the polling station which has been set up can vote in the usual way. For others who wish to vote, but on account of physical disability cannot do so, the poll goes to them. There is no problem. The deputy returning officer and the poll clerk, together with the agents, if they wish, go through the building and allow them to vote. Everybody is satisfied with this procedure. In such a case, the voting is completed in a couple of hours at the most.

Senator Frith: Without their having to sit around for the rest of the day.

Senator Macdonald: There would be no difficulty in having that same poll, which I call a travelling poll, go to hospitals, which would do away with all of this proxy voting. They could set up the poll there and go round to the different parts of the building, allowing patients to vote in that way. I think this would be a most acceptable procedure. If there were valid objections to such a procedure being followed in large centres, where people would not be as well known as they would be in smaller centres, I suggest that the returning officers for each constituency be given some discretion in the matter so that they could get up such a poll if they wished.

There are other provisions of the act which could be examined with a view to allowing more proxy voting and more early voting.

Section 97(2) of the Canada Elections Act says:

(2) At a general election, any elector whose name appears on the list of electors for any polling division of an electoral district and who has reason to believe that he will be unable to vote on the days fixed for the advance poll and the ordinary poll may cast his vote in the office of the returning officer for that electoral district, before the returning officer or the election clerk (in this section referred to as the "presiding officer"), between the hours of twelve o'clock noon and six o'clock in the afternoon or between the hours of seven and nine o'clock in the afternoon on any day during the period beginning on Monday, the fourteenth day before polling day, and ending on the last Friday before polling day, except on a Sunday and any day fixed for the advance poll.

I believe that period could be extended so that more people could take advantage of it.

It might be said that all this would be too expensive. Perhaps it would be. At the same time I think that added expense could be offset to a considerable degree. Section 10 of the act sets out the normal number of voters to a poll as approximately 250, and that is followed pretty strictly. If the number goes over that to any extent they divide it into two polls. That is ridiculous. In the ordinary course of events at least 10 per cent of the voters do not vote for one reason or another, and so the poll is not busy half the time. To my mind, any poll should be able to handle at least 350 votes in 11 hours. If it cannot, the deputy returning officer and the poll clerk are not up to their job.

Honourable senators, I have probably wandered quite far from Bill S-11, and have not mentioned government Bill C-58, which is also worthy of support, since that cuts down the number of days in an election campaign from 60 to 47. I think we should remember that all these discussions are useful. It may be that Bill S-11 and the others will not get too far before the end of the session, but I think we should remember that after every election the chief electoral officer makes recommendations to the government as a result of that election's shortcomings. I am sure the government will take into consideration anything we may say here with reference to the Canada Elections Act.

May I also say, honourable senators, that I am always impressed by the attitude of the Chief Electoral Officer and his staff. They are always available to give information during an election campaign. I recall that I spoke to the official agent of the candidate of my party in the last election, when it was over, and he spoke in the highest terms of the co-operation of the Chief Electoral Officer's staff. He told me that with regard to any problem or difficulty that arose all you had to do was call them and they gave you the answer; or, if they did not have the answer, they soon obtained it for you.

Honourable senators, I thank you for your attention. As I have already said, I am in favour of this bill, perhaps with a few changes.

On motion of Senator Macquarrie, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Supplementary Estimates (B) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1982.

● (1410)

THE ESTIMATES

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B)—NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MAKE STUDY

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures set out in the Supplementary Estimates (B) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1982.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, supplementary estimates (B) were tabled by the Leader of the Government in the Senate earlier today. As we did with the estimates and supplementary estimates (A), it is our normal procedure to immediately refer them to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

As a corollary to this reference, I have been asked by the chairman to advise honourable senators that the National Finance Committee is planning to meet at 9.30 a.m. on Tuesday, June 23, 1981 to discuss supplementary estimates (B).

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: You split an infinitive, senator.

Senator Frith: Did I split an infinitive?

Senator Macquarrie: You had better put it together again.

Senator Frith: I ask leave to have that split infinitive put back together again.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Monday next, June 22, 1981, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, because the Wednesdays in the next two weeks are holidays, the plan is that we will sit on the Mondays and Tuesdays of those two weeks. This notice is pursuant to that plan, and it is our intention to follow the plan next week, unless something unusual happens. At present, it looks as though one of the unusual events we were expecting will not occur.

In case there are honourable senators who were not present last week, and who have not had a chance to read Hansard, I shall explain the plan again so there will be no doubt about it. The plan is to sit on Monday evening at 8 o'clock, on Tuesday afternoon at 2 o'clock and, if necessary, on Tuesday evening, but not to sit on Wednesday, Thursday or Friday of either of those weeks—that is, not to come back until the Monday following the mid-week holiday.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

NATIVE LAND CLAIMS —EFFECT OF PASSAGE OF BILL C-48

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government, which he can pass on to the Minister of State for Economic Development if he so wishes. It concerns a comment that the president of the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops, Monsignor Joseph MacNeil, made regarding the Canadian legislation on oil and gas exploration, Bill C-48.

According to Mgr. MacNeil, this legislation could seriously impede the settlement of land claims and maintain the natives in the North in a colonial status within Canada.

Mgr. MacNeil asks that the federal government consider withdrawing or revamping Bill C-48.

I would therefore like to know whether the government is aware of the concerns expressed by Mgr. MacNeil and whether it is considering withdrawing or completely revamping the bill.

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a number of comments have been made on the subject of Bill C-48. In due time, honourable senators will, hopefully, have a full opportunity to debate the measure in this chamber.

However, the nature of the question is such that perhaps my colleague, Senator Olson, may wish to reply. He has developed an admirable expertise in the field.

Senator Flynn: He does a magnificent job.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I am very happy to hear those comments from the Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Flynn: Especially what they mean.

Senator Olson: I presume you mean what you say.

Senator Flynn: Exactly—the tone is there.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the government is aware of those concerns. Similar views have been expressed by a number of other people in the country. The government does not agree with those views and, if and when further amendments are to be made to the bill, they will be announced by the minister responsible, namely, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Even although views have been expressed that it does, in some way, interfere with claims that may be made in those territories, we believe it has been stated fairly explicitly that this is not the government's view.

THE SENATE

RE-ALLOCATION OF SEATS IN CHAMBER

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government following the exchange on Tuesday evening concerning the allocation of seats for certain honourable senators.

Have the two whips now received formal requests from the senators concerned and, if so, can we expect that a new seating arrangement will be completed when we return next week?

[Translation]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall pass on the question to my hon. friend, Senator Petten, later on.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy of the Government): The words "pass on" are the ones Senator Flynn used a while ago, are they not?

Hon. Martial Asselin: Very well.

ENERGY

OIL—IMPORTATION FROM MEXICO

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, my question is for the Minister of State for Economic Development. On Tuesday night I asked if Canada's contract with Mexico for oil provides for price flexibility to reflect falling international prices. At that time the question was taken as notice.

However, following a further approach from Mexico, I understand that Canada is today, considering negotiating a further purchase of up to 50,000 barrels a day. Considering the inferior mix of oil we receive from Mexico, would it not make sense to purchase the same quality of oil, which is now pro-rated, from Alberta?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, that suggestion has been made a number of times. We know that there is a difference between the price being paid in the domestic market and that being paid in the international marketplace. There is nothing new about that and that question has been addressed by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and others many times.

There is speculation, and I am not sure that it is anything more than speculation, that Mexico is now offering to supply, I think, up to 50,000 barrels a day more than it is now delivering under the contract that was signed some time ago. There are still several weeks until the termination of the existing contract, and it may be that we can look into these matters. I am sure the negotiators will be looking at the quality and, indeed, the price related to that quality. Also, there is the matter of the refiners' capacity to deal with these various qualities. In this regard I can understand Senator Charbonneau's concern. We have to take into consideration that the specific gravity or quality—whatever you wish to call it—of crude oil generally available in the world is such that we are moving gradually to the point where we will need the capability in Canada to deal with higher and higher amounts of so-called heavier oil.

THE ECONOMY

FOOD PRICES—CONFLICTING ANNOUNCEMENTS

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. Could he explain to this chamber the discrepancy between the announcement made by Statistics Canada that food prices have declined by precisely 0.7 per cent in the month of May and the announcement made concurrently by Agriculture Canada that food prices, in fact, have increased?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I will get a precise answer to that question. I am sure that my honourable friend has read some of the press reports which indicated that reporters were also curious about this difference. It is a matter of time frames and when you do the calculation. But I will try to get a precise answer from Statistics Canada and the people in the Department of Agriculture who did the compilation so that we can furnish the usual reasonable and logical explanation.

Senator Nurgitz: I am satisfied that I would not get anything else!

Honourable senators, at the same time, could I get a "usual logical and reasonable" explanation of the allegation being made by the Ontario Cattlemen's action group, that while farm prices have dropped, consumer prices have risen, and that supermarkets have tripled their markup on beef, for example, in the last five years. Is the government going to make any form of investigation on that?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I do not think there is going to be anything in the nature of a formal investigation, but I am extremely curious about this as well. For my own personal information and perhaps as a member of the cabinet, but not in a formal way, I would like to know where that wide discrepancy is, because I saw one proponent for each side of this argument speak from exactly opposite positions earlier this morning. I am sure my honourable colleague did too.

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Murray: In the cabinet?

Senator Olson: On Canada AM.

ENERGY

QUEBEC AND MARITIMES PIPELINE—LABOUR DISPUTES

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, may I direct a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development who, I guess, is in charge of pipelines? Is it true that Trans Quebec and Maritimes Pipeline has said that within a week it will have to cancel construction of this pipeline for the remainder of the year unless the current labour difficulties are resolved within that time?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I cannot verify whether that is true or not, but I have heard of some disputes there. That does, in fact, mean there is some difficulty which could hinder construction which might otherwise take place this year. Regardless of whether what we have heard is fact or opinion, I shall try to provide an explanation of the situation and discover the conditions that might lead the company to say that they could jeopardize construction for the rest of the year.

● (1425)

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to address a supplementary question to the same minister. If it turns out that he discovers there is truth to the allegation, will he then be prepared to repeat the guarantee of the Canadian government that the pipeline will be built on schedule and that it will arrive in Halifax by the fall of 1983?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, there are two or three hypotheses in that question, and ministers who have been around for a while know they should not try to answer hypothetical questions.

Senator Smith: There is nothing hypothetical about my question. I am simply asking the minister, if he finds there is any truth in the allegation—and there will be nothing hypothetical about that—whether he is prepared to repeat the promise which the government has made in the past that the pipeline will be completed in time to be in Halifax in 1983.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am told by my legal adviser that any question that begins with "if" becomes a hypothetical question right away.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): If you are going to be your own advocate, I should remind you of the saying that any lawyer who defends himself has a fool for a client.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it could be that there might be some slowdowns for particular reasons, such as labour or weather problems; but there could be other periods when the speed of construction could be accelerated, because of some favourable conditions. All of that would have to be taken into account, and I am sure my honourable friend would not expect me to try to balance one against the other so that we could go back to the completion date of 1983. I cannot tell him now, but we are still hopeful, and we have reason to be hopeful, that this line will be in place by the time that was specified earlier when we gave a commitment to see that the line is built.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, as another supplementary, I should like to ask the minister if those factors, which he says have to be taken into consideration in calculating the time of arrival of the pipeline in Halifax, were not taken into consideration when the promise was first made?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I think it is fair to say that we cannot make valid calculations based on some labour disputes that could not be foreseen at the time.

Senator Smith: In other words, the honourable gentleman seems to be saying that they made the promise without taking into consideration factors which he now says ought to have been considered, and therefore he is not prepared to repeat the promise that completion will be in 1983.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the commitment was made to build it, and the estimate of the time required to get it in place was clear. My honourable friend knows very well that it cannot be built without workers. If the workers are on strike, it is not being built.

Senator Smith: I know that, and I am sure the minister knows that one should not make promises unless one takes into consideration all the probable factors that will affect the carrying out of that promise.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the objective stated by the government has not changed.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Hear, hear.

Senator Smith: At least the objective has not changed.

Senator Perrault: You are so negative.

Senator Smith: I am sorry, I did not hear what the Leader of the Government said. I don't suppose I missed much, but still, if he would like to have me hear it, he might repeat it.

Senator Perrault: You are too negative.

Senator Smith: You think I am too negative? I always like to be practical—whether or not it happens to please the Leader of the Government to deal in practicalities—and that is what I am being today.

● (1430)

With reference to the off-oil program which has been given great publicity in relation to—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senator, this is not a supplementary question, so I give the floor to Senator Leblanc.

Senator Smith: Thank you, Your Honour. I shall ask the question again later.

[Translation]

Hon. Fernand E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, I would like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of State for Economic Development concerning the construction of the Q & M pipeline. There seems to be a labour dispute, as some 40 welders are on strike. There is speculation that if the strike is not settled soon, the construction of the pipeline could be delayed for a year. La Presse reports that for the time being Mr. Lévesque's government refuses to intervene in the dispute. However, if construction is delayed for a whole year, this would have a negative effect on the public, who should be able to use natural gas and therefore pay less for energy.

Since the federal government has jurisdiction to some extent over the construction of the pipeline, could it not make some attempt at settling this dispute? As such, I think a labour dispute comes under provincial jurisdiction. But would it not be possible to take some steps to settle this dispute which is detrimental to Quebecers?

[English]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the federal government has jurisdiction over pipelines that are built under a permit issued by the National Energy Board. That, of course, is the case with this pipeline. However, we do not have jurisdiction with regard to most or, perhaps, all the labour unions. That, clearly, comes within provincial jurisdiction.

I think the most satisfactory answer I can give to this question, and to the previous one asked by Senator Smith, is to say that I shall get a report on it, and have an analysis done of the implications involved, so that we can base our approach on rather better information than is to be found in newspaper speculation. When I say "speculation," I am not evading the point, but it is just opinion with regard to what might happen in this case. I shall, however, try to obtain a little more firm information respecting the prospect for the balance of this year.

[Translation]

Senator Leblanc: What I fear, of course, is that, since this is a federal pipeline, the Quebec government, which seems bent on resuming its campaign for sovereignty-association, will start saying in Quebec: "The federal government is to blame for what is happening; sort it out with that government." That is why I say that we should see to it that this issue is quite clear in the minds of Quebecers, so that they will not think, as the provincial government would have them believe, it seems that the federal government is to blame. I feel it is important that the minister make a statement on this matter.

[English]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I shall have to take that into consideration. I hope that all members, on both sides of this house, will be clear that this is not the responsibility of the federal government.

INDUSTRY

EXTENSION OF SUBSIDIES TO SHIPBUILDING

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development having to do with the shipbuilding industry.

I am sure the minister will recall that last spring I made a plea on behalf of the shipbuilding industry because of the expiry of the 20 per cent subsidy. I wonder if the minister could indicate if there has been any change in the position of the government, and if that subsidy will be continued.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): No, honourable senators. There was an announcement, either at that time or since—I am not sure of the exact date—that the shipbuilding subsidy, in most cases, will be reduced to a lower level, after the time frame with reference to the ships that are under consideration now has run out. No change has been announced. If one is announced, this will be done by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, by way of a supplementary, at the annual meeting held last week in Halifax they expressed concern again, and evidently pleaded with the government for some alternative policy because of the fact that there is a potential $40 billion of shipbuilding business in the long term. I wonder if the minister could bring this matter to the attention of his colleagues, and see if anything can be done to promote economic development in that area.

Senator Olson: Well, honourable senators, I do not want to base a reply on results coming out of a conference held last week; but I want to agree with my honourable friend that there is an enormous prospect for a great number of ships being built, and therefore great activity within the shipbuilding yards in Canada, in connection with a number of projects, including some specialized ones, such as drilling platforms, semi-submersibles, and LNG tankers.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

ISRAELI ATTACK ON NUCLEAR REACTOR IN IRAQ—CANADIAN ATTITUDE IN SECURITY COUNCIL

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate concerning the Middle East, and in particular the recent raid on the establishment in Baghdad. Considering that the Security Council is now seized of the whole situation, realizing that any implementation of whatever the Security Council recommends will fall upon the generality of the membership, which of course includes Canada, and realizing that very likely Canada has been approached as to its view, can the minister indicate whether or not Canada supports the French motion, the Islamic motion, or the Third World motion? Further, has such support been communicated to the Security Council participants in this very serious matter?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The question will be taken as notice, honourable senators.

[Senator Olson.]

MIDDLE EAST—GOVERNMENT ACTION ON STANFIELD REPORT

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I should like also to ask, in the same area but perhaps with greater generality, and I think enduring importance, in view of the fact that it is now a good many months since Ambassador Robert Stanfield handed in his in-depth and very wise, perceptive report on the Middle East situation—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): It is a magnificent report.

Senator Macquarrie: I agree. Senator Frith says it is a magnificent report. As someone said to me the other day, "There is a great deal of wisdom in there," and I said, "Exactly. There is a great deal of wisdom in the author."

Recalling that the Clark Government very wisely, in my opinion, accepted quickly and fully the interim report by Ambassador Robert Stanfield, can the minister indicate if the government today is prepared to look upon this most excellent and thorough report as a beginning of a Canadian approach to the Middle East, something upon which, I am sure, the Canadian people could rally in support? If it has not finished its consideration, perhaps the honourable leader could tell us exactly where the Stanfield report stands and the thinking of the government at the present time.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Middle East situation, and Canada's approach to events there, will be the subject of an inquiry which will be directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I hope that a report can be brought to the chamber next week.

THE SENATE

RE-ALLOCATION OF SEATS IN CHAMBER

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, since Senator Petten is back in his seat, can we hear from him with regard to the reallocation of seats to certain senators who have communicated with him and have sent him a formal request?

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, I apologize for my absence from the chamber when Senator Deschatelets asked his question. I left the chamber to take a phone call.

I have now received nine requests from honourable senators to have their places moved so that they may sit as a group.

Senator Hartland de M. Molson: No, no.

Senator Petten: Is that not correct?

Senator Molson: No.

Senator Petten: "Sit together," then—whatever phraseology you want—"so that they may sit together as a group". As I said the other day, I now have to speak to other senators who are occupying space we shall need so that you can sit together, Senator Molson. I have now begun and am working towards that end. How long it will take, I am not sure, but I am actively pursuing it.

• (1440)

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): In my opinion, this problem involves the two whips.

Senator Petten: Thank you, Senator Flynn.

Senator Macdonald and I had a brief meeting last evening and we hope to meet again in the near future. I apologize to Senator Macdonald; I had taken the responsibility of speaking to the Liberal senators before I spoke to Senator Macdonald about where to seat those senators who wish to sit as a group.

Senator Flynn: Since this matter involves both sides of the chamber, if there is agreement His Honour the Speaker will not be involved. However, I believe that, in any matter where there is not agreement between the two main parties in the house, His Honour has to rule. I hope His Honour will not have to do that.

I merely want to say that, as far as we are concerned on this side, we are willing to move closer to the left of His Honour the Speaker so as to provide space in the rows where Senator Belisle, Senator Bielish, Senator Fournier and Senator Doody sit. Senator Bonnell will not have to move in the way we understood he wanted to. There could be a problem with regard to Senator Bosa, of course, but there always seem to be problems.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I wonder if the Leader of the Opposition is aspiring to achieve the lofty position of whip for the official opposition.

Senator Flynn: I am willing to help in any way, shape or form I can. I am not putting any obstacle in the way of the wishes of those who want a re-allocation of seats. I am quite sure that the Leader of the Government would not mind doing the same thing in an effort to serve the Senate generally in this matter, even if it is not a job of great standing.

Senator Perrault: On the contrary, I have the highest respect for the whips, Senator Petten and Senator Macdonald. I am certainly willing to leave it in their very competent, capable hands.

Senator Flynn: Provided you do that, I am quite sure that we shall reach a solution.

Senator Molson: I have a supplementary question. In connection with this seating problem, Senator Petten was good enough to tell me earlier today that he had received a letter dated May 21 from Senator Thompson which set out his request to be seated in seat No. 31. There was a slight misunderstanding in the course of this matter, but Senator Petten says that he is now in full flight. I wonder if he would allow Senator Thompson to sit in that seat, since it is now vacant.

Senator Petten: I will certainly take that request into consideration.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Senator Thompson wanted to be seated there in order to be next to Senator Bonnell, who is now moving.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, it was intimated a moment ago by the Leader of the Opposition that the Leader of the Government in the Senate might have some problem in moving my seating accommodation to another place in this chamber. I want to assure honourable senators that there will be no such problem, because I treat this matter without partisan disputation.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

MIDDLE EAST—POSSIBLE CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN MULTINATIONAL PEACEKEEPING FORCE

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, if I may, I should like to return for a moment to the questions asked earlier by our colleague, Senator Macquarrie, concerning Middle East matters. I ask the Leader of the Government if he would ascertain from the Secretary of State for External Affairs the present status of discussions concerning a possible multinational peacekeeping force in the Sinai. In particular, has Canada been asked to participate in such a peacekeeping force? Has the Department of External Affairs formulated a government position with regard to the size, composition and role of any such peacekeeping force in the Sinai?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the government continues to give serious consideration to the problems involved in the creation of the proposed multinational force in that area. We have, frankly, a number of concerns about the force which include, among other factors, the absence of United Nations auspices, and the possible absence of a broad geographical and political balance in its composition. However, the government continues to support the efforts of the United States to achieve a comprehensive peace, although we are disappointed at the lack of progress in negotiations over recent months. No final decision has been taken, should Canada be requested to participate, on whether we will do so.

Senator Murray: I take it, then that Canada has not been asked to participate. In particular, I should like the minister to ascertain whether Canada has a view not only as to the geographical disposition of any such multinational force, but also as to what size that force should be and whether it should have some kind of combat capability, as has been mooted in recent months.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I shall take the additional question as notice.

NATIONAL FINANCE

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A)—DOCUMENT TABLED

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, when I spoke the other night on the main estimates, Senator Smith asked me a question about the oil compensation payments. I now have an answer from the Treasury Board. It is rather lengthy and, with the permission of the Senate, I would merely table it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon Senators: Agreed.

Senator Everett tabled:

Letter respecting the presentation of oil compensation expenditures in the Supplementary Estimates (A) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1982, being a reply to Senator Smith's question of June 16, 1981. (English text).

TRANSPORT

AIRLINES—SALE OF NORDAIR

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to questions asked by Senator Asselin on June 10 and again on June 17 regarding the sale of Nordair. Further to my reply of June 10 to Senator Asselin, who raised a question about progress on the part of the government with regard to the disposition of Nordair, I am informed that there has been no change since I last reported to this chamber on March 12, 1981.

All that can be said at this time is that discussions are continuing with interested parties. They might well lead to the merger of Nordair and Quebecair, provided certain conditions are met.

The conditions I refer to are the same as those previously described to this chamber. The Minister of Transport wishes to see a balanced distribution of ownership in the merged airline between Quebec and Ontario investors, as well as a reconciliation of employee, union and management interests.

I am pleased to report that Nordair continues to perform as one of the most efficient and profitable regional carriers, despite continuing uncertainty over its future ownership. I should emphasize that it will remain a subsidiary of Air Canada until a satisfactory solution can be found.

EL SALVADOR

The Senate resumed from Thursday, June 11, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Macquarrie calling the attention of the Senate to

- (1) the increasingly dangerous political, military and social situation in El Salvador;
- (2) the compelling hazards of third party interventions and the possibility of the escalation of hostile actions within El Salvador;
- (3) the further compelling importance of the resolution of the conflict by means of a political settlement rather than through recourse to sustained and bloody armed conflict; and
- (4) the value of Canadian encouragement and support of the efforts of those individuals and groups seeking mediation of the conflict in El Salvador.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in his intervention on June 11 respecting El Salvador, Senator Macquarrie expressed a desire for more discussion on contemporary issues, and invited participation by others in this debate.

I agree with Senator Macquarrie's view that the conflict in El Salvador is not going to disappear overnight. As I mentioned, I found his intervention to be conscience-stirring and thoughtful. I therefore accept his invitation—and I hope others will—to consider this important question and also the position, as I have been able to understand it, of the national government of Canada on the policy issues with regard to El Salvador. It will quickly appear in the course of my remarks that I agree with Senator Macquarrie on almost every principle he raised. Essentially, I believe that his feelings are the same as those that motivate the government, and that are behind the policy that has been established and adopted by the government on the conflict and the tragedies in El Salvador. I say "tragedies" because I think that the long suffering of the Salvadoran people and the increasingly dangerous situation that is developing there are clear. No one should try to outdo Senator Macquarrie's description of the situation.

The combination of suffering by fellow human beings because of a serious political conflict, the fact that this suffering takes place in the context of such political conflict and the potential consequences for world peace which exist because of the forces that are concerned and are intervening constitutes, as Senator Macquarrie said, a very serious situation. The first point with which I agree is Senator Macquarrie's priorities on those elements. He lists as his first priority the suffering of fellow human beings, no matter what political issues are involved.

The situation in El Salvador is one of human tragedy involving incalculable frustration and pain. It has existed for decades as a result of a series of authoritarian governments working to deny the Salvadoran people the economic development and social justice which, as fellow human beings, we believe—and I think I am speaking for more than just the government here—is their right. As pointed out by Senator Macquarrie, it is a situation marked by extreme violence and abuses of human rights. According to the information I have, some 16,000 Salvadorans are estimated to have been killed in the last 19 months, so it is a matter of concern around the globe, not to mention Canada.

Honourable senators, I would like to outline the position of the government as I understand it. Let me draw your attention to the statement the Secretary of State for External Affairs made in the House of Commons. It outlines the policy of the national government with regard to El Salvador. In it he enunciates Canada's concern at the continued high level of violence and the widespread use of torture by parties to the conflict. In working for improvements, Canada's national government has been active particularly through bilateral intervention and multilateral intervention, and with respect to refugee help and the direct contribution of financial aid.

In terms of bilateral intervention, officials of the Department of External Affairs have expressed to Salvadoran officials in Ottawa on many occasions Canada's concerns about the governing junta's response to violence from both the left and the right. In terms of multilateral intervention, Canada's ambassador and permanent observer to the Organization of American States actively expressed Canada's views at the OAS Tenth Geneva Assembly in November 1980. Then on March 11, 1981, at the 37th Session of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights, Canada voted for a resolution calling for the appointment of a special representative to investigate reports of human rights violations in El Salvador.

On the topic of refugee help, Canada has an annual refugee plan which includes close co-ordination and co-operation with the United Nations High Commission for Refugees, the UNHCR. At present the UNHCR policy is directed toward local resettlement in the region with eventual repatriation when conditions permit. The UNHCR is advising all countries that special refugee settlement programs are not needed. This position accords with the current Canadian perception.

However, the Canadian government will consider individual requests for assistance to resettle refugees for whom local resettlement in countries of first asylum is impossible. The government's program for 1981 makes provision for their acceptance into Canada—and here I would remind honourable senators that the UNHCR plan is for local settlement—with a view to eventual repatriation when conditions permit. But notably and as I mentioned earlier, the Canadian government will consider individual requests for assistance.

The program for 1981 makes provision for the acceptance into Canada of up to 1,000 refugees from all of Central and Latin America. In addition, special measures to assist persons affected by the strife in El Salvador were announced on March 19, 1981 in the House of Commons by the Minister of Employment and Immigration, the Honourable Lloyd Axworthy. With regard to direct assistance, in an effort to assist Salvadorans affected by the conflict, Canada announced in February 1981 a contribution of $250,000 to the International Committee of the Red Cross in favour of El Salvador. In the fiscal year 1980-81 the Canadian International Development Agency provided $127,250 to Canadian non-governmental organizations managing projects in El Salvador.

Again, as I mentioned, Senator Macquarrie stated that we must have concern for the people of El Salvador, and that our first concern should be for them. He also called our attention to the hazards of third party intervention in El Salvador and questioned the role of the Canadian government vis-à-vis the United States and its involvement there.

I want to emphasize that, as I understand the government's position, Canada strongly supports the traditional principles of international law in opposition to any interference from the outside in another country's domestic affairs. The United States is aware of this position. In addition, Canada has a long standing policy of not providing arms to areas of tension and deplores the fact that competing forces in El Salvador are receiving supplies from outside sources. Canada's position on the supply of arms to El Salvador has been clear and consistent. It has been explained to the United States and it remains unchanged.

Honourable senators, I now direct some remarks to the resolution of the conflict. As I signalled earlier, I agree with Senator Macquarrie, that a political solution must be sought. We reject the concept of a military solution to the problems in El Salvador and support the action of the national government in urging all governments, including those communist nations, to refrain from supplying offensive weapons to the parties involved.

We welcome the decision of the Government of El Salvador to call elections for March 1982 for a constituent assembly, and its willingness to begin a dialogue with the revolutionary left on both the election process and the monitoring of it. All political parties have been invited to register for the elections, including leftist parties willing to lay down their arms. We support this commitment on the part of the Government of El Salvador to abide by the will of the Salvadoran people as expressed in elections and, equally, to reject the attempt of the revolutionary forces to negotiate the formation of a non-elected coalition government and condemn their unwillingness to submit their claim to representing the Salvadoran people to the test of democratically conducted elections. Despite the civil unrest in El Salvador, it is our conviction—and my conviction—that elections could be held in 1982 in a fair manner. Elections have been conducted on other occasions, in other parts of the world, under equally difficult, if not more difficult, circumstances.

● (1500)

As indicated by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in his statement of June 16, 1981, President Duarte is on public record as saying that the OAS would be welcome to monitor elections in El Salvador. I understand there would be support within the OAS for taking on this responsibility, should the major parties to the dispute so desire.

Again, along with Senator Macquarrie, I praise the leadership provided by the church in El Salvador during these difficult times, and note that the Acting Archbishop, Monsignor Rivera Y Damas, has, himself, commented favourably on the willingness of the Government of El Salvador to find a political solution to the problem.

I turn now to another dimension that has arisen in this debate, and that is Canada's role in the promotion of a political settlement in El Salvador. I draw the attention of honourable senators to the comparatively limited links which Canada has with El Salvador in terms of historic, linguistic, cultural and commercial ties. Canada is already in the process of becoming much more deeply involved in assisting the peoples and governments of the Commonwealth Caribbean in dealing with their own overwhelming economic and social difficulties. I use the word "comparatively" because I am comparing our links with El Salvador to the depths of the links, in terms of historic, linguistic, cultural and business ties, we have with the Commonwealth Caribbean nations. Because of an absence of such deep roots in El Salvador, we do not have the same capability, expertise, or even acceptability, in neighbouring Central America, to take on a similar role at this time. This does not mean that we should take on no role, but the different potential must not be ignored.

It is our position, for the same reasons—that is, the deeper historic and traditional ties—that initiatives in El Salvador are more the responsibility of countries such as Mexico and Venezuela. They are closer and have those greater ties with the countries of Central America.

As I recall, Senator Macquarrie referred to the role which may be played by Mexico and Venezuela—countries that are, in fact, now showing a greater interest in this respect. If I understand Senator Macquarrie correctly, Canada can try to persuade Mexico and Venezuela to play the kind of role that perhaps we could play better with the Commonwealth Caribbean countries.

I also agree with Senator Macquarrie that we must continue to demonstrate concern for the plight of the Salvadorans and to contribute actively to the efforts of international bodies such as the United Nations Human Rights Commission in working towards improvements in the human rights situation in El Salvador, and also with the OAS since it, at least, has the beginning of an important and useful role to play in this international situation.

In that regard, we are naturally pleased by the recent nomination by the United Nations of Professor J. A. Pastor Ridruejo of Spain as a special representative to investigate human rights abuses in El Salvador in accordance with the resolution which was actively supported by Canada. Canada's foreign policy has, in the past, been sensitive to human rights questions. This must continue to be the case and this is an outstanding example of how that policy can continue to be applied.

In conclusion, I would thank Senator Macquarrie for calling the attention of the Senate to this most important matter. The national government has been active in working towards improvements in the situation in El Salvador and continues to monitor developments closely. I fully support and encourage these efforts to promote respect for human rights and an end to the suffering in El Salvador.

I hope the initiatives that have started, to which both Senator Macquarrie and I have referred, will continue and that the solutions reached will solve the many dimensions of this problem, the most important being the suffering of our fellow human beings in El Salvador.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I would use the traditional device to get to my feet and say something, as the form is, "before the honourable senator takes his seat" by asking him one or two questions. If I have the indulgence of my colleagues, I should like to say how much I appreciate my colleague's generous remarks about my comments the other day, and how much I appreciate his well-reasoned comment on an important situation. It was of the high calibre that we expect to emanate from the Deputy Leader of the Government.

[Senator Frith.]

Would he give me an indication as to whether he thinks there might be some value in developing the Canadian presence in that region? I believe it would be particularly useful if we had a representative in Honduras. I am most disturbed about these unfortunate victims who are fleeing from their own country and who, if they escape the bullets in El Salvador, may be hit by them in Honduras. However, if they get through that double gantlet, even then there is very little assistance available to them.

I listened with care to the honourable senator's comments about our attitude towards refugees, and I believe that that is a traditional and wonderful attitude. Is there any possibility that, in a general way, we may strengthen our personnel? I am not suggesting it would be practical to appoint an ambassador to El Salvador, but perhaps we could augment our staff in Costa Rica. Perhaps we could have someone from the Honourable Lloyd Axworthy's department posted to Honduras so that there is a sympathetic, concerned and interested presence in that country.

Perhaps I misunderstood the comments of Senator Frith concerning the monitoring of elections. I, too, think that if the OAS especially the Mexicans, who are so wise in these things—could be accepted by both sides, it would be an excellent step. Senator Roblin and I had breakfast this morning with the Canadian Parliamentarians for World Order, and we discussed the events that took place in Zimbabwe. That situation is not exactly the same, since it is difficult for a fully independent sovereign country to accept such a solution. Has the deputy leader any indication that this is a reasonably practical objective?

Finally, since during these tranquil Thursday afternoon sessions we are given to exchanges of confidence, does he believe that it might be a useful development for Canada, after waiting 40 or 50 years, to actually become a member of the OAS so that we might be more involved with our hemispheric neighbours and able, therefore, to be more helpful to them in times of trouble?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, on the first point—the question of whether we could increase our contribution and have a greater visibility of our care and concern by increasing our representation in the Central American countries where refugees are going, according to the plan of local resettlement, to be followed, eventually, by repatriation—I should like to make two comments. First, I want to find out what the government is now doing. I believe we have some role in that whole refugee plan that involves local resettlement holding for repatriation, buttressed by some immigration provisions. I do not know its present extent. If I understood Senator Macquarrie's question, it was really a corollary to his statement that we should be seen—and I said the same thing—as caring, and one way that we could be seen as caring is to have a presence in that process. That would be consistent with the fact that we have a different level of acceptability in Central America generally than we have in the Caribbean simply because we are not as well-known and do not have the same presence there. So on that question I will find out what we are doing and then make a comment as to whether we could do more.

• (1510)

On the second point, the question of monitoring, I must say I had Zimbabwe in mind when I was talking about other difficult situations in which a purely domestic situation in a sovereign nation was monitored at the invitation of the sovereign nation. The election process was monitored with a view to having it appear to be, and actually be, as fair as possible so that its result would be something political usefully.

As Senator Macquarrie has said, the analogy between the Zimbabwe situation and that involving the OAS in this central American country is not perfect. Such analogies never are. But important initiatives have been taken by the OAS, and Canada has participated through its, admittedly, non-member representative.

On the third point I do not wish to comment without getting some advice. I might be taken as speaking for the government. My own personal impression is that we should be more active, and I have always felt the idea of our being an active member of the OAS to be attractive. I am bound to say that I have not studied it enough to know why we are not—I am sure there are good reasons; perhaps not totally persuasive reasons, but good ones—and I would like to look into that so I can respond as to whether or not I still think we should be more active, and I will also try to find out if the government has an answer to that question that I can perhaps express on their behalf.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Paul Martin was always in favour of Canada's joining the OAS.

Honourable senators, against the possibility that one of our colleagues may wish to debate the matter further, and in view of the fact that we are confronted with a continuing problem in El Salvador where there may be further developments at any time which honourable senators may wish to discuss, I am going to take the liberty of proposing the adjournment of this debate even though I do not intend to enter into it at the moment.

On motion of Senator Murray, debate adjourned.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Lamontagne, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs entitled: "Certain Aspects of the Canadian Constitution", tabled in the Senate on 26th November, 1980.—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.).

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Flynn asked me to have this matter stand in his name, but I understand that one of our colleagues, Senator Everett, would like to speak to it. Naturally, we would be delighted to hear him now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I am speaking to the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs entitled "Certain Aspects of the Canadian Constitution."

First, I should like to congratulate the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs and particularly its chairman, Senator Goldenberg, and Senator Lamontagne who chaired a subcommittee on certain aspects of the Constitution. It is an excellent report, and while I disagree with some of its conclusions, it is extremely well laid out. It gives a comprehensive history of the problem, and it develops its arguments with clarity and logic.

I finally feel competent to discuss the role of the Senate because I am now in my fifteenth year in this chamber.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Do I have to wait another eight years?

Senator Everett: Hopefully, yes.

This report contains two statements which I should like to read to you. The first one is found at page 3 and is a statement by Sir John A. Macdonald, when he was describing the British North America Act, and he said:

We have given to the General Legislature all the great subjects of Legislation. We have conferred on them, not only specifically and in detail, all the powers which are incident to sovereignty but we have expressly declared that all subjects not distinctly and exclusively conferred upon the local governments and local legislatures shall be conferred upon the General Government and Legislature. We have thus avoided that great source of weakness which has been the cause of disruption of the United States.

On page 7 of the report the committee makes the following statement:

It is generally accepted today that Canada should have a genuine federation in which each order of government would be sovereign within its own areas of jurisdiction.

Surely, it would be correct to say that if that statement is true we have departed a long way from the concept laid down by Sir John A. Macdonald. I personally am not sure that it is for the best. I think a country will have great difficulty existing if it is a group of sovereign powers or sovereign states. There are many reasons why this happened, and I will not review them for honourable senators because they are very much aware of them. It is true to say that the institutions that were created in 1867 did not perform in the way it was contemplated they would. In the vacuum that was created, the provinces assumed a role and a power that is now characterized as sovereignty.

The report itself proposes three major initiatives. It deals, first of all, with the extraordinary powers under the British North America Act. It proposes to eliminate reservation and disallowance. It does not say what it would do with the remedial power, but since, I believe, that has not been used since Confederation. I assume by implication it also indicates that this power would disappear.

Senator Roblin: It was tried once, and it did not work.

Senator Everett: It also proposes that provincial approval be required for certain uses of the declaratory, emergency and spending powers.

The second major initiative is that it establishes a new institution by constitutional amendment. It constitutionally creates the Conference of First Ministers, which is to be called the Federal-Provincial Council.

● (1520)

In the third major initiative it proposes to reform the Senate by constitutional amendment, so that the Constitution will say that the Senate is to protect regional, linguistic, minority and human rights.

It proposes increased representation for the west and for Newfoundland. Every second appointment would be from a list submitted by the provinces. The term would be 10 years, renewable each five years on the recommendation of a Senate committee. It proposes a six-month suspensive veto, but that the House of Commons would have to repass the legislation after six months if it were refused by the Senate.

It gives the Senate special powers to review and disallow regulations. It proposes standing committees on official languages and human rights, and it makes particularly interesting proposals in respect of the protection of regional rights. On page 41, under the heading "Regional Caucuses," it proposes:

To enable the Senate to discharge its responsibility for regional representation and protection more effectively, we recommend the establishment of all-party regional caucuses. They would constitute regional sounding-boards and identify the changing aspirations, needs and grievances of the Canadian regions and monitor the attitudes of provincial governments and legislatures toward federal legislation and programs.

It goes on to say, under the heading "Standing Committee on Regional Affairs":

We recommend the establishment of a new Standing Committee on Regional Affairs. The chairmen of the regional caucuses would form the nucleus of this committee. The committee's mandate would be to receive reports from the regional caucuses; to identify regional problems and to recommend the best means for dealing with them; to inform provincial governments of federal bills that might affect regional interests, and to invite them to present their views to this committee and to other appropriate committees of the Senate.

I believe there are many good ideas in the report for the reform of the Senate, and I should like to deal briefly with each of the areas that has been proposed.

[Senator Everett.]

In respect of the extraordinary powers, it seems to me that the new Bill of Rights, provided it passes, does permit the elimination of the reservation and disallowance powers. But I believe that the declaratory, emergency and spending powers should be retained. Even though they are rarely used, it seems to me that they are the hallmark of a country, and the right of the central government to intervene where it must do so is essential. If we make those powers subject, as the report proposes, to provincial consent in most areas, it seems to me that renders them virtually useless. The argument advanced in the report is that if you have these declaratory powers, and if the federal government can invoke them unilaterally, then that is not consistent with the concept of provincial sovereignty. I believe there is provincial sovereignty, but it must be less than the sovereignty of the central government.

Let us deal for a moment with the proposal for a Federal Provincial Council. Such a body would enhance the sovereignty and the power of the provinces. Even if it did not exist, federal-provincial meetings will occur; but I am very concerned about the suggestion that we institutionalize this as a means of resolving central and regional conflicts in Canada.

The Pepin-Robarts Task Force has this to say about intergovernmental conferences:

Executive federalism in Canada has done a great deal to adapt our federal system to changing circumstances and it has some remarkable achievements to its credit. To name only the most obvious: it has facilitated the implementation of fiscal equalization programs intended to reduce disparities among the provinces, to promote regional economic development, to provide basic health and social services up to a minimum standard across the country, and to negotiate a continuing transfer of financial resources and responsibilities from the central to the provincial governments.

But these successes should not hide the weaknesses of the process and its contribution to the present crisis of Canadian unity. The general public has been more aware of the dramatic public confrontations between central and provincial leaders which it has occasioned. The way in which the process has been conducted has often left provincial governments with the feeling that central government's choice of priorities and conditions has imposed a fait accompli upon them, distorting their own priorities, while the use of intergovernmental meetings by provincial leaders to score points against the central government for partisan advantage at home has exasperated representatives of the central government . . .

Another unfortunate side effect of the current form of intergovernmental relations in Canada is that it has developed outside the framework of our traditional democratic and parliamentary institutions and has sometimes seemed to be in competition, if not in conflict, with them.

The Prime Minister, speaking to the Council of Maritime Premiers in New Brunswick on June 1, said:

At the national level, the need for coordination has been met through increasingly frequent federal-provincial conferences, including First Ministers Conferences, and through a more and more formalized machinery of federal-provincial relations.

The question which now faces us is whether this form of national coordination and decision-making has gone about as far as it can go. They have many successes to their credit, these federal-provincial meetings, and we can take pride in them, but in some areas, especially the thorny ones of economic policy and economic management, in these areas, the record is less encouraging.

It seems to me that we have to find another way of getting regional input into the federal legislative process, and I emphasize that it is regional input, not provincial input. In this regard I agree with the tenor of the report. I believe that such an input would go a long way towards curing the regional alienation in this country.

We often look with disdain at the United States government's system, but their system has, to a large extent, dampened down regional alienation by giving an input to the regions in the policies of the federal government. I believe that the only agency, the only institution, that can do it is the Senate itself, and the question is: Can it fulfil this role?

What has happened with the Senate in the past? It is a fact that we have not, in this chamber, adequately represented regional interests. We have also in this chamber given the impression that we will refuse to pass legislation from the Commons. Senators will recall the wire tap bill in 1974. The wire tap bill was passed in the other place and the opposition forced an amendment which would require a person whose telephone was being tapped to be notified within 90 days, I believe it was, after the discontinuation of the tap. The bill came to the Senate and was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, and, as I understand it, representations were made on behalf of the police of the country. They said that it was an impossible provision and that many of the people whose phones were tapped were moving from place to place, and that the provision would require the police to inform the person that his phone was being tapped during the time that the tap was taking place.

● (1530)

The Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee agreed with the argument, and brought back a report to the Senate recommending removal of the amendment. The Senate accepted the report of the committee and passed the legislation, taking out the House of Commons amendment. The bill went back to the House of Commons. In the House of Commons, Mr. Stanley Knowles said, "We cannot permit the Senate to amend our legislation." They passed the legislation in its original form, with the unacceptable amendment, recessed and went home. The legislation came back here and we accepted the change: That creates the definite impression that we will not refuse to pass legislation.

It has not all been bad. We have done a good job in revising legislation to make it more workable. We have done a good job in the pre-study of important bills, and I think we have done an outstanding job in the investigatory work of our committees.

Senator Roblin: Hear, hear.

Senator Everett: I should like to deal specifically with the initiatives of the Senate in investigation and pre-study. First, I shall deal with investigation. The report outlines a number of Senate investigations that have taken place in the recent past. It is worth reading to see how comprehensive the work has been. It happened because we, as a Senate, took our own initiative. It was possible because, unlike the other place, we only require the permission of the Senate; we do not require the permission of the government. It is effective because of the lack of partisanship in Senate committees.

With respect to the matter of pre-study, as I say, we have done excellent work. I certainly endorse it. It is something the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance has been doing for many years, because the estimates are a form of pre-study of the appropriation bill.

However, if you think about it, it does indicate a weakness. We are doing it because we will not refuse the legislation coming from the other place. When a bill is given first reading in the other place, the substance of it is referred to a committee in this place. A study takes place and recommendations are made. There is then negotiation between the committee chairman and the minister responsible for the bill in the other place to see if the bill can be amended in the other place before it comes here. Now, if we had the reputation of being a body that would refuse to pass legislation pre-study would not be necessary.

Let me be clear. I think it is a marvellous device. But let me also be clear that, if we were prepared to refuse to pass legislation, it would not be necessary; and, if we had that reputation, can you imagine how much more clout our investigative reports would have in influencing the policy of government?

At one time I thought from our committee experience that we really could mandate our own reform. We lack no power other than the ability to introduce money bills. I thought we should make a declaration that we would review the regional impact of all federal legislation coming to us. We would take into account the provincial governments' views on federal bills affecting their interests; and we would state that, if those interests were offended, we would refuse to pass the legislation. We would also make it clear that, if we refused to pass the legislation, it would go off the order paper for one session, giving, as Sir John A. Macdonald put it, the elected representatives time to consult with the electorate so that, if in the next session they passed the bill again, we would also pass it.

I came to the conclusion that that really would not work. First, I did not think that that sort of initiative would be accepted by the Senate. It certainly would be unacceptable to the House of Commons. The first time we refused legislation, they would make an issue of it. If they made an issue of it, I doubt very much that an unelected house, frustrating the work of an elective house, would be acceptable to the public.

We have before us today an initiative taken by Senator Deschatelets and his group, otherwise known, I believe, as the "Dandurand group". Is that not correct, senator? I am not making that up. I have been told that you have been called the "Dandurand Group".

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: I have no objection to that. It would be with pride that we would hear ourselves called the "Dandurand group", because Dandurand is a well-known figure in Canadian and Quebec history. When we talk about Senator Dandurand, we are speaking of a great French-speaking Canadian who made his presence felt in Ottawa.

Senator Everett: I agree, and I am delighted that you take that attitude because, of course, the alternative would be to call it the "Deschatelets group".

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): They have been told they are not to be called a group; it is just "togetherness".

● (1540)

Senator Everett: Togetherness is very important. I want to say, though, that I have great respect for what the group is doing, because they underscore the fact that in this chamber we vote according to our conscience. Even though I attend the Senate Liberal caucus—I do not go to the national caucus—I still feel that I have the right to vote according to my conscience, and I think I have, in my time here, exercised that right. But it seems to me that the real shortcoming is the implication that the Senate would function without some sort of party system. If the "Dandurand group" grew large enough to embrace a majority, or a substantial minority of all senators, they would have to work out some accommodation with the parties, or they would have to form a party themselves; otherwise the business of the Senate would not be done. In fact, part of the concept, as I understand it, is that they wish to continue to be part of their respective parties, but to underscore the fact that they vote according to their consciences.

That does not give me the answer, though, and so I have this dilemma: I can say that the Senate can stay as it is today. I can say that we should take the initiative proposed in the report of the committee. I can say that the "Dandurand group" has the right idea. It seems to me, however, that none of these will answer the question as to how to provide regional input to federal legislation. I have come to the conclusion that the only way this can happen is if this body is elected.

Senator Roblin: Hear, hear.

Senator Everett: I believe it should be based on proportional representation—

Senator Roblin: Hear, hear.

Senator Everett:—or a similar concept that ensures regional representation. It would, under those circumstances, then reconcile national interests with regional aspirations. It would provide regional input to federal legislation, and it would be a forum where regional grievances could be heard. It seems to me that we are in the position where no initiative has yet been taken, and it is required. It seems to me that if the initiative stated in this report is taken, we still have the problem that, being an appointed body, we really cannot frustrate the work of the elected body and do it successfully with the public. Since regional representation has reached the stage where it is crucial, then I think the only answer is for this body to become an elected body.

Senator Roblin: Hear, hear. It looks as though we may have a new group forming here.

Hon. Robert Muir: I wonder if the honourable senator would permit a question. May I ask the honourable senator if those who hold that view—and I note that he was applauded by Senator Roblin—that the Senate should be an elected body, should not, in all sincerity, immediately resign from this place, which they have such distaste for, and run for the Commons, as many of us have done over the years, to be elected and re-elected, as in the case of my colleague, Senator Macquarrie? There were others who could not be elected, but who ended up here, having accepted the appointment, but who preach all over the country that this should be an elected body. They continue to sit here, however. Would the honourable senator not agree with me that that is a sound proposition?

Senator Everett: No, I do not necessarily think that that follows, in logic. One does not have to be outside the house to criticize what goes on inside it. I do not think that is an essential criticism, in logic.

Senator Muir: Would you not think it a contradiction, though, that someone, while sitting here, should keep putting forward the idea that this body should be elected? How can one, in all conscience and sensibility, sit here and say, "I am going to stay here, but I think we should be elected"?

Senator Everett: Well, I suppose the only way I can answer that is by saying that I probably could not get elected to anything.

On motion of Senator Marshall, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, June 22, 1981, at 8 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

STATEMENT BY SENATOR LAWSON

Hon. Edward M. Lawson: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. I wish to deal with the issue that arose in my absence concerning a number of senators who issued a declaration to the effect that they desired to sit together as an independent group.

I should explain at the outset that there was reference to a number of senators meeting to discuss this matter, and so on. I was not present at any such meeting, nor was I party to any. I did receive a telephone call from one honourable senator, who discussed with me the matter of voting independently and expressing that concern; and I indicated that I would experience no difficulty in sitting as an independent or being identified with a declaration about voting independently.

However, in the press reports across the country, and particularly in British Columbia, there was an indication that the reason why a number of honourable senators, which included me, were taking that position was that they wanted to be free from partisan dictates. I want to say immediately that I have never been involved in any way with partisan dictates.

In addition, there was some concern about loss of voting freedom. For the record, I say that I have never had any interference with my voting freedom, nor have I suffered any loss of it. On the contrary, I have had nothing but courtesy from the leader, the deputy leader and the whip on the government side, and I have received the same courtesy from the Leader of the Opposition and his whip.

The report went on to say that I was defecting from the Liberal Party. I find that very difficult to do. I have never been a member of the Liberal Party, or any political party, so it would be very difficult for me to defect, tempting as it may be.

The report went on to say that the 13 rebels were disgruntled over the government's Constitution resolution. For the record, I have already spoken on the issue of the Constitution, indicating that if the Supreme Court confirmed the government's position I would vote in favour of it, so it is also incorrect and inaccurate to suggest that I am in any way disgruntled over the resolution.

I am somewhat embarrassed by the whole situation, because I did say to the honourable senator who called me that I could be identified with the declaration about voting independently, as I have always been an independent. I am not a part of any Tory group, Liberal group or any other group. While endorsing those remarks, and expressing great respect for the people involved and their concerns, I would indicate that I have not been party to any meetings, I make no request to move my seat, I intend to remain an independent and I intend to sit right here.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate with a change in the list of members appointed to serve on the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

(For text of message, see today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.)

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) tabled:

Report of the Ministry of State for Science and Technology for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1980, pursuant to section 22 of the Ministries and Ministers of State Act, Part IV of Chapter 42, Statutes of Canada, 1970-71-72.

Report of the Canadian Chicken Marketing Agency, together with financial statements and the auditors' report thereon, for the year ended December 31, 1980, pursuant to section 31 of the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act, Chapter 65, Statutes of Canada, 1970-71-72.

Amendments to the Immigration Regulations, 1978, pursuant to section 115(3) of the Immigration Act, 1976, Chapter 52, Statutes of Canada, 1976-77.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Hon. William J. Petten, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Laird be substituted for that of the Honourable Senator Molson on the list of senators serving on the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Before Question Period begins, I should like to inform honourable senators that the Leader of the Government in the Senate, Senator Perrault, and the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, Senator Argue, will not be here this evening. They are out of town on government business.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I think we can see that.

Senator Frith: They could be late. I thought it courteous to explain that they will not be here rather than have you think they are just delayed.

QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

QUEBEC

MICMAC RESERVE, RESTIGOUCHE—INCIDENTS INVOLVING PROVINCIAL POLICE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): As a matter of fact, I had a question for the Leader of the Government and I regret, of course, his absence this evening because he surely enhances the tone of the debates in this House.

My question deals with the Restigouche incidents involving the Micmac Indians. I understand that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development stated following his trip to Restigouche that he is carrying on his meetings or his discussions with the Quebec authorities to find a solution to that situation which is becoming quite alarming. Could we now have a report on the matter.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will try to get some information and notify the Leader of the Government in the Senate. We will try to get a report in time for our sitting tomorrow.

AGRICULTURE

BANKING SYSTEM—ALLEGED STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. The Minister of Agriculture is quoted as stating to a convention at Nukko Lake, in northern central British Columbia, that the government will change the banking system if the chartered banks do not do something to help farmers. Assuming that the Minister of Agriculture was speaking for the government, would the Minister of State for Economic Development enlighten the Senate as to what changes to the Bank Act are being contemplated by the government should the chartered banks not act to help farmers?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, the Minister of Agriculture has made a number of suggestions with respect to some of those things that he and his department can do to help, in a situation where interest rates have risen rather sharply in the last few months, with respect to the Farm Improvement Loans Act, the Farm Credit Corporation, and so on.

The Minister of Agriculture is keenly interested in expanding this assistance at the present time. I must say, however, that when any announcements of government policy are made respecting changes to the chartered bank system or to the Bank Act, I expect they would be announced by the Minister of Finance.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I would expect so, too.

Senator Balfour: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of State for Economic Development, who is the second minister of the Crown today to disavow the comments made last week by the Minister of Agriculture. Is the Minister of State for Economic Development prepared to act frankly and responsibly and tell farmers that the Minister of Agriculture was inaccurate in saying that "some serious work is being done about changing the banking system"? And is the minister prepared to admit that, in fact, the government was acting cosmetically in trying to shift to the banking system the responsibility for the impact on farmers of high interest rates?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): The temptation is great to answer that question with a simple: No. The honourable senator must realize, however, that he has put a great deal of interpretation on some press release which was simply another interpretation of what the Minister of Agriculture said or is reported to have said. Obviously, such releases are never sufficiently informative to form the basis of the kind of definitive reply the honourable senator is seeking. It may be that the Minister of Agriculture was expressing certain of his views respecting the cost to farmers of escalating interest rates; or he may have made some suggestions for change. But I will certainly not agree that an interpretation by a senator of an interpretation by a reporter of some comments that reporter might have heard is written in stone. I should certainly have to see the whole context first, and I should also like to refer the matter to the Minister of Agriculture for his comments.

THE ENVIRONMENT

ACID RAIN—UNITED STATES ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION AGENCY—REPEAL OF AIR POLLUTION STANDARDS

Hon. Cyril B. Sherwood: Honourable senators, in the absence of the Leader of the Government I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. Is he able to confirm that the United States Environmental Protection Agency has proposed to repeal its air pollution standards restricting acid rain?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I shall take that question as notice and refer it to the appropriate minister for a more detailed answer. However, up to this point in time I have not heard any confirmation of that allegation.

Senator Sherwood: Should the standards be repealed, when the minister is making his inquiries will he ascertain if the United States would be breaching the agreement it signed with Canada last summer to work towards acid rain control?

Senator Olson: I will take that question as notice as well.

Senator Sherwood: Finally, honourable senators, assuming the accuracy of my statements, as I do—

Senator Marshall: They are accurate.

Senator Sherwood:—would either the leader or the minister inquire whether Canada has protested against such a policy change and determine what other action might be contemplated?

Senator Olson: I will take that question as notice too.

ENERGY

OIL—CANADA-MEXICO AGREEMENT

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. Last week—I believe on Tuesday—I asked the minister if Canada's contract with Mexico for oil purchases involved a flexible price which would reflect falling international prices. The minister took the question as notice. Can he answer it now?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I can answer orally that I did receive a reply and that, yes, it is true that the agreement with Mexico does include a clause with respect to indexation. In other words, if the offering price or export price from Mexico goes down, the price to the Canadian purchasers also goes down. That, indeed, is the case. That has happened. I believe that there was a reduction in price at the first of this month, but I am not absolutely sure of the date. I shall give a more detailed written answer tomorrow, spelling out the terms and conditions, but the brief answer is, as I stated at the beginning, that the price moves up and down, depending on Mexico's offer to the international market.

TRANSPORT

DEREGULATION OF AIR INDUSTRY

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question either for the Deputy Leader of the Government or for the Minister of State for Economic Development. According to the recent report made to the House of Commons by the Economic Council of Canada which, among other things, dealt with deregulation of the Air Industry, Air Canada should be stripped of all government protection and exposed to head-on-head competition with CP Air. The report went on to state that such competition would lead to a wider choice of fares and service for consumers and greater efficiency in the airlines.

I wonder if either the Deputy Leader of the Government or the Minister of State for Economic Development could indicate to the Senate the reaction of the government to that recommendation made by the Economic Council of Canada.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, the Government of Canada, including the minister directly responsible, has not made any comments on that recommendation or any of the suggestions made by the Economic Council of Canada in their report which dealt with that topic and several others. I expect that the Minister of Transport will make some comments in due course, but so far he has not had an opportunity to study it in sufficient depth to make any comments or recommendations on that particular suggestion.

ENERGY

ALBERTA—OIL PRODUCTION CUTBACK—SUGGESTED SURTAX REDUCTION

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question dealing with the subject of Alberta oil production cutbacks and a suggested surtax reduction. The answer comes as a result of questions put by Senator Balfour and Senator Austin on May 28. The question was, in effect, in light of the reduction in demand for oil in eastern Canada, whether the government will be required to expend all the import compensation subsidies collected under the Special Compensation Charge, and, if not, whether Canadians can anticipate any relief in this regard.

With regard to Senator Balfour's question about the level of the Special Compensation Charge and coincident compensation expenditures, we estimate that in the first three-month phase of the Alberta cutbacks compensation expenditures for incremental imports will exceed Special Compensation Charge revenues by $20 million. This results from the fact that, when the charge was first introduced, it was established at a level that would not result in more money being collected from the taxpayer than would be required to pay for the incremental imports.

Although there has been an unanticipated decline in domestic demand, the level of imports required as a result of the Alberta cutback, although reduced, cannot be expected to decline by an identical amount. This is due to the fact that the incremental imports are replacing very high quality western Canadian crude. To the extent that comparable quality imports are available, then a larger volume of inferior quality crude is required to meet light product demand.

Finally, we should add that Mr. Lalonde has indicated that, given eventual success in the negotiations between the federal and Alberta governments and the likely result that Alberta production would be restored, the Special Compensation Charge would be discontinued.

REQUESTS FOR ANSWERS

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, while we are on delayed answers to questions, and since we are approaching a recess, I should like to raise with Senator Olson and Senator Frith, and, perhaps through Senator Frith, with Senator Argue, the matter of certain questions which remain unanswered. I refer specifically to a question I addressed to Senator Argue which can be found in Debates of the Senate of April 22, 1980 at page 70. To the best of my knowledge, that question remains unanswered.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): What was the page number?

Senator Balfour: Page 70. The question was as follows:

I wish to ask Senator Argue a question supplementary to that asked by Senator Nurgitz. Could Senator Argue indicate to us what were the specific policy considerations that the government implemented when they cancelled the exemption from tax of capital gains on farming assets transferred to RRSPs? Was it a question of equity? Was it a question of revenue? Specifically why was this measure put into place?

The senator, in effect, took the question as notice.

On May 29, 1980, at page 348, I again posed a question to Senator Argue concerning the spread between current and future prices regarding rapeseed. To the best of my knowledge, no response to that question has been received.

Senator Frith: An announcement concerning rapeseed prices was made within the last couple of days, but that, I take it, does not deal with your question. I shall pass that information on.

Senator Balfour: On June 19, 1980, at page 510 of Debates of the Senate, I asked a supplementary question of the Minister of State for Economic Development concerning the importation of skilled labour by oil companies and female participation in job programs. My supplementary question was as follows:

Could the minister be more specific and explain precisely what mechanism is being contemplated as an alternative to some form of quota system?

Senator Olson replied:

If the honourable senator wishes that detail—and I appreciate that that would be useful to him—I shall take the question as notice and inquire of the minister.

Senator Donahoe: What's the hurry? That was only a year ago.

Senator Balfour: Finally, on November 28, 1980, on pages 1252-1253, I posed a question to the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate. To refresh the deputy leader's memory, the question was as follows:

[Senator Frith.]

Honourable senators, I have a question to direct to the Deputy Leader of the Government. It relates to a response he made on November 18, 1980, reported at page 1240 of Senate Hansard, during which he made the following statement:

I would also point out that with the pricing schedules for oil and gas included in this government's budget, the burden on the Canadian consumer up to 1984 is $40 billion less than the budget of the former government.

I then went on to say:

I realize the question will have to be taken as notice, but I would ask the honourable senator whether he would be prepared to table the details of the calculation by which he arrived at the $40 billion figure?

The honourable senator responded:

Honourable senators, the question just put by Senator Balfour is similar to a question put by Senator Marshall yesterday. I undertook then to try to get the necessary details.

Hon. Jack Marshall: I should also like to refer to six unanswered questions I asked between April 1980 and May 30, 1980, which, in all instances, the ministers responsible took as notice. I shall indicate the questions to the deputy leader so that he may refer to them.

Hon. Cyril B. Sherwood: Honourable senators, on December 16, 1980, I posed a question to the Leader of the Government.

Senator Donahoe: Lost in the Christmas mail.

Senator Sherwood: The question dealt with the impact of the extension of the federal sales tax to marginal manufacturing upon food prices. At that time Senator Perrault said:

Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice. As yet, I have not received an answer.

ENERGY MINES AND RESOURCES

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—SPRY POINT—ARK PROJECT

Question No. 63 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Heath Macquarrie:

With regard to the Ark at Spry Point, Prince Edward Island (i) what has been the total expenditure of the Government of Canada on construction and maintenance (ii) what financial contributions have been made by the Government of Prince Edward Island since 1976 (iii) what are the plans for the future development of this project?

Reply by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources:

The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources reports as follows:

(i) The Ark at Spry Point, Prince Edward Island was built by the federal government as a contribution to the United Nations Conference Habitat in 1976. The federal government, through the Department of Environment, contributed capital costs of $350,000 towards the construction of the Ark. Federal contributions to the cost of operating the Ark have been provided through the Canada-Prince Edward Island Renewable Energy Development Agreement since 1977. The cumulative federal expenditure on operation of the Ark amounts to some $1.1 million.

(ii) The provincial government provided the land on which the Ark was built through a one-dollar-a-year lease (assessed value of $164,000). The cumulative provincial contribution to the operating expenses has been approximately $100,000.

(iii) The Ark in Prince Edward Island has been run as a demonstration project for visitors, to demonstrate renewable sources of energy, measures in efficient use of energy, and ways of practising horticulture and aquaculture in a self-sufficient manner. In the past three years, the program at the Ark has also stressed scientific research in horticulture in energy efficient buildings which depend on renewable sources of energy. Plans for the future depend on negotiation between the federal and provincial governments.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called may I have leave to revert to Notices of Motions? The Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs asked me to request that his committee have power to meet while the Senate is sitting on June 23, 1981. Although I have not been given the reason for this request—perhaps the deputy chairman can tell us—I can only speculate that it is in anticipation of referral of three private bills. If that is the reason, then I will defer the matter until Motions are called.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I can only assume the honourable senator is correct. I have not yet been advised, but I understand from a discussion with Senator McIlraith that certain bills are to come before the committee and that there is some urgency about them.

Senator Frith: In that case, honourable senators, I will bring this matter up again under Motions.

PRIVATE BILLS

ONTARIO NEWS COMPANY, LIMITED—SECOND READING

Hon. George J. McIlraith moved the second reading of Bill S-20, to revive Ontario News Company, Limited and to provide for its continuance under the Canada Business Corporations Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this is a bill to revive a company, Ontario News Company, Limited, and to provide that it may seek to be continued under the Canada Business Corporations Act.

The company, which has its principal place of business in the city of Toronto, was incorporated on April 7, 1930, by letters patent issued under the old Companies Act. The company carries on business as a newspaper distributor.

Inadvertently, the company failed to file the annual returns required under the Canada Corporations Act. The Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs sent notices to the company and published a notice in the Canada Gazette advising the company that it would be dissolved if the returns were not filed. The default was never rectified and the company was, in fact, dissolved on June 24, 1967, although it has continued to carry on business since that time.

It was not until November 1980, when the solicitor for the petitioner attempted to file the documents necessary to continue the company under the Canada Business Corporations Act, that the petitioner learned of the 1967 dissolution. The deadline for continuance under the Canada Business Corporations Act was December 15, 1980. If a company failed to file for continuance by that date, it was automatically dissolved.

In this case, the petitioner learned too late of the dissolution of the company to arrange for its revival and continuance. Consequently, this bill provides for two things: it revives the company and deems it not to have been dissolved, and it gives the company three months in which to apply for a certificate of continuance under the Canada Business Corporations Act, notwithstanding the fact that it has missed the December 15, 1980 deadline for doing so.

This being a private bill, it is for the appropriate Senate committee to ascertain the acts and make sure they are as I have stated them. If and when second reading is given, I will, of course, be moving that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for examination of the allegations.

● (2030)

Perhaps at this point I should mention something that requires attention. Rule 95 of Rules of the Senate provides that:

A private bill originating in the Senate . . . shall not be considered by a committee until after one week from the date of referral to such committee—

If this bill receives second reading and is referred to committee, I shall suggest to honourable senators that it and two other bills be dealt with immediately, notwithstanding rule 95.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator McIlraith moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Motion agreed to.

SUSPENSION OF RULE 95

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, as I indicated on second reading, it seems to me that rule 95 should be suspended in relation to this bill.

Therefore, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move:

That rule 95 be suspended with respect to Bill S-20, to revive Ontario News Company, Limited and to provide for its continuance under the Canada Business Corporations Act.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

G.A. BARBER & SONS LIMITED—SECOND READING

Hon. George J. McIlraith moved the second reading of Bill S-21, to revive G.A. Barber & Sons Limited and to provide for its continuance under the Canada Business Corporations Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill is similar to the one we have just dealt with and is to revive G.A. Barber & Sons Limited and to provide for its continuance under the Canada Business Corporations Act.

This company has its principal place of business in the Township of Georgina, in the Regional Municipality of York. It was incorporated in 1946 by letters patent issued under the old Companies Act. From the date of its incorporation, the company was in the business of sheet metal and air conditioning work. Since 1969 the company has ceased to be an operating company and presently limits its activities to the holding of two mortgages against property in that township.

Again, through inadvertence, annual returns were not filed and the company was dissolved, for failure to file such returns, in April 1979. Again, the petitioner did not learn of the dissolution until his solicitor had applied for continuance of the company under the Canada Business Corporations Act just before the deadline for applying for certificates of continuance in December 1980. Perhaps I need add nothing more at this stage.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator McIlraith moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Motion agreed to.

SUSPENSION OF RULE 95

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move:

[Senator McIlraith.]

That rule 95 be suspended with respect to Bill S-21, to revive G.A. Barber & Sons Limited and to provide for its continuance under the Canada Business Corporations Act.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

EASTERN DIVERSIFIED COMPANY LTD.—SECOND READING

Hon. George J. McIlraith moved the second reading of Bill S-22, to revive Eastern Diversified Company Ltd. and to provide for its continuance under the Canada Business Corporations Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill is similar to the last two. In this case, Eastern Diversified Company Ltd. has its principal place of business in the City of Montreal and was incorporated on November 2, 1972 by letters patent issued under the Canada Corporations Act for objects appropriate to manufacturing and dealing in packaging material.

For reasons similar to those applying in the case of the other two bills, the company was dissolved on March 17, 1979. The officers of the company were not aware of its dissolution until they attempted to file articles of continuance in December 1980. Consequently, they are now asking that the company be continued subject to making an application for continuance within three months from the date of the passage of this bill.

There is, however, one fact that distinguishes this bill from the two preceding bills. The petitioner in this case is not a Canadian citizen. There is a general rule, as honourable senators know, that aliens cannot petition the Canadian Parliament. However, exceptions to this rule were made in 1878 and 1883 in the case of applications for private bills relating to the incorporation of federal companies. The rule, therefore, is not enforced in the case of applications for private bills.

I do not think there is anything further I need add at this point.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator McIlraith moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Motion agreed to.

SUSPENSION OF RULE 95

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move:

That rule 95 be suspended with respect to Bill S-22, to revive Eastern Diversified Company Ltd. and to provide for its continuance under the Canada Business Corporations Act.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have power to sit while the Senate is sitting tomorrow, June 23, 1981, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

THE ESTIMATES

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, June 17, the debate on the consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance of the estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1982, which was presented on June 10, 1981.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would just like to say a few words about supplementary estimates (A), and to echo the concern expressed by Senator Smith with respect to the way in which it is intended to treat the revenues and expenditures of the oil import compensation fund. The oil import compensation fund tax, as I refer to it, raises some $4 billion-plus, which is a lot of money even in a budget as large as we have at the present time, and the proposal appears to be that it will be deposited in a revolving fund, so that we will only be able to deal with any excess or deficit with respect to what comes in and what goes out. This will have the effect, of course, of nominally reducing the size of the budget by some $4 billion, more or less, and it seems to me to be a policy that will require considerable justification before being approved by this chamber.

It is similar, of course, to a provincial government's deciding that it is going to impose a gasoline tax, which is spent on roads, and putting that in a revolving fund. You put the gasoline tax money in a revolving fund and take the roads money out of it, and only show the surplus or the deficit in the accounts of the government as an item in the estimates.

I think that would be a poor policy for any province to follow, just as I think the revolving fund in the oil import compensation matter would be a poor policy for the federal government to follow, because it prevents full disclosure of what is going on, and therefore, in a sense, disguises the transaction. If there is a solid reason why it should be done, I have yet to hear it, and it seems to me that until such a proposal is placed before us with adequate justification, we should expect the National Finance Committee to investigate the matter and not allow it to proceed without some further comment from that committee and possibly from this chamber.

The real substance of what I have to say tonight, however, honourable senators, has to do with the general appropriations which are being reported upon by the National Finance Committee to this house. I suppose it is entirely appropriate that the bulk of the report of the committee should be concerned with and focused upon the state of the economy, and, in particular, inflation in Canada today, because there is no doubt, I would think, that this is the gravest economic and—just as important—social malady that our nation is struggling with at the present time, and it deserves all the light that can be thrown upon it.

This situation, I think, is clearly reflected in the evidence that the committee obtained from the questions that were posed in the committee, and in the two interesting and, I may say, excellent speeches which have already been made on this subject by the Honourable Senator Everett and the Honourable Senator Lamontagne.

It is said sometimes that economics is the dismal science. I do not think it is that at all. I think it is a modern art form, because the scientific content of much economic verbiage today is more conspicuous by its absence than its presence. Sometimes, in fact, economic discussions remind one of the arcane disputations of medieval theology, and although we do not entirely get down to how many angels may dance on the head of a pin, we sometimes get pretty close to it. It seems to me, however, that I can admit this, that inflation is no simple problem, and that there is no simple cure that we can find for it. The more we look into it, the more perplexing it becomes. The difficulty of the problem, I think, is illustrated by the two speeches to which I have referred, both of which held my interest, and which I thought were excellent presentations, but diametrically opposed in character, in analysis and in remedy. I only wish that I had the time, or you had the patience, to proceed with a dissection of the arguments that were presented on both sides of this question.

I dare say that not all of us would wish to follow Senator Everett as far as he went in his very firm and, indeed, one might say, extreme espousal of monetarism; in fact, I got the impression that he out-Boueyed Governor Bouey on that point. I am not sure that all of us, either, would wish to follow Senator Lamontagne in his analysis all the way to his final conclusion which, as far as I could tell, pointed directly to the imposition of a full set of controls if nothing else could be found to work. I am sure that most of us would hope that somewhere along the line we could avoid such extreme approaches to this problem as have been suggested to us.

Senator Lamontagne: I agree.

Senator Roblin: Senator Lamontagne agrees. Well then, that is a good way to start. I hope that we will end on the same note of agreement.

I would like to say a word or two about the analysis of Governor Bouey's policy, because today that has to be the thing that is directly in front of us. It is the matter which has to be given some consideration in the first instance.

● (2050)

The policy being followed by the Bank of Canada is based on the assumption that our economy is overheated. It is based on the assumption that we are trying to squeeze out of it more than is in it. It is based on the assumption that we are in a situation of demand-pull. On that diagnosis of the problem, we are offered a remedy. As we know it, that remedy is that we should cool the economy off, that we should limit the money supply, that we should increase interest rates and, in general, do our best to slow things down. Of course, as Governor Bouey frankly admitted, that remedy inevitably means less jobs, not more jobs. It probably means—and I think it inevitably means—less production, not more production.

However, is it a fact that we have a demand-pull situation here? Does that overheating of which Governor Bouey spoke exist?

Senator Lamontagne had some interesting thoughts on that subject. Are we pressing against the productive ceiling of our economic machine? Are we pressing against the maximum output of our work force? Of course, Governor Bouey thinks so, and that is the keystone of his policy. Not only Senator Lamontagne, but also Dr. Slater of the Economic Council of Canada talks as if underemployment, rather than the diagnosis offered by the bank, is really part of our problem.

There is some evidence, of course, in support of Governor Bouey's position. The boom taking place in Alberta would certainly fit his description of an overheated economy. However, against that one example—and it is the only example that comes easily to my mind—there are other signs which might tend to lead in the opposite direction. Capacity utilization rates form a very useful measure of the way in which an economy is working and whether or not it is pushing against the ceiling. The Bank of Canada reports these figures.

The 1980 report of the Bank of Canada showed the rate at which the productive machine is working in several categories. For example, with respect to durable goods, we have to go back to 1963 to find a period in which the machine was working more easily, more comfortably, and less under pressure than it is today. It has been far worse in recent years. When we look at non-durable output pressing against capacity, we see there is more of an argument in that case. However, if we go to manufacturing industrial capacity, we find that we must go back to 1962 and 1963 before we find a period of time when it was working under as easy and slack a situation of pressing against capacity as we have today. I find it difficult to reconcile Governor Bouey's view with the figures that he reports.

I should like to consider the matter of employment. Senator Everett got involved in a question on the matter of employment, and he expressed the view that perhaps 7 per cent was the correct level of unemployment in the country that would fit with a fully employed economy. I do not know about that. All I know is that the level of unemployment was 7.5 per cent in 1980. However, if we look at the breakdown, we see some interesting highlights on the subject. In my own province, unemployment was not 7.5 per cent; it was 5.5 per cent—below the national average—and I can take an oath on the Bible that the economy in Manitoba is not overheated. In fact, the complaint there is that it could do a little more work than it is doing now.

The level of unemployment in the province of Ontario, which is 6.9 per cent, is below the national average. I have not heard any real complaint from people in Ontario to the effect that they are working so hard that they are pressing against the productive capacity and the maximum ability of the people to produce.

In the province of Quebec, unemployment is at the level of 9.9 per cent, which is even less an overwork situation. Of course, in Newfoundland—which is our favourite whipping boy in this respect—unemployment reached the level of 13.5 per cent in 1980, and no one would call that economy overheated.

Therefore, it seems to me that we have a real question here. In a situation where two-thirds of our population have unemployment rates which are under the national average—obviously not in an overheated position—how can it be said that the nation as a whole is under this demand-pull situation with 7½ per cent unemployment, which is the Bouey theory? I find myself having some difficulty in accepting his diagnosis when we have this situation respecting the capacity figures and the unemployment figures.

A cogent question was asked—I believe it was Senator Smith who asked it; he is good at asking cogent questions—of one of the speakers as to how much unemployment he needed in order to cool off the economy. I believe that is an excellent question, and I know that the same question was raised in the committee. I cannot report that we came to any conclusions in the matter. However, it seems to me that if the extreme monetarist route is followed—perhaps used as the main instrument in the fight against inflation—that question must be faced up to. Who is going to lose his job in order to do this? What do we do about seeing that there is some visible equity, some visible equality, in the sacrifices that are asked to be made? How much unemployment do you want? That is a legitimate question when you are dealing with the monetarist approach to economic affairs.

[Senator Roblin.]

Let us give the Governor of the Bank of Canada the benefit of the doubt and, for the sake of the argument, assume that he is on the right track—and he may well be. The policy of monetary control, that of getting a good grip on the supply of money in the country, is not something brand new. It has been in use for five or six years. The capacity of the bank to keep the supply of money within its own self-devised limits—which I think are reasonable ones—has been quite good. In the five or six years since this policy was started, the bank has been successful in lowering the rate of expansion of the money supply in the way that it thought was good for the country. However, in spite of this success, inflation has perversely continued to get worse. It is worse now than when we started, and it is at present heading towards a level of 13 per cent.

Match that with the public state of mind with regard to inflationary expectations, which were set out to us so clearly by the governor himself when he reported to the committee. Consider the expectations of the public that inflation is worse and is going to get worse; that inflation in Canada is worse than that in the United States and will stay worse than that in the United States. One has to say that those expectations comprise a massive vote of no confidence in the monetary policy that is being pursued at the present time. Of course, I must give the governor of the bank credit because he said that his system may not be working too well:

We have met our money supply targets every year, which is a bit of an embarrassment when you consider that things did not work out.

I think that is a fair statement of the case and I present it to you as such. However, I think we have to admit that Governor Bouey and the bank and monetary control and interest rates—which I will come to in a moment seem to be all we are doing in the battle against inflation. We are not making any other diagnosis except for that of Governor Bouey. His is the official diagnosis which is endorsed by the government as being the correct one. The government backs Governor Bouey to the hilt—and it had better, because whatever else you may say about it, he is the only man in the country who is exercising a determined and rigorous effort in an attempt to deal with inflation according to his definition. Therefore, I think that fact must be acknowledged.

It follows from that that it must be recognized that, apart from supporting Governor Bouey, the government of the country is doing precious little about any other aspects of this matter. When you talk about inflationary expectations, you are dealing with an art form; you are not dealing with a dismal science. It is an art form, because the expectations of people are what make economies go. If I remember correctly, it was J. M. Keynes who said that it was the activities of men believing and determining to do things that make an economy what it is rather than any other factor. I wish I could remember the lapidary phrase by which he expressed that thought—which I have expressed rather clumsily—but I believe it is true.

The public needs more than Governor Bouey. The people of this country need a signal from the government; some kind of an indication that the government believes that inflation is wrong and should be stopped and that it is willing to take effective steps to do something about it.

Take, for example, the attitude towards the public debt. I find worrisome the complacency with which some speakers approach the question of the size of the public debt. When we have a large debt, it is worrisome because the government needs to borrow—and needs to do so on a massive scale—the savings of Canadians. The government has the right, under Bill C-59, to borrow $14 billion—not for productive investment, I will have you know, but for the most part to pay interest on past borrowings. Next year we shall be borrowing money to pay the interest on the interest.

Someone calculated that, if we had no deficit but were on a pay-as-you-go basis, there would be a need to increase federal taxes 30 per cent in order to support the current level of spending on the federal books. I think it is patently inadvisable for me to recommend that tomorrow morning we should raise the tax load 30 per cent in order to pay as we go. I am not proposing that at all, but it does give some idea of the size, the implication and the impact of the deficit policy we are now following and, apparently, are to continue to follow in many respects in the next little while.

If the economy is overheated, I think the most ardent Canadian you could meet would be the first to tell you that, “You had better try to reduce your deficit a little and try to balance your budget a little more.” If Governor Bouey and his friends believe that the economy is being overheated, why are they not saying something about that aspect of the Keynesian theory and the deficit we have before us now?

Dr. Slater forecasts another interesting fact: that the investment decade ahead of us will be one of unprecedented proportions. That means we shall require the savings of Canadians as never before, and on a scale never before known, to invest in capital projects in this country. Of course, one need only make passing reference to the tremendous sums required for the energy industry to know why Dr. Slater takes that stance. It follows, therefore, that there is some reason to avoid a crowding out by the government of the private sector in the capital markets of this country. This year the federal government will issue 50 per cent of all the bonds that are expected on the Canadian market. If one does not think that has some effect on crowding out private investment, then I think one has to think again.

The problem is that not even inflation can bail out the federal government's financial problems. Sometimes you say, “Oh, well, inflation! If we make a bad investment or do something that we would not ordinarily do, it doesn't matter; inflation will bail us out.” That is a common thought these days: we can make mistakes or borrow money at 22 per cent, knowing that inflation will bail us out; and some of us do it.

Now we have interest at usurious rates, and I have to say that not only the monetary supply but also the usurious interest rates being charged these days are not conspicuously anti-inflationary. The idea is, of course, that if you get interest rates high enough, consumers and businessmen will borrow less and buy less. Yet all of us know now, by merely looking around us, that it is simply not working that way.

On June 18 Statistics Canada came out with a rather plaintive report in which they point out that, whatever else is going on, high interest rates do not seem to be working to dampen inflation. That is true, but what they do not say—or, if they did, I did not notice it in the article—what they do not say is that, in spite of this, the impact of these high interest rates is grossly inequitable. Many of the larger economic units can pass high interest rates along, but there is a whole sector of our economy in which that does not apply. The evidence is piling up everywhere you look that the farming community, the small business community and some homeowners are being badly squeezed and are, in some cases, being bankrupted by this policy of high interest rates.

I would ask anyone here if he considers that to be an anti-inflationary success. I suggest it is not. I suggest that it indicates that this tool we are using is grossly inequitable, particularly in view of the fact that it does not at the moment appear to be doing the job with any perceptible degree of efficiency.

We might also take note of the fact that the federal government itself has to bear part of this burden, because according to a recent estimate made by Informetrica Limited, the rise of interest rates since 1979 has added between $2 billion and $4 billion to federal interest costs. That increase in costs will continue right on down the line until those particular financial instruments are paid off in 10, 15 or 20 years' time.

But there is an ironic aspect to this matter, and I think Senator Lamontagne suggested it. I think he suggested to us that the major reason for high interest rates may not have so much to do with Canadian inflation as some people say; it may have a lot more to do with it indirectly, because it is a system of high interest rates arising out of concern for the Canadian dollar. The Bank of Canada's position, and I suppose it may be correct, is that a low Canadian dollar means more Canadian inflation, so we need a high interest rate to keep our money at home and to keep the Canadian dollar higher to minimize its effect of higher inflation rates. I believe Dr. Slater, of the Economic Council of Canada, and, if my memory is correct, my honourable friend Senator Lamontagne both made the suggestion that anti-inflationary gains arising from a high interest rate and a high Canadian dollar may in fact be eaten up by adverse domestic costs. Clearly, that is a possibility. We know that, if inflation does not come down, these high interest rates are passed right through in the inflationary structure. Well, it is not coming down. We know what it is doing in terms of paying for the government debt, because I have just given you the figures. We know what it is doing to the most productive job-creating sector of our society, small business, because we see it on every hand. It is perfectly clear that there is a possibility that high interest rates and the defence of the Canadian dollar bring with them consequences which are inflationary just as much as they bring with them consequences which are anti-inflationary, but the possibility that the gains from this anti-inflationary policy have been eaten up by adverse domestic costs has been ignored far too long. It is time that our policymakers, particularly our federal government policymakers, had a view on this. It is time a study was done on this, so that we might be sure where the balance of advantage really lies and whether the pain is worth the effort.

Apart from anything else, of course, it is perfectly clear that we need a host of more specific policies. Governor Bouey, who is getting "Hail, Columbia!" from all sides—and in some respects he is the only honest cardplayer in the game because at least he is conscientiously doing his best, and one must recognize that—called for a host of more specific policies. How discouraging it must be for him to see so little being done by the federal authorities on the fiscal side and in respect of other economic measures that might be brought to bear against inflation.

When the governor appeared before our committee, it was clear, as I have said, that he himself called for a host of more specific policies. How right he was. Mr. Stewart, the Deputy Minister of Finance, says that too much reliance seems to be placed on monetary policy. I couldn't agree more. The committee's summary made it clear. Our witnesses stressed that an appropriately applied fiscal policy might be more equitable—indeed, yes; it could hardly be less—and specific than monetary policies are in the anti-inflationary battle. So, whatever one may think of Governor Bouey's efforts, he is struggling alone. The federal policy is clearly a policy of stand by and wait: "Let him take the heat, and let us hope that by the time our turn comes"—and come it will—"the heat will have dissipated somewhat." We shall wait and see what happens.

I would add one further area of concern. As well as the monetary system and fiscal policies, I do not see why Canadians should suffer from self-inflicted inflationary wounds, and that is precisely what we are doing in one important sector of our affairs. When Governor Bouey was asked the question: "What is the single most important thing that should be done in the anti-inflationary fight?" he said nothing about taxes or the deficit. He did not talk about wage and price controls or any of those subjects. What he said was that the single most important thing the government could do to fight inflation was to settle the energy dispute—that is the highest priority. I must say, with some regret, that that particular opinion of his escaped the compilers of our report that is before the house, because I do not believe it is in there, although it is in the testimony before the committee.

We are suffering from an energy policy which is, in effect, a self-inflicted inflationary wound of significant proportions. I ask honourable senators to consider in that respect the strength of the Canadian dollar and the problems of maintaining the strength of the dollar. The problem of maintaining the Canadian dollar is at the root of our high interest rates—and I think everyone will admit that—yet our oil policy is designed to weaken the Canadian dollar. Can honourable senators imagine that the experts who advise the Honourable Mr.

Lalonde told him last October that the NEP is a great thing, that it will strengthen the Canadian dollar? I wonder if all the advice which he receives is on a par with that particular piece of advice. Undoubtedly, some of it is. But he was told—the poor man; I suppose we can't blame him because he probably believed it—that the national energy policy would strengthen the Canadian dollar. Yet everything that has happened since then indicates what a gross miscalculation that piece of information is and continues to be. The national energy policy has been a policy that weakens the Canadian dollar and makes it necessary to maintain high interest rates, if we follow Governor Bouey's policy.

Let us take a look at the consequences. What does it do? First of all, it discourages foreign oil money coming into Canada. It checks foreign investment in our oil business and, I am quite certain, its influences go further than that because in international economic circles one cannot separate the attitude towards oil and a general perception of the Canadian investment climate for foreigners.

I make bold to say that there is an undoubted general reflection against investment in Canada arising from the national energy policy, in addition to the direct implications of what we are doing, and this at a time when everybody knows that we need foreign capital to balance the books. I do not care whether one is for or against Canadianization—I happen to be for it—but you have to have foreign money to balance the books if you want your dollar to stay up there and avoid all the evils that Governor Bouey sees from a low Canadian dollar.

What are you going to do about it? The national energy policy is retarding oil self-sufficiency. As we all know, the whole thing is in the deep freeze. In fact, it is in the deep freeze at Cold Lake, if you will allow me to say so. Somebody said that it costs $3 million a day, every day there is a delay in the decision on Cold Lake. But, regardless of that, the national energy policy has retarded oil self-sufficiency, not only because these major policies are in the deep freeze and are not available to us but also because conventional exploration cannot be as vigorous as it was. The policy is reducing the cash flow of Canadian companies just as much as anybody else by 20 or 30 per cent, and one does not need any mathematical calculation to show how that will express itself in reducing conventional exploration.

So the national energy policy hurts exploration because we must buy more foreign oil with foreign money at $40-or-what-ever a barrel. There is no question of using Canadian money to buy this oil because it would not be accepted. Our balance of payments reflects this, and it is worth billions of dollars which are being paid out to OPEC and other suppliers. The effect of these costs on the Canadian dollar is to weaken it.

The national energy policy's baleful influence does not stop there. Because of it there has been a massive shift, mostly in Canadian oil companies, the kind we are supposed to be helping. They are shifting their money, men and machinery out of Canada because they can get a better deal in the United States. That does not mean that everybody is doing that or that there is not a great deal of investment going on within Canada, because there is, but there could be a lot more investment within this country. If we are interested in self-sufficiency and in maintaining our economic posture through the value of the dollar, then, when these people go looking somewhere else, it does not do us very much good.

The national energy policy hurts self-sufficiency. This low-price policy has retarded conservation and substitution which, again, increases our demand for foreign oil, requiring foreign money to pay for it. What is perhaps even worse, though, is that it postpones into the indefinite future the inflationary pressures we have today.

Incredibly—and I use that word advisedly—the national energy policy, through its tax implications, forces Canadians to leave Canadian oil in the ground. Can you believe it? Here we are looking for self-sufficiency and a way of reducing our demand for foreign money to pay for these imports and this policy. As I have said to this house before, there are 70 companies in the Weyburn area under PanCanadian Oil management with hundreds of marginal wells which are now abandoned. In rough terms, this means that four million barrels a year are being left in the ground as a result of this policy. Surely, that is unnecessary. Surely, this cannot be advisable and desirable in any way one looks at the national interest.

Premier Blakeney is no oil company stooge. Whatever else he may be, he certainly cannot be described as being a spokesman for the big oil interests. According to his estimate, over three years, oil production in the province of Saskatchewan will be reduced by 40 million barrels, each one of which will be replaced by OPEC oil at OPEC prices, with its resultant effect on the Canadian exchange and the Canadian dollar. He estimates that there will be a 60 per cent decline in wells drilled. And for what? What is the purpose of this kind of policy which strangles our oil production and our self-sufficiency goals of which we may approve? Surely, this kind of thing is not necessary and must not be allowed to continue.

Recently, a question was asked of Senator Everett which allowed him to express his opinion of Premier Lougheed. Though Senator Everett is not here this evening—and I do not like to comment on what he said when he is absent—

Hon. Daniel Riley: But you noticed that he is absent.

Senator Roblin: I noticed he is absent, and I regard him as one of the more enlightened—

Senator Riley: Then it is an indirect thrust.

Hon. G. I. Smith: We do not know when he will be back.

Senator Roblin: I regard him as one of the more enlightened, progressive and intelligent members of this body, so, perhaps, if he chose not to listen to my speech, he must have known what he was doing.

Senator Riley: Then why throw barbs at him?

Senator Roblin: I am not going to throw barbs at him; I am going to make a remark because he said that he thought that Premier Lougheed was not doing a very good job.

Senator Riley: Then why did you mention that he was not present?

Senator Roblin: If you want to make a speech, then you get up on your feet and make one.

Senator Riley: I shall make one.

Senator Roblin: I shall make my speech while I am on my feet.

Senator Riley: You cannot make one as long as you are—

Senator Roblin: If you don't like it, why don't you leave? There is nothing keeping you here.

Senator Riley: I want to listen to your remarks.

Senator Roblin: Oh, you want to hear it all.

Senator Riley: You are the most erudite senator in the house.

Senator Roblin: Is that so? Well, that is a very pleasant remark and we shall leave our interchange on that note.

I shall put it this way: Whatever else one might think of Lougheed—and I think there is plenty of room to criticize him—to say that he has been insensitive to this matter in the way that was mentioned in this house, I believe, is a little unfair. One way or another, the natural resource of his province is being supplied to the people of Canada at something less than half price. I know of no other province which has disposed of any of its natural resources on such a generous basis.

● (2120)

An Hon. Senator: Ontario.

Senator Roblin: I have no information on that score.

I believe that should be taken into account when weighting the balance. You may think that he is too stubborn or that Mr. Lalonde is too stubborn. Those two points of view are certainly debatable. However, I think one should recognize that, at the present time, Premier Lougheed is disposing of an asset at a great deal less than its world value, no matter how that world value is arrived at.

The United States went to world oil prices. That was one of President Reagan's moves. It is interesting to note that this did not have the permanent drastic effect on inflationary costs that people had been expecting. The Economist commented that Mr. Reagan's most successful economic action so far had been his decontrol of oil prices. It stated that, in the period of January to March, this made him unpopular because gasoline prices were rising at the ghastly annual rate of 64 per cent—much the same as ours. By April they were falling. OPEC had been weakened and the exchange value of the dollar strengthened while the surge in America's petroleum investment had become an important source of new economic growth.

There is a lesson there for us. I think that if we were to deal promptly with our oil-pricing situation it would have a strengthening effect on our dollar, and would provide an important source of new economic growth. Japan and West Germany have had to swallow high oil prices.

[Senator Roblin.]

On the subject of oil prices, Dr. Slater said:

There have been some lost opportunities as a result of the continued indecision over energy policy. Nevertheless, the main effect has been to delay economic improvement to later in the decade and early in the 1990s.

Is that what we were looking for when the NEP came in?

Dr. Stewart, the Deputy Minister of Finance, reviewed the impact of increased energy prices over the short term on other western economies. The overall impression is that their inflation rate did not increase notably faster than Canada's did under an energy-cost subsidy policy.

Those important statements of opinion bear on the nub of this problem insofar as it affects Ontario and central Canada, for example, with respect to the effect of energy prices and what the result will be of abandoning the NEP pricing policy that we now have before us.

I come back to my principal witness, Governor Bouey. He is the man who said that settlement of the energy policy was the biggest single move that could be made to deal with inflation at the present time.

Speaking for myself, I think that certain aspects of the NEP are worthy of very serious consideration. Most of us would like to see self-sufficiency in oil; most of us would like to see a fair share going to the federal tax collector; and most of us would like to see Canadianization of the oil industry take place at a reasonable rate. But the way in which the National Energy Program mobilizes to achieve these ends is unnecessarily counter-productive and, I submit, self-wounding. I understand that is why Governor Bouey gave the oil and gas settlement first priority in his battle against inflation.

A reformed federal oil and gas policy could be a positive and significant contribution to the anti-inflationary program. It would reduce the downward pressure on the Canadian dollar; it might make lower interest rates more possible than they are at the present time; and it would certainly soothe some of our inflationary ills.

I make it clear that I do not believe this is any cure-all. It would still call for fiscal responsibility, for deficit control, for fiscal restraint, for supply-side initiatives, and for measures to bring some equity into the sacrifices and the difficulties which present policies cause many Canadians. I believe all of these things are necessary but, it seems to me, this house would do well to take into consideration the message that Governor Bouey left with us—that the single most important economic anti-inflationary problem we have ahead of us is the energy policy that the Canadian government is following at the present time.

To get back to my theme—economics, a dismal science; economics, an art form; and inflationary expectations. It seems to me that one of the most serious problems that we have to face is the question of inflationary expectations because, no matter how quickly or effectively we bring some of these policies into effect, unless people are convinced that somebody means business and that effective anti-inflationary measures will be implemented, our job will be twice as difficult.

The Government of Canada can give a signal in many ways, and I have discussed some of them this evening. I believe that, if they are able to arrive at an energy solution which will reduce the pressure on the Canadian dollar, improve the prospects for economic growth and bear more equitably on the various sectors of the economy, this one step, which would be taken tomorrow, would be to the advantage of all Canadians.

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: I should like to ask a question of Senator Roblin. I think that the analysis he has just presented this evening is in parallel with that which I presented. I believe that twice in my speech I mentioned the importance of reaching a satisfactory arrangement on oil prices and on the National Energy Program.

However, I think Senator Roblin has left a vacuum because he said that, while an improved energy policy would be a move in the right direction, it would not be a panacea. I did not note, in his speech, how he would propose to deal with what I call supply-push inflation. Would he care to comment on that?

Senator Roblin: I freely acknowledge that Senator Lamontagne showed a distinct interest in the same question I was speaking of tonight; there is no doubt about that.

I must confess that I find it impossible to present a fully articulated policy for either demand-pull or supply-push. Without exhausting the patience of even the most charitable listener, I cannot present a fully articulated discussion of that matter.

It seems to me that oil policy would have a marked effect on the supply side if it were able to call forth the investment required to advance self-sufficiency in Canada. There are many other points which could be mentioned in that respect, and I know Senator Lamontagne did mention a number. I find myself in agreement with a good many points he made.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

NORTHERN PIPELINE

THIRD REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the third report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline, entitled "Enhanced Oil Recovery in Canada", tabled in the Senate on April 2, 1981.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, in moving the adoption of the third report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline, my first words must be ones of commendation to and appreciation of the members of the committee who undertook to examine a very difficult technical subject, and an area of interest that is within the domain of only the most technically capable individuals in the industry. However, I believe that during our examination, while we did not become petroleum geologists or reservoir engineers, we did gain a deep insight into the practices and procedures of the petroleum industry, especially with respect to recovery techniques. Through our determination we produced a timely and important report—timely because it comes when we are embarking on this journey to self-sufficiency, and important because it draws the attention of the public and the Senate to a significant area which could make a worthwhile contribution to that goal of self-sufficiency in the 1990s.

Our inquiry consisted of hearings in Ottawa where we heard and received evidence from industry, government and research institutes. In addition, the subcommittee visited Calgary, where we spent two days interviewing industry officials, and one day at Lloydminster, Alberta, where we examined enhanced recovery installations in that heavy oil field.

Honourable senators, we can hold meetings in Ottawa and discuss aspects of policy, but it is only when we go out into the field that we gain a real knowledge and appreciation of the problems. When we stood in the field at Lloydminster and saw an injection well with the 12 producers surrounding it, enhanced recovery or tertiary recovery made sense.

On behalf of the committee, I would like to express our appreciation to all those who appeared before us with briefs and who contributed otherwise to our inquiry.

What is enhanced oil recovery or tertiary recovery? The committee accepted the general industry definition as being the recovery of that oil which can be economically recovered from an underground reservoir over and above that which is recovered by primary or secondary methods. In explaining enhanced recovery I must explain exactly what primary recovery and secondary recovery are, because they precede enhanced recovery. To do this I must revert to the original discovery of the underground reservoir. It has its genesis in the mind of the petroleum geologist working for the oil company or on his own, and dealing with geological information that is available from wells previously drilled in a particular area, seismic information, surface contour or other geological information which delineates or defines an area he believes to be of interest. At that point he calls in the geophysicist—the land man—and together they redefine the area, and each goes to work in his respective area. The geophysicist undertakes further studies and brings into play land representation in his particular area of interest; the geologist continues his work to further redefine his exact area of interest.

Finally, the economists arrive and other members of the corporation, and a decision is made to undertake the drilling of the well. The drilling of a well is a very important decision, requiring the investment of a great deal of money. It is the only way by which the work of the geologist can be substantiated. Drilling determines whether he knows what he is talking about, or whether there is to be a dry hole.

In this case, we are going to say it is on target. The reservoir is penetrated and they have a discovery well. Incidentally, this is when the geologist's work is finished. It is now that the petroleum or reservoir engineer takes over. He tries to define the actual reservoir existing 3,000 to 15,000 feet underground by offset wells, step-out wells and additional high technology testing.

We now enter the period of primary production which occurs, when the drill bit has penetrated the structure in which the oil is found. Oil is forced to the surface as a result of pressure generated within the structure. The rate at which it comes to the surface is as a result of many unknowns—the permeability of the structure and the viscosity of the oil.

What may come as news is that oil does not exist in pools. Oil exists in minute porous openings in the rock. It is forced from those porous openings to the well as a result of pressure generated within the formation or the structure. In addition, it can be assisted to the surface by the use of pumps.

After that initial discovery, the pressure decreases with use. After three or four years of use, the pressure starts to decrease and production from the well decreases accordingly. Incidentally, in primary recovery, if you did nothing else, you would only recover 22 per cent of the oil in place. That is all you can bring to the surface by the primary method.

At this stage you undertake the secondary method which means injecting water and simply flooding the reservoir. Water going through the reservoir carries additional oil with it. With water flooding you can increase production to 33 per cent of the reservoir, which means that if you leave the reservoir at this stage you are leaving 66 per cent of the oil in place underground. It is then that enhanced or tertiary recovery is simply the working of that reservoir by additional means to force more oil to the well stem and to the surface.

There are three thermal processes, each representing very expensive front-end investment. One is the process which involves the continuous injection of steam. Steam is produced on the surface and is injected down into the formation, or the reservoir, thus producing from three to 12 surrounding wells. So we have the steam going down the centre well, forcing the oil to the outside and up the producer wells on the outside.

Another is the cyclic steam injection process, which involves pushing steam down the producing well, shutting it off, leaving it there for 30 to 60 days, then opening it up and recommencing production from that reservoir.

Finally, there is the in situ combustion or fire-flooding process, which is simply that of pumping air down into the formation and lighting a fire. The fire burns across the formation to the outside producing wells, and the oil is brought up the outside producing wells. It is not a blazing inferno, incidentally; it is more like a charcoal fire such as you have with a barbecue, that moves slowly across the formation.

Senator Riley: It is hard to control.

Senator Hastings: It is hard to control, but technology is advancing and they are now working on the production of steam in the formation. While it may be hard to control at the moment, it is certainly one of the best methods.

Those three methods—in situ combustion, cyclic steam, and continuous steam—are the most widely accepted secondary recovery methods, particularly for the shallow oil fields on the Alberta-Saskatchewan border. The process lends itself to shallow play because the deeper the well the more steam and heat is lost, and after 3,000 feet it is of no value.

Then there are the miscible processes—"miscible" meaning mixable, like Scotch and soda.

Senator Frith: That's hard to control.

Senator Hastings: Such processes involve injection of liquids down into the formation, which work their way across the formation pushing the oil ahead. Those liquids can be carbon dioxide, CO₂, ethane, propane and butane. It is simply the injection of a slug of the gas, which mixes with the oil and carries it with it to the producing wells.

Finally, there are the chemical flooding processes, the three main ones being surfactant, polymer, polymer and alkaline flooding. To explain these simply, they involve the injection of "soapsuds" into the formation, which reduce the capillary action of the oil, and the oil is released to the producing wells. Such processes are far too expensive. I believe there are only two processes in the pilot project stage in the United States at the moment.

So these processes are in use. As I said, the thermal process offers the greatest opportunity to the shallow plays in the Lloydminster field, Cold Lake and the Peace River area of Alberta; whereas a miscible process offers the greatest opportunity to the deeper wells in the Foothills area of Alberta.

What does this mean to Canada? Your committee reached the conclusion, after receiving briefs from industry and independent researchers, that there are four billion barrels of oil to be recovered under secondary recovery in Canada today. What does four billion barrels involve? Four billion barrels is 50 per cent of our known reserves of eight billion barrels.

The biggest contribution this can make over the next 10 to 15 years, if we can put these projects into play, is to reduce our dependence on offshore oil. This does not represent the complete answer, but it will make a significant contribution during that period when we move off conventional oil—and we are moving off it rather quickly—to the Arctic, to the offshore areas, and to synthetic crude.

Senator Frith: When you say "offshore," do you mean foreign?

Senator Hastings: Eastern offshore. Canada, in the next 20 years, hopes to reduce its dependency on imported offshore oil.

Senator Frith: Imported foreign?

Senator Hastings: Foreign crude. In addition, if we can move into enhanced recovery in a forceful, imaginative way, there is much Canadian technology to be developed, and we could end up exporting that technology to the rest of the world.

Honourable senators may be interested in knowing that in Prudhoe Bay, where there are 10 billion barrels of oil, the field is now beginning to deplete and consideration is now being given to putting in secondary recovery projects in that area.

So, time is of the essence. There is an optimum time in the life of every reservoir when those projects can be put in place, and in the Canadian experience, with respect to the western Canadian sedimentary basin, that time is now. Time lost now means that that oil could be lost forever, because the lower the pressure is allowed to go the more difficult it is to institute these plans.

This represents a high risk capital investment, particularly very high short-end investment—$600 million to $1 billion per project. What is needed, honourable senators, to encourage such investment is a favourable business climate. I am sure we join with everyone in believing that nothing could contribute more to the adequate use of secondary recovery than the finalization of an agreement between the producing provinces and the federal government.

So the greatest constraint is the economic constraint with respect to the investment and an early return on that investment. There are technical constraints. One could very easily, say, "You know the oil is there; go and get it!" but we are always dealing with the hidden secrets of nature and science, and the best laid plans that we can make with respect to the recovery of that oil may be brought to naught when we actually put them into practice. From the laboratory to the pilot project to commercial production, there are many pitfalls and many risks.

Your committee concluded that the risks in instituting the secondary recovery projects are as great as, if not greater than, the bituminous sands project of Alberta. We welcomed the announcement in the National Energy Program of a $30 per barrel reference price for secondary enhanced recovery of oil. It was the first indication of the part that this activity of interest could play.

The committee reached the conclusion, after talking to industry and independent researchers, that a re-examination of that policy would support additional fiscal incentives for EORs—enhanced oil recovery projects. We therefore included in our recommendations that there should be tax relief to offset the cost of injection materials.

Our main recommendations, honourable senators, were that the $30 reference price be re-examined and that it should be the same as the oil sands reference price. On the premise that both producers are delivering oil of the same grade, as a result of heavy investment and high risk, both projects should receive the same return.

We also recommended that the tertiary supplement be paid by means of a method in terms of which payment commences immediately, regardless of when production commences. You estimate the total reservoir you are going to recover, and divide that by the number of years during which it will be recovered. You start paying immediately the reservoir is put into production. We recommended, as I said, that natural gas, or anything injected into the reservoir, be exempted from the petroleum and gas revenue tax.

Finally, we said that consideration should be given to applying the EOR revenue price to the entire production of the reservoir.

Honourable senators, writing in the May issue of Canadian Petroleum, Mr. Stan Sauerwein, after a very positive review of our findings and recommendations, ended up by saying:

Those recommendations may find their final resting place in the Parliamentary Library—

Well, they may, but I do not think the members of the committee are going to permit their recommendations to lie dormant in any library. I rather believe they are going to continue to press the policymakers for answers, and for the implementation of the recommendations they have thought proper and which they think will make a very worthwhile contribution to enhanced recovery in Canada today.

In conclusion, let me reiterate that we believe the economic constraints must be removed. One has only to spend a few days with the industry in Calgary to know that there are many young Canadians—and these are the people I speak for; the multinationals can look after themselves—who are dedicated to their industry and to their country, and who are ready and willing to perform this task. They have the technology, and they want to put it to work. Surely we can remove the constraints which are holding them back so that they can continue to make their contribution to self-sufficiency in Canada.

Honourable senators, I commend the report to your favourable consideration.

Hon. Daniel Riley: Honourable senators, I wonder if the chairman of the committee would permit a question or two?

The chairman mentioned the cost of secondary recovery as being about $30 a barrel. Is that a windshield estimate, or is that a definite estimate?

Senator Hastings: What is a windshield estimate?

Senator Riley: A windshield estimate is something like Nova's saying, "Well now, this is what we figure is a possible estimate," but when we get down to what the enhanced recovery cost is we should know something more definite as to the cost of recovery of a barrel of oil, particularly in the secondary mode.

Senator Hastings: It is enhanced tertiary that I think you are referring to. I did not mention a price of $30 in connection with secondary recovery. Secondary recovery means flooding the well with water. Enhanced recovery is the third process, and under the National Energy Program the reference price is $30 a barrel. How that price was arrived at I do not know. We asked witnesses, but we never did receive a very satisfactory answer.

Turning to the cost of production of secondary oil, the best information we got was from the National Energy Board and the Canadian Petroleum Research Institute, which were estimating it at $18 to $24 a barrel in 1978 dollars.

Senator Riley: The chairman has said that this is based on 1978 estimates. Now will he tell me what are the estimates, windshield or otherwise, that are set for the steam method of enhanced recovery of oil?

Senator Hastings: Honourable senators, I cannot answer as to the cost of a barrel of oil produced by enhanced recovery under steam, or by any other specific method. One might just as well ask what it costs to produce a bushel of wheat. The fact is that the cost varies from reservoir to reservoir. What works in one reservoir does not work in another. I can only say that the figures I quoted were the result of an examination of 196 reservoirs in western Canada taken all together. They just took all reservoirs, all the investments, all the recovery, and arrived at the amount of $18 to $24.

Senator Riley: I have another question, honourable senators. They have been developing the enhanced recovery of oil in the United States for some time now, and they have hit upon figures. Why can we in Canada not come up with figures that are comparable to those in the United States?

Senator Hastings: I think we can, senator. The amount we received from the Getty Oil Company in California—I am speaking from memory—was, I think, $18 a barrel. We have come up with an amount of $18 to $24, depending on upon where the production is, I presume. If you are producing from the shallow fields of Lloydminster, it probably will be $18. If the enhanced recovery is being carried out in the Swan Hills reservoir of the foothills of Alberta, with very expensive LPGs and carbon dioxide, the price goes up. So when the research institute, and, I believe, the National Energy Board, gave us $18 to $24, that is a ballpark amount for the western Canada sedimentary basin, and, I think, it is as accurate an estimate as anyone would dare make.

Senator Riley: Honourable senators, what is the difference between the method used in the Getty fields and the ones in Alberta, or Lloydminster?

Senator Hastings: In the heavy oil fields of Lloydminster? The thermal process is being used extensively—indeed, exclusively—in the California fields. You are, however, dealing with different formations, and different structures, that present different problems in different areas. What will work in California does not necessarily work in Lloydminster. Indeed, what will work in Lloydminster may not necessarily work 30 miles away. You are dealing with different reservoirs in different places. What works with one will not necessarily work with another.

Generally speaking, however, in the fields of California the Getty Oil Company, which is one of the biggest operators in that area, is using the thermal method—that is, the injection of steam, continuous or otherwise, and in situ burning.

● (2200)

Hon. Peter Bosa: I have a brief question. Senator Hastings made reference to percentages, and said that through the natural pressure method 22 per cent of a well can be extracted; that by going to the secondary method, up to 33 per cent can be extracted; and that there is a tertiary method as well. According to present day technology, what is the maximum that can be extracted from a reservoir?

[Senator Riley.]

Senator Hastings: The maximum is 75 per cent from the best well with the best project, and with everything on scale.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

LAW OF THE SEA

THIRD CONFERENCE—REVISION OF DRAFT CONVENTION—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Norbert L. Thériault moved pursuant to notice of Wednesday, May 20, 1981:

That the Senate reaffirm the support given by the Canadian people to the basic objectives of the Third Conference of the Law of the Sea and urge the United States Administration to undertake forthwith the revision of the draft Convention in order to increase the chances of concluding the work of the Conference when the Tenth Session resumes in Geneva in August, 1981.

[English]

He said: Honourable senators, after having listened to Senator Roblin and Senator Hastings, I want to assure you that your patience will not be tested much longer. I will only say a few words on my reasons for introducing this motion.

I know that in the minds of a number of people this is not as urgent a matter, perhaps, as inflation, stagflation, or enhanced oil recovery—whether it is through a windshield or not. However, I am afraid that at times we lose sight of important matters that go on in the international community. Naturally I, as a citizen of the coastal province of New Brunswick, have followed with some interest the evolution of the Law of the Sea Conference. A few months ago it was my pleasure to attend, along with my colleague, Senator Marshall, and some members of the other place, the conference in New York. I was very proud to be a Canadian citizen and to watch the Canadian delegation, under the able leadership of Ambassador Beasley, perform at that conference.

I wish to bring this matter to the attention of the house. I do it because I hope that Canadians in every walk of life, and all members of the House of Commons and this house, who have contacts with American counterparts will avail themselves of every opportunity to stress the importance, of coming to an agreement at the Law of the Sea Conference when it next meets in Geneva in August.

It was my understanding, from information that I have received, that this conference could conclude in June or July in New York. However, due to the advent of the new administration in the United States and its decision to review the whole process of the Law of the Sea Conference, many countries are concerned about the end result of the American decision. Needless to say, this conference and the treaty that would flow from it is extremely important to Canada. A number of people, when talking about the sea, would think about oil and fish, but the potential of the ocean is now almost beyond comprehension. I have mentioned two products that I feel are of great importance to Canada, but they are also of great importance to the 77 countries in attendance at the conference, many of which are the poorer countries of the world. The delegates of almost every country but the United States are terrified at the thought that this whole exercise—this conference that has lasted for seven or eight years—will have been in vain.

I want to point out two things. I think that for the international community, the treaty that would come out of the Law of the Sea Conference would be, for the first time in history, an agreement whereby certain products eventually to come out of the ocean would be put into a pool for the benefit of all nations—especially the poorer nations who do not have sea coasts. There has been much discussion these days about the North-South dialogue. If this conference can come to a fruitful end, I think we will have gone a long way toward giving hope to the people of those poorer countries.

I want to point out to you that the failure of such an agreement, if it should come about, could put in jeopardy many thousands of jobs in the Canadian mining industry as well. In fact, it would not be very long before the jobs of all of the employees of the nickel mines in the Sudbury area could be in jeopardy if there is no control over the way that the nodules that we now know exist in the bottom of the ocean are harvested by the giant American mining companies.

I would like to emphasize what I feel is the great leadership that Ambassador Beasley has provided on behalf of Canada, and point out the number of friends he has made for Canada since he headed up the Canadian delegation at the Law of the Sea Conference.

May I express the hope, honourable senators, that perhaps the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs will take this into consideration some time when they are dealing with their American counterparts. The document is a massive one. I have tried to peruse it as best I can, and I certainly do not pretend to be an expert on it. I hope that the Canadian delegation with their advisory people will be active again in Geneva.

In conclusion, I should like to bring to the attention of every senator an article which appeared in the Globe and Mail—and I do not recommend everything that I read in the Globe and Mail these days—on Monday, May 18, 1981, entitled: "Law of the Sea—U.S. Delay Threatens to Scuttle Decade of Hagglng." It is a well-written article which goes into some detail and I recommend it to all members of this chamber.

On motion of Senator Marshall, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

EXCISE TAX ACT EXCISE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-57, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Discussion draft of the Energy Security Act, 1981, issued by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Report of the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety, including its accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the year ended December 31, 1980, pursuant to section 21(1) of the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety Act, Chapter 29, Statutes of Canada, 1977-78.

Report on proceedings under the Canada Labour Code, Part III (Labour Standards), for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1981, pursuant to section 75 of the said Code, Chapter L-1, R.S.C., 1970.

FOURTH REPORT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS AN APPENDIX

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the fourth report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline, with the usual request that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see Appendix "B", p. 2624.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Hastings: Honourable senators, I move that the report be taken into consideration on Monday, June 29, 1981.

TRANSPORTATION OF DANGEROUS GOODS

INTERIM REPORT OF TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. G. I. Smith, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, presented the following report:

Tuesday, June 23, 1981

The Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications which was authorized to examine and report upon the subject-matter of the Transportation of Dangerous Goods Act, Chapter 36, Statutes of Canada, 1980, and any regulations that may be made thereunder, has in obedience to its Order of Reference of Tuesday, October 21, 1980, proceeded with that study and now presents the following interim report as follows:

Your Committee has held 15 meetings and has heard evidence from the following witnesses—From the Department of Transport: Mr. Jean Charron, Assistant Deputy Minister, Coordination; Mr. T. Duncan Ellison, Director, Transportation of Dangerous Goods; Mr. Jean-Maurice Gaudreau, Deputy Director, Transportation of Dangerous Goods; Miss Diana Wiwczaruk, Senior Adviser Commodity and International Coordinator; Miss Marjorie Stailkovich, Chief Standards Evaluation and Statistics Analysis. From the private sector: The CSL Group Inc.; the Canadian Trucking Association; the Air Transport Association of Canada, and the Canadian Manufacturers' Association.

Your Committee has examined draft number 4, dated October 10th, 1980, of regulations proposed to be made pursuant to the Act. The evidence shows, among other things, that said draft number 4 is now undergoing revision which may not be completed before September of this year, if then. Your Committee is of the view that it cannot make a report of substance until it has been able to examine the proposed regulations in their final form.

Your Committee therefore proposes to suspend its meetings on this subject for the time being and will resume its study when further useful material is available.

Respectfully submitted,

GEORGE I. SMITH,
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(f), I move that the report be adopted now.

I wish to say only a few words in explanation, since the report pretty well speaks for itself. I should like to add that, while it does not mention any possible amendments to the act, the subject matter of which we were studying, it may well be that when the report is made after the final version of the regulations has been settled upon, some such recommendation may come forward. We feel that before we can usefully report further to the house, we should have the opportunity to examine the regulations, which are voluminous and complex. That will not be possible until September or, perhaps, even later this year.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Monday next, June 29, 1981, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, we need to seek leave of the Senate in order to be consistent with the plans we made two weeks ago.

MICMAC RESERVE, RESTIGOUCHE—INCIDENTS INVOLVING PROVINCIAL POLICE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Yesterday, honourable senators, the question I had for the Leader of the Government was, in his absence, taken as notice by the Deputy Leader. It dealt with the question of salmon fishing by the Micmac Indians on the Restigouche Reserve. I was wondering whether I could have a report on what was going on there.

I have now a supplementary question concerning the statements made yesterday in the House by Mr. Munro, Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and Mr. LeBlanc, Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

The two ministers do not seem to share the same views of the situation. What is the official position of the government on this issue, and how could the conflicting statements made by the two ministers be reconciled?

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not have before me the statements of the two ministers, but I can advise the chamber that there has been an exchange of telex communications during the course of the day. Momentarily we hope to have some information with respect to the situation. There appears to be an incomplete body of facts to the present time. I hope more information can be brought to the chamber in a short time. Indeed, as I came into the chamber today I was advised of this alleged exchange of telex messages. A report concerning this and other recent events should be available shortly.

Senator Flynn: When you speak of an exchange of telex messages, do you mean as between the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Government of Quebec?

• (1415)

Senator Perrault: I must be totally frank with the Honourable Leader of the Opposition and say that, while I cannot confirm entirely the accuracy of the information which I have received, I believe the telex messages are between the Government of Canada and the Government of Quebec. We are hopeful that a report on the content of those telex messages—if they have, in fact, been exchanged—can be brought to this chamber this afternoon.

Senator Flynn: Then, may I take it that at this point no agreement has been reached between the two governments?

Senator Perrault: I know of no agreement and, as I say, I am hopeful that some information can be brought to the chamber so that all honourable senators will be enlightened.

Senator Flynn: Today?

Senator Perrault: Hopefully, yes.

FINANCE

MONETARY POLICY—STATEMENT BY SENATOR LAMONTAGNE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have another question for the government leader. Perhaps it might have been more appropriately directed to the Minister of State for Economic Development. It concerns the comments made by Senator Lamontagne some days ago in this House and yesterday during a press conference given by the senator in his capacity as director for the Canadian Institute of Economic Policy. In his speech and in the course of that conference, Senator Lamontagne effectively denounced this government's monetary policy. I quote from his reported comments from yesterday:

The federal bank should immediately lower its interest rates, even if this drives the Canadian dollar below 80 cents U.S.

I would like to know whether the government has any comment to make, what their reaction is to those proposals, because I understand that later Senator Lamontagne suggested that the Prime Minister shared or would share his views?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators—

Senator Flynn: Oh, there he is, jack-in-the-box.

Senator Frith: Superman.

Senator Olsen: —the proposals put forward in Senator Lamontagne's speech are interesting, but I am sure that even the Leader of the Opposition would not expect a comment or reaction in the short period of time since those proposals were made known to the Minister of Finance.

Senator Flynn: Well, they might have been suggested by the Minister of Finance.

Senator Olson: Now we are leading into an area regarding which, I am sure, the Honourable Leader of the Opposition does not expect a comment in reply.

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: It is very substantial.

[Senator Perrault.]

POST OFFICE

POSSIBLE DISRUPTION OF SERVICE

Hon. Cyril B. Sherwood: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. The release of a divided conciliation report appears to indicate and also to increase the possibility of a postal strike, which could begin as early as next Tuesday. Would the Leader of the Government indicate any plan the government may have to avert such a possibility?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The question will be taken as notice.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

NEW BRUNSWICK—STATUS OF AGREEMENTS

Hon. Cyril B. Sherwood: Honourable senators, I have been waiting to ask Senator Argue whether he can shed any light on the agricultural agreement for Kent County, New Brunswick, but he was absent last week and is absent this week. Honourable senators will recall that on May 27 he informed the house that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion had informed him that new development programs were being planned for south-eastern New Brunswick, including the County of Kent and parts of the counties of Albert and Westmoreland, and that these programs would give priority to agricultural development and would include the fisheries industry, the tourism industry and the manufacturing industry.

I direct my question to the Minister of State for Economic Development and ask him whether or not he can inform us now as to whether the agreement has yet been signed.

● (1420)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I cannot inform you of that particular specific agreement. My honourable friend has already alluded to the deep and abiding interest Senator Argue has in this problem, no doubt as a result of his former position as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture which did a lot of useful work with respect to that matter. I will see that both he and the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion are apprised of my honourable friend's inquiry.

Senator Sherwood: Honourable senators, I should like to ask Senator Olson, who is Chairman of the Economic Development Committee, if he could ascertain just what the status of these new development programs is at the present time.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, consistent with what I have said on numerous occasions in this chamber, a minister—in this case myself—who is chairman of a committee does not make announcements for and on behalf of other departments. Therefore, when the committee does approve, and government authority is given for, the entering into of such agreements, the announcements are made by the appropriate minister responsible.

THE SENATE

LEADER OF THE GOVERNMENT—RUMOURED DIPLOMATIC APPOINTMENT

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Is he able to confirm the accuracy of an assertion made last Saturday by Allan Fotheringham who, I understand, is a close personal friend of his, to the effect that the leader will soon be leaving his position in the Senate for a diplomatic posting abroad?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a rather large library in my residence, but it specializes in non-fiction. I am afraid that I do not know—what was that chap's name again?

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Phillips: As a supplementary question, honourable senators, I would point out that the leader's predecessor was subsequently appointed Canadian High Commissioner to Great Britain. The article to which I refer proposed that the present leader be consul in New Orleans. Is this a downgrading of the position of Leader of the Government in the Senate?

Senator Donahoe: I will take it.

Senator Perrault: I hope the honourable senator will provide me with a copy of this article which, apparently, appeared in the fiction section of the newspaper. I would be very interested to have it.

I have no immediate personal plans to attend the Mardi Gras.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

SALE OF BRITISH COLUMBIA COAL TO JAPAN—USE OF INFRASTRUCTURE

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, my question is to the Minister of State for Economic Development. In February last, I raised a question with the honourable senator concerning the necessary infrastructure for the much vaunted sale of British Columbia coal to Japan. At that time the honourable senator will recall, I am sure, that he assured us that the government believed that the two mining companies which negotiated the Japanese agreement were receiving a very good deal as far as infrastructure, port loading charges, et cetera, were concerned.

My question is: Is the minister aware that the Teck Corporation has indicated that, while the $3-a-metric-ton throughput charge may be acceptable, the 80-per-cent escalation clause is unrealistic and, as a result, the companies are likely to look for alternative port facilities to those at Ridley Island?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, no, I am not aware that they are going to look for alternative loading facilities to Ridley Island.

Of course, a number of other companies have indicated that they would like to reserve some space at Ridley Island for loading coal when the facilities are completed, hopefully, before 1984. Indeed, judging by the international market and contracts that have been signed since those signed by Teck Corporation and Denison with Japan the indications are that a significant amount of additional tonnage will be required by other companies.

Inasmuch as the Ridley Island project is already under construction—that is, the site preparation and a number of things related to that—as yet a contractor has not been designated to put in the loading machinery. In addition to that, a great deal of work is already under way towards increasing the capacity of the railroad delivery system to that island. I am sure there is always a point at which someone would like a little more, but we believe that it was a fair and reasonable arrangement, as far as the federal government's participation is concerned, and was done in the best interests of Canada.

ENERGY

IMPORTED OIL PRICE DIFFERENCES

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development relating to a question asked some considerable time ago and which has not yet been answered insofar as a search of Hansard indicates—at least, so I am informed. On January 27, 1981, as reported at page 1575 of Hansard, I asked the following questions:

I am wondering whether the difference in price is related to the quality of the respective oils, or whether it is simply that these prices are arbitrarily imposed by the sellers.

At that time Senator Olson's response was:

Honourable senators, I think there may be some of that. I will find out more specifically.

I am not sure whether the minister construed that as an undertaking to find out and provide a further answer to the question or not, but I took it that way, and I wonder if he is prepared to find out and answer it.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I am sorry if I have not come back since that date with a more detailed answer. I agree with Senator Smith that what I said indicated that I would probably bring back additional information. I can repeat what I said at that time, and that is, that in most cases we are under contract with Mexico, Venezuela and several other countries to buy the oil at their offering price. Obviously, at times we buy so-called spot oil. That price varies considerably, and I am sure that that price does reflect the quality of the oil.

Insofar as the other contractual arrangements are concerned, I think they also call for a certain grade or quality of oil, but the price fluctuates from time to time depending on the offering.

Senator Smith: I do not want to seem critical of the honourable minister, but may I ask if I can look forward to a more detailed answer.

Senator Olson: Yes.

GRAIN

EMBARGO ON SALES TO U.S.S.R.—COMPENSATION TO FARMERS

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for Senator Argue but in his absence I should like to direct it to the Minister of State for Economic Development who will, no doubt, take it as notice.

An announcement was made last week of a payment of about $81 million to grain producers as compensation for their alleged losses following the embargo on shipments to Russia. Could we be informed of the basis for this decision and the method of assessment and distribution?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, that information is available. I am surprised that you do not already have it. I believe I am correct in saying that a press release giving some detailed explanation of how that amount was arrived at was made public. Usually when that happens copies of those communiqués are sent to honourable senators opposite. If that has not happened, I will ask Senator Argue's office to send it directly to the honourable senator.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): It was not in the press releases.

Senator Flynn: I did not see anything.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: We are not allowed to rely on the press.

QUEBEC

MICMAC RESERVE, RESTIGOUCHE—INCIDENTS INVOLVING PROVINCIAL POLICE

Hon. Guy Williams: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government. In spite of the fact that the Government of Canada and the Government of Quebec are communicating with each other in regard to the explosive situation in Restigouche, while talking to the people of the band yesterday they told me that even the women were being pushed around by the raiding policemen. If they had been other nationals, this would not have happened. While there may be communication between the two governments, from what I have learned by direct telephone conversation, there seems to be no effective communication with the people involved and concerned that would be useful to them.

Let me go back a little in history. The Restigouche people have been fishing since time immemorial, and at the time of the coming of the first Europeans they began giving them fish and trading, if not selling, and they have continued doing so until this day.

Last year the quota was 35,000 pounds for 1,650 people in the reserve. This year the quota has been cut, without consultation with the Indians, to 25,000 pounds, which is a little over 20 pounds apiece. That is not very much for people who consume a great deal of fish, particularly salmon.

[Senator Olson.]

To get to the bottom of the situation, there must be consultation with the people involved and concerned. Furthermore, we have had similar problems on the west coast, which have now been partially solved. In some of the reserves—at least five or six—where they have participated in artificial hatching of salmon and raising millions of fry, it is beginning to pay off. That should be taken into consideration by both governments and also the Restigouche people. That is my question.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I wish to thank Senator Williams for the useful information he has brought to this chamber. I received a note a moment ago to the effect that the information which I anticipated receiving will be forthcoming. I had hoped that it would have been here sooner. Presumably, we shall have further information in a few moments. The last information given publicly by the Honourable John Munro, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, covered a number of points. He confirmed that there was a good deal of fright permeating the entire community, as Senator Williams has reminded us today. He said:

I indicated that on my return here—

That is, to Ottawa.

—I would talk to my colleague, the Solicitor General, with respect to the return of the nets to the band.

As of yesterday the minister did not have an opportunity to do so. He said:

Also, my officials had talks with the Quebec Provincial Police. They indicated that probably as of today—

That is, as of yesterday:

—they would be withdrawing the very heavy contingent of Quebec provincial police that are not on the reserve—they have not come on the reserve since June 11, but they are surrounding the reserve—that they would be withdrawing those people today.

That is, yesterday. He continued:

I am checking, and I am told that they have not been withdrawn yet. We are still hopeful that they will be withdrawn today.

He went on to say:

As far as any further action that may be required is concerned, we are monitoring the situation each day. I had indicated that on my return I would be getting together with my colleague, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, to examine the nature of the application of the regulations under the Fisheries Act. I have not had a chance to do that, but I will be doing it later today.

These are matters on which, hopefully, we can have a report very soon. He continued:

It is on that basis the Quebec police are founding their jurisdiction to take the action they have. I indicated to that delegation that I would like to have an opportunity to review and examine the situation with the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

So we are monitoring the situation at the present time. It is a question that rightfully requires an answer, and that will be brought to the Senate as soon as it arrives.

Hon. W. M. Benidickson: Honourable senators, may I ask Senator Williams a question for clarification? What authority or presumptive authority set the quotas and reduced the quotas to which he referred?

Senator Flynn: That is rather irregular.

Senator Williams: So far as I know, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, in conjunction with the authorities in Quebec. There was no consultation with the Indian band.

ENERGY

ALASKA HIGHWAY GAS PIPELINE—FINANCING OF UNITED STATES SECTION

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, may I ask the Minister of State for Economic Development if he is in a position to update the house on what progress is being made in the United States in putting together the financing package for the Alaska Highway pipeline?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I am not sure that I can add a great deal to the statement I made a few days ago about the details of the financial agreement reached between the producing companies and the sponsoring companies. I believe that since then there has been an indication at least, if not a confirmation, that the United States Secretary of Energy has proposed—I have to be careful as to whether he has confirmed it or just indicated—that he will take a waiver resolution to Congress that will indeed accommodate the arrangements that have been made, namely, to allow the producing companies to acquire 30 per cent of the preconditioning plant as well as the rest of the pipeline. I do not think we have an update on the financial community's response to that, except that informally I have heard that it is proceeding rather well; and that was expected.

QUEBEC AND MARITIMES PIPELINE—LABOUR DISPUTES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to respond to a question raised on June 18 by Senator Smith concerning the Quebec and Maritimes pipeline labour disputes.

I have confirmed that the company has stated that failure to resolve by June 25 the current labour dispute involving pipeline welders would cause it to seriously consider cancellation of construction for the rest of the year.

As I stated previously, the labour dispute is a matter outside of federal jurisdiction, and I understand that the Quebec government is considering action to impose a settlement.

With regard to the date of having gas available to the maritime consumers, I should point out that 1983 was a target indicated in the National Energy Program, but never a guarantee by the federal government. The government continues to support completion of the pipeline with a minimum of delay.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

MIDDLE EAST—POSSIBLE CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN MULTINATIONAL PEACEKEEPING FORCE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was asked by Senator Murray on June 18 concerning possible Canadian participation in a multinational peacekeeping force in the Middle East.

Canada has not officially been asked to participate in such a force and has not been involved in its planning. Therefore, it would be inappropriate for the government to comment on the size of the force and whether it should have some kind of combat capability.

ISRAELI ATTACK ON NUCLEAR REACTOR IN IRAQ—CANADIAN ATTITUDE IN SECURITY COUNCIL

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on June 18 Senator Macquarrie asked a question concerning the Israeli attack on Iraq.

Canada has strongly condemned the Israeli attack on Iraq. The government fully supports the condemnation of Israel by the international community in the Security Council. The government's strong condemnation of Israel is not in any way diminished by Canada's negative vote on the International Atomic Energy Association resolution. This involved universality of membership in international organizations, a principle to which Canada is strongly committed.

MIDDLE EAST—GOVERNMENT ACTION ON STANFIELD REPORT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was asked by Senator Macquarrie on June 18 concerning the Stanfield report on the Middle East.

The government finds the Stanfield report a worthwhile and useful document. The government has no plans to formally adopt the report, but its recommendations will be borne in mind in ongoing formulation of Canadian Middle East policy.

NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

MEDICAL TREATMENT OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEE

Question No. 57 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Orville H. Phillips:

Has the Minister of National Health and Welfare received any correspondence whatsoever in 1981 involving medical treatment of a government employee, namely, Mr. Gaston Lévesque of St. Lambert, Quebec, and (i) what action, if any, has the Minister taken (ii) if no action was taken, what was the reason?

Reply by the Minister of National Health and Welfare:
Yes.

(i) and (ii) An inquiry was received dated February 27, 1981. At the request of the minister the records were reviewed. Based on the assessment the minister replied to the inquiry.

EXCISE TAX ACT EXCISE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. A. Irvine Barrow moved the second reading of Bill C-57, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-57 is an important tax bill which implements the two parts of the government's energy program and a number of changes in federal sales and excise tax measures.

The bill consists of five parts. Part I deals with amendments to the federal sales tax system, such as the application of tax to cosmetics at the sale to retailer level, and to advertising inserts distributed in newspapers. Part II implements the new tax on natural gas and gas liquids. Part III deals with changes in the taxation of alcoholic beverages and technical provisions of the Excise Tax Act, and also establishes a new temporary licence mechanism to facilitate the production of alcohol for experimentation and development as a fuel. Part IV establishes an 8 per cent tax on petroleum and gas revenues under a separate act. And Part V prescribes the commencement dates for the various provisions in the first four parts of the bill.

I should like to take this opportunity to highlight some of the more important provisions of the bill, and then to comment on a number of the amendments which were adopted by the other place before sending this bill to us.

Perhaps the most important provision in Part I is the reduction in the federal sales tax from 12 per cent to 9 per cent, as originally proposed by the Honourable Jean Chrétien in his budget of November 1978. This measure, which has had a substantial stimulative effect on the Canadian economy, has been continued in force since November 1978, by way of remission order under the Financial Administration Act. The bill also contains a number of other tax increases and decreases from that budget, which have also been administered since that time on the basis of ways and means motions, in accordance with traditional practice.

In addition, Bill C-57 contains a number of important measures relating to the structure of the federal sales tax which were announced by the Honourable Allan MacEachen in his statement of April 21, 1980 and budget of October 28, 1980. These include a broadening of the definition of "manufacturer" to include persons commonly referred to as "marginal manufacturers", a shifting of the tax on cosmetics from the manufacturer's to the wholesaler's level, and replacement of the specific taxes on gasoline and diesel fuel with the standard 9 per cent ad valorem sales tax imposed on the sale of these products to retailers.

Honourable senators, let me explain briefly what the problem of marginal manufacturing is. Under the existing tax system the value of any operations performed by a manufacturer prior to the sale of the goods is included in the manufacturer's sales price, which forms the base for federal sales tax. This includes such operations as assembling, blending, packaging, and breaking bulk. When these are performed beyond the tax point, however, by a person who is not a licensed manufacturer of the goods, the value added through these functions escapes the tax. This is clearly inequitable, as one person is required to pay tax on a series of specific operations as part of a manufacturing process, while no tax liability is imposed on another person who performs essentially the same operations.

A second, less obvious but perhaps more important, fact of this problem is that the incidence of tax avoidance through marginal manufacturing is most prevalent in the case of imported goods. Importers frequently import goods in unassembled and unpackaged form, pay tax on them at the point of importation on relatively low values, and escape tax on packaging and assembling operations subsequently performed in Canada. The effective rate of tax on imported goods is in many cases as low as one-half of the rate on comparable domestically manufactured goods.

The performance of marginal manufacturing activities beyond the tax point in the case of imported goods is a key factor in this tax disparity. The proposed amendments are designed to establish a more equitable tax base for all manufacturers, producers and importers in Canada by including persons who perform specific manufacturing activities within the definition of "manufacturer or producer" and requiring those persons to pay federal sales tax on all goods manufactured or marginally manufactured by them.

The measure for cosmetics is also designed to address similar inequities in the application of the federal sales tax. In the case of cosmetics, marketing, royalty, packaging and other similar costs are significant in relation to basic manufacturing costs. It appears that many manufacturers have arranged their affairs to artificially separate the physical manufacturing process from other functions traditionally performed by manufacturers. This is achieved by contracting out the actual manufacturing operations to a separate legal entity, and paying tax on the sale price of the physical producers.

Similarly, in the case of imports, tax is paid on the duty-paid value of fully manufactured cosmetics. In both cases a substantial value added through branding, advertising and labelling functions escapes tax.

This has created two problems. First, a serious loss of revenue and erosion of the tax base has occurred. Secondly, integrated domestic manufacturers who pay taxes on their full sale price, inclusive of trademark, advertising and distribution costs, are placed at a competitive disadvantage.

The shift of the federal sales tax to the wholesale level for cosmetics will correct these problems by imposing the tax on the sale price to retailers, which in most cases is consistent and well defined, rather than on the highly variable manufacturer's sales price. This proposal will thus establish an equitable tax base for all cosmetic products sold in Canada.

The third important structural change which I referred to earlier is the application of federal sales tax to gasoline and diesel fuel. These products are typically sold by manufacturers at a number of different trade levels, at widely varying prices. Sales may be made at the refinery level, from one producer to another at prices which reflect little more than basic refining costs, to independent gasoline distributors, to refinery-owned retail outlets or to independent retail service stations. Application of federal sales tax to the actual sale price by the manufacturer creates wide variations in the value for tax depending on the nature of the distribution system through which the gasoline and diesel fuel flow.

In an attempt to deal with these inequities, amendments were introduced in 1977 to establish specific rates of tax on these products. Rapid increases in the price of petroleum products in recent years, however, have quickly eroded the real value of these levies.

Shifting the federal sales tax on gasoline, diesel fuel and aviation fuel to an ad valorem levy at the wholesale level will resolve both the value for tax problems previously encountered when the tax was imposed at the manufacturer's level and the erosion of the tax base which has occurred as a result of the change in 1977 to specific tax rates.

I should also like to bring to honourable senators' attention a number of important amendments which have been made to this bill by the other house as a result of representations made to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, the House Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, and the Minister of Finance. One of the major changes to sales and excise tax provisions contained in this bill is the proposal to index the specific levies on alcohol and tobacco products to related subgroups of the consumer price index. The measures, as originally proposed, would have resulted in quarterly changes in the rates applicable to alcohol and tobacco products. As some honourable senators will no doubt recall, industry representatives raised major concerns about the frequency of these changes and the administration and compliance burden which they would impose. In response to these concerns, the bill now before us has been amended to provide that the tax rates will be indexed annually on the first of September each year.

A second significant change from the original budget proposals relates to the definition of a newspaper for tax exemption purposes. A number of community newspapers made representations concerning the proposal to limit the exemption for newspapers to publications which have not more than 75 per cent advertising content in 50 per cent of the issues in the previous three months. Some publishers expressed concern that, while the advertising content of their publications was generally less than 75 per cent, occasionally they could exceed this limit due to seasonal or other factors. In response to these concerns, the bill has been amended to increase the 75 per cent limit to 80 per cent, which was a recommendation made by the members of the Senate committee. This new limit will provide a fair criterion for separating tax exempt newspapers from other forms of taxable printed material, and will address the specific concerns of the community newspapers.

The provisions relating to the taxation of cosmetics sold to beauty salons, which received extensive consideration by the Senate committee, have also been amended to meet the concerns of industry representatives. The provisions as amended will exclude from the definition of "manufacturer or producer" persons who sell cosmetics exclusively and directly to beauty salons and similar establishments providing personal grooming services. Such persons will now be treated as retailers, and will be relieved of any liability for tax on their sales of cosmetics to beauty salons.

Finally, to address the concerns of the small business community, a provision has been made to relieve approximately 10,000 small businesses from the requirement to file an annual information return. Where these small businesses elect to provide the necessary information as part of their normal tax return, the Minister of National Revenue will be authorized to waive the requirement to file an annual information return. The persons affected by this change are those licensees who currently are authorized to file regular tax returns and payments quarterly or semi-annually rather than monthly.

Honourable senators, this bill provides authority for two new energy-related taxes which were proposed in the budget of October 28, 1980. Part II of Bill C-57 imposes a special tax to be known as the natural gas and gas liquids tax and which will form part of the Excise Tax Act. Part IV of the bill imposes the 8 per cent petroleum and gas revenue tax.

The gas tax will apply to all sales of Canadian natural gas and natural gas liquids, which are propane, butane and ethane, regardless of whether the sales are to domestic or foreign buyers. The rate of tax is 28 cents per gigajoule on gas effective November 1, 1980, for domestic sales of marketable pipeline gas, and is generally imposed on receipts of gas by distributors. The tax on natural gas exports is effective February 1, 1981, and the holder of the export licence is deemed to be the distributor for purposes of the tax. The bill proposes to raise the tax in three stages to reach 70 cents per gigajoule on January 1, 1983. Equivalent rates of tax apply to gas liquids. A gigajoule is a measure of heat produced by 1,000 cubic feet of gas.

The petroleum and gas revenue tax will be imposed under a separate act and will apply to the gross profit from the production of oil or gas in Canada—that is, production revenue less direct lifting costs in the case of operators of oil wells, and gross royalties in the case of investors in oil and gas properties. The tax is effective January 1, 1981, at a rate of 8 per cent. In order to ensure that the tax base is not eroded, no deductions are permitted for exploration and development expenditures, capital cost allowances, interest payments or royalty payments to governments. In order to ensure equal treatment of taxpayers, whether they are liable for normal corporate income tax or not, the petroleum and gas revenue tax is non-deductible for income tax purposes.

These taxes are an important part of the government's new energy program as announced in Mr. MacEachen's budget. The program has three important objectives; namely, greater Canadian ownership and control of the oil and gas industry, a fair pricing and revenue-sharing regime which recognizes the needs and rights of Canadians in all provinces, and security of supply and ultimate independence from the world oil market. The natural gas and gas liquids tax and the petroleum and gas revenue tax are essential for the achievement of these objectives.

Revenues from the two taxes proposed in this bill assist in the financing of incentive payments for exploration and development of oil and gas, grants for conversion from oil to gas, electric heating or other fuels, subsidies for gas pipeline extension into areas dependent on imported oil, and increased incentives for home insulation. All of these programs are important in achieving the government's goal of energy security.

The natural gas tax forms part of the overall pricing strategy set out in the National Energy Program. That document outlined various goals for oil and tax pricing and the tax is an important instrument in serving those goals. These goals include providing adequate incentives for supply without giving unwarranted profits to producers, providing an impetus to conservation without undue shocks to the Canadian economy, and encouraging consumers to switch from oil to gas. Even with the full implementation of the tax, the price of gas to Canadian consumers will decline relative to oil prices, on a heat equivalent basis. There will be, therefore, a major incentive to switch from oil to gas.

Canadians in all provinces, through the federal government, bear much of the burden of rising energy prices. However, in recent years the federal government has received about 10 per cent of petroleum production revenue. Provincial governments and the industry have each been receiving about 45 per cent of revenues. The petroleum and gas revenue tax will help to redress this imbalance.

Testimony presented by the oil industry to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce indicated that, in some cases, the PGRT impacts unfavourably on the economics of marginal oil wells. However, in its preliminary report to the Minister of Finance, the committee noted that the PGRT and gas tax implement only part of the National Energy Program. Furthermore, the report noted that negotiations between the federal government and the energy-producing provinces may have an important impact on the matter raised before the committee.

In conclusion, honourable senators, this is an important bill. It brings into law changes in the sales and excise tax system that address deficiencies in that structure as it now stands. The energy taxes in this bill are an essential part of the government's energy program, and I commend it to you for your consideration.

Although the subject matter of this bill has been reported on in the preliminary report to the Senate by the Standing Senate

[Senator Barrow.]

Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on both May 19 and May 26, it is my intention, if and when it receives second reading, to ask that this bill be referred to that committee.

Hon. W. M. Benidickson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask Senator Barrow a question. I have not been following regularly and recently the reports of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee. However, since the budget of October 1980, and the announcement of the National Energy Program then, and with respect to Part IV of this bill, has any litigation been instituted in the courts, or would any litigation require first the passing of this new bill, which is referred to on page 85?

Senator Barrow: It is my understanding, honourable senators, that there is some litigation before the courts, although I do not know the exact terms of it.

● (1500)

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, the legislation we are considering, Bill C-57, insofar as it levies new taxes upon the oil and gas industry in Canada, is, I submit, of fundamental importance to all Canadians. These tax measures, together with the companion legislation Bill C-48, will have a profound and, in my view, a negative effect on the future development of oil and gas supplies in our country.

It is becoming increasingly obvious to Canadians that the so-called National Energy Program of Mr. Lalonde is a program for disaster, not a program for self-sufficiency, as it has been ballyhooed by government spokesmen since its introduction last October.

What has been the effect of the National Energy Program to date? Oil and gas exploration and associated activity in the western provinces have been reduced by more than half. Three thousand of the 20,000 men employed in the trade had been laid off by the end of May, and another 6,000 are expected to be laid off by the middle of this summer. Where 370 rigs were drilling last year, 177 are drilling this year. Seventy-eight rigs have left the country since October 28, and 53 are committed to leave this month. In short, an industry upon which both the economy and security of the country depends has been thrust into a deep depression.

Development of the heavy oil and tar sands plants has been brought to a halt, although there is enough synthetic oil in Alberta to meet the needs of Canada 300 years at present rates of production. Alberta has reduced by more than 10 per cent its supply of crude oil to central Canada and will have cut back the supply by 15 per cent by the end of September.

Nearly $1.5 billion is being sent to Belgium to pay for the Petrofina Oil Company as a federal gift to Petro-Canada. That expenditure will directly raise the price of gasoline and at the same time will not add a single barrel of oil to Canada's supply.

Per capita consumption of oil in Canada continues to rise because the National Energy Program holds Canadian prices far below prices charged in nearly all the countries in the western world. In fact, the Canadian price is about one-third of the price charged in Great Britain which is self-sufficient in oil because of the North Sea development.

In the United States by contrast, higher prices have had the effect of reducing imports by 24 per cent in a single year and cutting consumption by two million barrels a day. Meanwhile, American cars stream over the border to fill up on Canada's cut-rate gasoline and, in the process, fatten the coffers of the Ontario government through its levy on such gasoline of its so-called road tax.

Heavy oil wells in the Lloydminster area are being shut down because the National Energy Program does not provide enough revenue to make it economical to operate them.

Unemployment stalks Ontario industry which is being deprived of machinery and equipment orders due to the cutback in Alberta conventional oil and gas exploration and the arrest of the tar sands development.

British Columbia and Saskatchewan have defied the government at Ottawa, and refuse to pay the tax it is attempting to levy on natural gas production.

Nova Scotia and Newfoundland have announced that they will not recognize federal laws leasing oil rights on offshore lands—a situation that could conceivably see both levels of government leasing the same properties.

In the meantime, Alberta has taken the federal government to court on the legality of the excise tax as it applies to provincial government-owned natural gas, and the Alberta Court of Appeal has unanimously upheld the position of the province.

The United States is considering retaliatory measures against Canadian oil and mining companies operating in that country in response to the National Energy Program's "Canadianization" measures. Such a move could cripple hundreds of Canadian resource companies operating in that country.

In summary, the National Energy Program after only eight months has managed to cripple the Canadian exploration industry and drive a substantial segment of it out of this country. It has managed to increase Canadian oil consumption; to disrupt the supply of existing oil; to ship millions of dollars overseas; to jeopardize relations with the Americans; to expose us to far more dependence on Middle East and other foreign oil supplies; to halt development of the tar sands; and to throw federal-provincial relations into chaos.

Honourable senators, I submit that the government's policy with respect to the pricing of domestic supplies of non-renewable petroleum from western Canada is little short of ludicrous. While $17.75 a barrel at the wellhead is what the federal government will permit to be paid for Alberta oil, it will, on the other hand, cheerfully pay—or, more correctly, make Canadian consumers pay—$48 a barrel for foreign oil.

It is little wonder that the Alberta government is cutting back production of its non-renewable resource by 120,000 barrels a day—a cutback that is to increase to 160,000 barrels a day by September. The Province of Alberta is expected to dispose of, for cut-rate prices, its rapidly diminishing supplies of crude oil and in response is cutting back oil production really because it has no other tool with which to try to bring Ottawa to meaningful negotiations.

Federal Energy Minister Marc Lalonde has been slow to seek a compromise. He indulges himself in accusations of Albertan inflexibility, even though Alberta has offered to move, over several years, to only 75 per cent of world prices. He chose not to meet his Alberta counterpart, Mr. Leach, until nearly six months after the National Energy Program ultimatum. He says it is highly unlikely that a new energy pact will be reached in the negotiations taking place this month. He obviously hopes Alberta will lack the courage to continue with its oil cutbacks, and Canadians may be sure that he will raise cries of "Unfair" as he imposes new taxes to pay the new subsidies on the foreign oil that will replace Alberta oil.

As Canadians pay these new taxes, they should remember some other factors. On May 1 they were required to pay one cent per litre more for gasoline so that the federal government oil company could buy foreign-controlled Petrofina Canada Inc. at a grossly inflated price. Federal sales tax will be levied on the tax, and in Ontario the 20 per cent sales tax on gasoline will be adjusted on July 1 to tax the new tax. Both Ontario and Ottawa will vilify Alberta for the cutback, but they will increase their own revenues through it.

I would like to draw the attention of honourable senators to a study prepared by the C.D. Howe Institute entitled "Canada's Energy Policy Debate." I will read to honourable senators the conclusions set forth in the report which bear serious consideration. The report concludes by saying:

The National Energy Program is an economic policy that is severely constrained by political factors. It represents the federal view of how Canada's energy resources can be used as a tool to orchestrate the country's economic future, with the federal government conducting and playing the leading role.

But Canada has a federal system in which powers of resource ownership must be exercised co-operatively. Ottawa has failed to create a broader climate of confidence in the west by showing that it recognizes and accepts that region's economic aspirations. The National Energy Program produced a coherent strategy but failed to produce a process for its successful realization without creating greater divisiveness in the existing system.

All Canadians will be worse off if the political impasse drags on. In early 1981 the debate focused on the apparently simple solution that Ottawa compromise by raising wellhead prices for oil over the next three years. But this view overlooked the taxation measures contained in the National Energy Program, which the west perceives as an important barrier to its economic aspirations. Resolution of the impasse will be a complex matter in which each side must recognize the needs of the other—something each has thus far failed to do.

Another longer-range aspect of the National Energy Program must also be addressed. The National Energy Program implicitly takes the view that Canada can afford to trade self-sufficiency for restructured distribution. This policy represents a timely departure from the past in its emphasis on reducing oil demand. It is unlikely that there will be any going back on these fundamentals. But the policy takes risks. If the attractiveness of competing activity in the United States has been underestimated, if reduction in oil demand has been overestimated, if the oil sands projects are delayed much longer, and if the response to frontier options is weak, Canadians may pay lower prices and own more of their industry by mid-decade, but they should also be aware that part of the price may be lineups at the gas pumps.

Honourable senators, I do not intend to speak at length on Bill C-57. It has had prolonged debate and committee consideration in the other place, and we have also had the benefit of numerous briefs which were presented to us in committee here.

I have focused my remarks on what I perceive to be disastrous implications to the Canadian oil and gas industry resulting from the 8 per cent production tax and the excise tax which will be levied by this legislation. But this government has set its course and will evidently not be swayed by logic or argument, no matter from what source it may originate.

An economic disaster of huge proportions is in the making, and the tragedy is compounded by the fact that before the introduction of the National Energy Program Canada was poised to take a great step forward in terms of its domestic energy supply capacity.

• (1510)

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, representing a region of Canada that is most directly and severely affected by the application of certain sections of this act, I would be remiss if I did not offer a few comments and place on record my very strong objections to this particular piece of legislation.

I am not an apologist for the Government of Alberta, and I in no way speak for the Government of Alberta, but as one who had long years of close association with the development of the petroleum industry in western Canada I can say without hesitation that the National Energy Program is little short of being a national disaster as far as accomplishing the stated objectives of the program is concerned.

In this particular bill we have the application of special tax levies on petroleum and natural gas. It is one thing for a government to impose a tax on all the resource revenues of the country, and it is another thing altogether to single out one particular resource found primarily in one area of Canada and impose on that particular resource the type of taxation that is proposed in this bill. Why, one might properly ask, does this tax not apply to revenue accruing from other natural resources in this country? What about pulp and other mineral resources? What about electrical energy that is generated in Newfoundland, Quebec and Ontario, much of which is exported from the country? Why is only the one category of natural resource singled out for discrimination by the taxation imposed by this legislation?

Honourable senators, whether it is a valid conclusion or not, this type of legislation, as far as thousands of people in western Canada are concerned, simply confirms that the major objective of the federal government's National Energy Program is not to obtain self-sufficiency for Canada, for had that been the objective the program that has been adopted would never even have been considered. It is not the encouragement of alternative forms of energy, for, again, it falls far short of what could and should be done to provide such encouragement. This kind of legislation confirms, in the minds of the people of western Canada at least, that the major objective of the National Energy Program is to increase federal government control of the provincially-owned natural resources of this country, particularly in the energy field, and to substantially increase the federal government's portion of such revenue as accrues from the development of those resources.

I will not take the time of the house to say many things I feel strongly could and should be said, because I am realist enough to know that the government has set its teeth in this matter and has no intention of listening to logic, no matter how often it is presented. But I do say that time-wise the government could not have chosen a worse time to impose this kind of discriminatory taxation.

It has been stated in this house, in the other place and one reads in the newspapers almost daily that one of the most essential things for the good of this country is a settlement of the energy dispute between the producing provinces and the Government of Canada. Frankly, I can think of few steps the government can take that will do more to prejudice the negotiations and the hope for an amicable settlement than this kind of discriminatory taxation which singles out the revenue from one resource in one region of Canada.

As I have said, I shall not keep the house with a long dissertation, because I can go off and talk to myself more comfortably some place other than in this chamber, but I urge honourable senators, in the interest of this country, not to ignore the long-range, adverse consequences of this kind of legislation. It is discriminatory, counter-productive as far as the stated objectives of the National Energy Program are concerned and, even more regrettably, it is the kind of legislation that further aggravates the sense of regional alienation that already is strong in western Canada and which is so detrimental to the interest of this country as a whole.

On motion of Senator Flynn, for Senator Charbonneau, debate adjourned.

THE ESTIMATES

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1982.—(Honourable Senator Frith). [Translation]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, both Order No. 3 and Order No. 4 stand in my name. I yield to Senator Godfrey, after which I shall move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I shall keep you for only a minute or so. I should like to congratulate Senator Roblin on the excellent speech he made last night, a speech in keeping with the very high calibre of speeches previously made in this debate by Senators Everett and Lamontagne. It is therefore with some diffidence that I rise to reiterate a point I made in a speech in the Senate on December 12, 1979. As it is reported in Debates of the Senate at page 2600, Senator Roblin said in his speech last night:

One way or another, the natural resource of his province is being supplied to the people of Canada at something less than half price. I know of no other province which has disposed of any of its natural resources on such a generous basis.

The "his" refers to Premier Lougheed.

In his speech during the pipeline debate on November 21, 1979 Senator Manning made somewhat the same point with regard to the national energy policy. He said that Ontario nickel, Quebec iron and other natural resources are all sold at the international price, whereas western oil is the only commodity that is treated differently.

I will not reiterate what I said in my speech, but I did point out that for many years, at various times, there has been a two-price system for copper, that in 1965 the federal government placed copper under the Export and Import Permits Act, and that by the first month of 1966 the London Metals Exchange price was double the Canadian producer price. At various times during the ensuing years there were differences in the domestic price and the international price. For example, in 1974 the London Metals Exchange price was about $1.50 per pound, while the North America producers' price was about 80 cents, which worked out to about 53 per cent of world price.

Ontario and Quebec are very large producers of copper. I do not know whether Alberta produces any, but if it does I am sure it is insignificant. Therefore, the statement by Senator Roblin that he does not know of any province which has disposed of any of its natural resources on such a generous basis is, in fact, not strictly accurate.

Senator Flynn: You made a very important point. It was worth it.

Senator Frith: Senator Roblin said he did not know of any.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

LABOUR RELATIONS

PROPOSALS FOR IMPROVEMENT

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets rose pursuant to notice of Thursday, June 18, 1981:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the serious disintegration of labour relations in Canada and to various proposals for a more orderly and less disruptive exercise of the right to strike.

He said: Honourable senators, I shall try not to take up too much of your time. I would like to consider with you some of the aspects of the serious problems arising from the negotiation of collective agreements both in the private and the public sectors.

Honourable senators, we are all aware of the difficulties we are now facing in Canada with respect to labour relations. There is no need to quote lengthy sets of figures, because if you keep your eyes and ears opened, radio, television and the newspapers constantly remind us of the numerous strikes and lockouts throughout the country. These strikes and lockouts affect all areas of services. No one is spared. It is hell let loose.

I do not propose to dispute the right to strike or to issue a lockout order, and I hope that no one will consider this as a support for management or for the unions; the only reason why I enter this debate is the responsibility which we share as members of the Senate for millions of our fellow Canadians who suffer from such situations which affect services, often essential ones, to which they are entitled, who are never consulted and who are used as innocent hostages.

Adding to this the current economic situation plagued by inflation, unemployment, high interest rates and an insignificant increase in productivity, one may well understand how urgent it is to have a very close look at the use of the right to strike and have lockouts, in order first to reduce the number of strikes and lockouts, and then to shorten them when they do occur.

One may understand the seriousness of the situation when one considers that, in 1979, labour management conflicts resulted in 1,050 work stoppages in Canada involving close to 500,000 employees and resulting in a loss of some eight million person-days of work.

If we compare the situation in Canada with that of 12 other industrialized countries, including the United States, France, Germany, Great Britain, and so on, figures show that between 1967 and 1976, Italy came first in the loss of person-days per thousand employees, while Canada came second. However, if we look at the statistics for the average length of work stoppages for the same period, Canada is in first place, followed by the United States.

What can we do in such circumstances? I believe that this is the type of mandate which we could assign to a committee of the Senate in the public interest. This would give us the opportunity to have discussions with both management and the unions in looking for a mechanism which would soften the social tensions which we are now experiencing. I shall make a definite proposal on this at the end of my comments.

In this regard, I would like to remind you of one thing that we know in the Senate, but of which the public is unfortunately not always aware. Throughout the years, we have built for ourselves a certain reputation thanks to our inquiries on just about every subject. I would like to mention in passing that, following the Croll inquiry on retirement, the end of mandatory retirement and the question of pensions, certain recommendations were made. One of the first was to put an end to mandatory retirement at 65. You were informed a few weeks ago that a bill was introduced in the Quebec National Assembly to put an end to mandatory retirement at 65. I consider this one of the first consequences of a very exhaustive study carried out by one of our committees chaired by Senator Croll.

Honourable senators, I shall therefore immediately suggest certain actions liable to improve the situation, and I hope that the honourable senators whose experience far exceeds mine in this respect may then make further suggestions so that a Senate committee will be able to work with constructive proposals.

My first suggestion concerns one of the major contentious issues, that of wage increases. I ask myself this question: Does Canada have the financial capacity to absorb national wage increases which would correspond to the increase in the cost of living for any given year? If, for instance, the Minister of Finance, either when delivering his budget or at any other time, following a provincial-federal agreement, were to provide for any given year a maximum allowable salary increase to match the increase in the cost of living and if the provincial legislatures were to take the same attitude, it would mean that there would be nationwide action to set a ceiling on pay increases for a given year. The question is: Is such a proposition both desirable and possible?

I have read somewhere, in a study on the question, that Canada was in a position to enact such a salary increase on a national basis, unfortunately I cannot give a precise source. However, I think I can give an affirmative answer to the question, based on the fact that for the last year for which wage increase data are available nationally, they averaged 12.6 per cent, and this exceeds the cost of living increase over the same period. I therefore submit that this proposition deserves consideration, because it directly implies in itself a significant decrease in the number of strikes or lockouts.

My second suggestion has to do with considering the Swedish experience, which I find most interesting and capable of being applied in Canada. Statistics show that in Sweden, for the period extending from 1967 to 1976, there have been 38 man-days lost per 1,000 employees, as compared to 959 in Canada over the same period, 30 times more. The Swedes succeeded in reducing the number of negotiations through a process of central negotiations. Employees are grouped under four major labour federations, while employers are represented by one only. Negotiations at the national level deal essentially on the minimum and hourly wages, working hours and leave.

[Senator Deschatelets.]

Other work conditions are negotiated locally. Agreements between federations are not binding by themselves, they are only recommended. But actually the centrally negotiated agreement gets automatic approval. The Swedish experience seems very interesting, because it is aimed at reducing the number of negotiations and therefore the danger of a number of strikes.

● (1530)

In West Germany we find a variation that is just as interesting, aimed at a trilateral agreement at the national level. Each year, labour and government leaders meet to discuss the conditions of the national economy. In the light of a number of factors including inflation, unemployment rates and monetary policies, the parties come to an agreement in respect of salaries and fringe benefits for the coming year. Once concluded, the agreement receives unconditional support from all interested parties and other working conditions are negotiated locally. Even though such an approach in no way precludes strikes or lock-outs, the trilateral agreement has had a beneficial impact because for the period extending from 1967 to 1976, Germany has had the second best result of industrialized countries in respect of person-days lost per employee. As in Sweden, the German system has as a pre-requisite a consolidation of labour unions and employers to improve the results of negotiations at the national level.

Honourable senators, another proposal I find interesting is co-management, or employee representation on board of directors. It is an interesting formula which has often been advocated to reduce the tensions aggravating labour relations; its main attraction is that both parties involved are fully aware of one another's positions, objectives and constraints. It minimizes the possibilities of strikes and lockouts. This formula has gained favour mostly in Europe and I would suggest that Canada might benefit from that experiment.

Another similar formula is to promote a system of profit-sharing or share distribution for employees; if employees realize that they are more directly involved when it comes to the financial health of their employer, perhaps their demands will be more reasonable.

Now a few formulas of a more procedural nature might also be considered through amendments to the Labour Code. Through legislation, it might thus be made mandatory that before the expiry date of a collective agreement either party tells the other which provisions of the agreement it intends to challenge during the negotiations and which ones it accepts as being renewable without any changes. Given such notice, each party would be in a position to concentrate its efforts on the contentious provisions and the major consequential benefit would be to pinpoint the real causes of disagreement and thus avoid the many bluffs we hear about now and again in collective bargaining. Our present system does not provide for mandatory conciliation or mediation mechanisms before a strike or a lockout. It is a major possibility which we might consider.

As you probably know, honourable senators, there are many other aspects we might look at in an attempt to reduce the number of strikes and their duration as well. But I have no intention today to delve into such a complex issue. My purpose is very simply to draw your attention to a problem which I think is very serious, a problem which in some regards borders on anarchy and chaos. I would want us to get together and take measures in an effort to lessen the consequences of that thorny problem in the interest of all Canadians.

I therefore suggest that this whole issue be referred to a Senate committee for further consideration, and I tabled this day a notice of motion which could be put on Monday's order paper. I will not be addressing this motion of course, as I am speaking of the subject matter today. But I want to indicate, by tabling this motion, that this is not a problem that can be solved by speeches alone. I wanted to speak to you of this problem today. I think that you are aware just as I am of the seriousness of this issue and I think it is important, before we adjourn for the summer, to show all Canadians that we are very concerned and that we want, without further delay, to prepare the ground for an in-depth study of this whole matter.

Finally, in the absence of the Leader of the Government, I want to address some remarks to the Deputy Leader, the Honourable Senator Frith, regarding the setting up of this committee, should the Senate agree to it. This is what I want to say to Senator Frith and also to the Leader of the Opposition: Why do we not take this opportunity to get off the beaten path? For this inquiry into an issue which concerns the majority of Canadians, why do we not try to set up this committee somewhat differently from the other senate committees?

For instance, the responsibility for setting up this committee should be given to a maximum of seven senators. The rationale for this suggestion is as follows: so far we have tried to have regional representation in our committees so that the provinces would be adequately represented. For this special committee I do not see why we could not take a different approach and model it on a task force, for example. The House of Commons, if I am not mistaken, has a different approach.

I therefore submit that seven could be in charge of this inquiry with prior understanding that, should a member be unable to attend the sittings, other members of the Senate could be substituted so that there would always be seven members sitting on the committee. You might consider this as a detail, but to me it is very important; these senators could sit at the chairman's table wearing a name tag to be identified, and the witness or witnesses as in all inquiries could appear before them.

I have seen several of our Senate inquiries where eight or ten witnesses appeared before 16, 17 or 18 senators. Coats and hats were hanging there, there were commissioners around but no one knew who was in charge. So, I feel it is important to observe the proprieties; it would give added prestige to those who will be asked to assume that responsibility. This reminds me of the telecast of the sittings of the American Senate, for instance, where we see that the senators, whose names are clearly identified, share equally with the chairman the full responsibility of the inquiry.

Those are but a few ideas I submit to you, honourable senators. I do hope you will agree with my suggestions. Once again, I feel that as members of the Upper House, though we are not elected by the people, we still have, by virtue of the Constitution, some responsibility towards our fellow-citizens. If there is a matter about which we hear people complain in every province it is that of the numerous strikes which leave the citizens defenseless. What I propose to you today is that we meet their expectations and try to find a solution together.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with respect to the question directed to the Leader of the Government and, in his absence, to me, I should like to say that we, on this side, are always willing to consider changes and improvements to our committee system. In this case, however, I suggest that Senator Deschatelets is placing the cart before the horse. As a matter of fact, we are merely debating an inquiry.

Of course, the remarks Senator Deschatelets has made concerning his inquiry are relevant to the motion. We will even consider the motion next Monday evening.

I cannot say, therefore, that there is no link between the two. But, at the same time, I suggest that we must differentiate between the motion and the inquiry, because the motion refers to the establishment of a committee to deal with an issue which is probably universally accepted. That is a very serious issue, but it is possible that other senators, for instance, Senator Lawson, our resident expert on labour relations—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Resident?

Senator Frith: Yes, resident, there, now.

Senator Lafond: Present?

Senator Frith: Present. It is quite possible we may have to consider the reactions of other honourable senators concerning this motion. Logically speaking, this problem may be deemed serious enough to warrant the setting up of a committee. But some may wonder whether the setting up of a committee is a valid solution. I can assure Senator Deschatelets that we are willing to consider the new approaches he has suggested concerning the setting up of a committee and perhaps take advantage, for instance, of the experience of the task forces.

Senator Deschatelets: It is quite reasonable.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, following the suggestion made by the Deputy Leader of the Government about the situation set out by Senator Deschatelets, first by means of a notice of motion and then a motion proper, it seems to me that the debate on those two procedures cannot be differentiated. I would suggest that nobody else speak on the inquiry under consideration but that we carry on the debate next Monday evening on the formal motion of Senator Deschatelets to set up that committee.

Senator Frith: We will wait for the motion, fine. I did not mean that both matters should be divided or that there is no relation between them. Quite clearly there is.

Senator Flynn: Well, there is the conclusion—

Senator Frith: That is right. Even if there is connection procedurally as far as the setting up of the committee is concerned, it should be considered after the proposal has been assessed on its merits.

[English]

The Hon. the Acting Speaker (Hon. Renaude Lapointe): As no other honourable senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is considered as having been debated.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, June 29, 1981, at 8 p.m.

STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL FINANCE

REPORT ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B) LAID BEFORE PARLIAMENT
FOR THE FISCAL YEAR ENDING MARCH 31, 1982

June 23, 1981

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to which the Supplementary Estimates (B) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1982 were referred, has in obedience to the order of reference of Thursday, June 18, 1981 examined the said Supplementary Estimates (B) and reports as follows:

The Committee was authorized by the Senate as recorded in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of June 18, 1981 to examine and report upon the expenditures proposed by the Supplementary Estimates (B) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1982.

In obedience to the foregoing, your Committee examined the Supplementary Estimates (B) and heard evidence from the following: from the Treasury Board: Mr. D. J. Johnston, President; Mr. R. L. Richardson, Deputy Secretary; Mr. L. J. O'Toole, Assistant Secretary; Mr. E. R. Stimpson, Director General, Budget Co-ordination Group; and from the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources: Mr. D. J. Orchard, Director, Gas and Electric Conversions, Canada Oil Substitution Program; Mrs. Nancy Mitchell, CHIP Administrator, Conversion and Renewable Energy Branch.

Supplementary Estimates (B), 1981-82 were presented at this time due to the ruling of the Speaker of the House of Commons of June 12, 1981. In this, the Speaker ruled 10 votes contained in the Main Estimates, 1981-82 to be deleted as they were "really legislative items which deal with matters of substance". This ruling, and its precedents, are based on a principle endorsed in the past by this Committee, namely that appropriation acts should not be used to amend or enact legislation. In the Speaker's words, "the appropriation act should only seek authority to spend the money for a program that has been previously authorized by a statute." A complete copy of the Speaker's ruling is attached for information.

The Committee recognizes the opportunity afforded by the ruling of the Speaker of the House of Commons, to re-examine the legislative process and in particular the appropriate role of the estimates and appropriation acts. We agree with the President of the Treasury Board that the implications of these rulings are potentially far reaching and urge a full Parliamentary review of this matter.

The government has amended 6 of the 10 votes, and re-submitted them in Supplementary Estimates (B). The notes below provide brief descriptions of these 6 items. Separate legislation will be introduced to deal with the 4 items ruled out of order and not reported in this Supplementary.

Agriculture—Vote 30b

The original vote was objected to because it requested authority for payments to "owners of animals affected with diseases under that Act that have died or have been slaughtered in circumstances not covered by the Act." The new vote is identical to the original with the exception that this phrase has been deleted. The dollar amount of the estimate has not been changed as the actual estimated outlays associated with the changes is estimated to be minimal.

Energy, Mines and Resources—Votes 35b, 40b, 45b

Votes 35 and 40 deal with the Home Insulation Program and vote 45 concerns the Oil Substitution Program. All three received funding under an interim appropriation passed in March in the amount of 25% of the full estimate. When these votes were ruled out of order because they were deemed to be establishing new programs in the absence of other legislative authority, Parliament was put in the position of having authorized expenditures for which there existed no estimate. To remedy this situation, the supplementary estimates cover only the amounts of the interim appropriations.

Supply and Services—Vote 5b

The original vote was intended to permit certain adjustments in the calculation of the Department's accounts. The offending words contained in the vote have been deleted in the supplementary vote.

Transport—Vote 110b

This vote contained words which sought to amend a certain section of the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act which deals with payments to truckers. Again, the offending words have been deleted and the vote reintroduced otherwise unchanged.

Respectfully submitted,

F. Leblanc,
Deputy Chairman.

APPENDIX TO REPORT

EXTRACT FROM THE HOUSE OF COMMONS DEBATES,
JUNE 12, 1981

POINT OF ORDER

MR. ANDRE—PROVISIONS IN MAIN ESTIMATES 1981-82—RULING
BY MADAM SPEAKER

Madam Speaker: On June 1 the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) argued the point of order that he had raised some weeks earlier, namely, the procedural acceptability of certain items contained in the Main Estimates for 1981-82. It had been suggested to the hon. member on that earlier occasion that he await until the Estimates were formally returned to the House May 31, at which point there would remain ample time to dispose of the matter well before the last allotted day.

Both the hon. member for Calgary Centre and, in reply for the government, the President of the Treasury Board, (Mr. Johnston) dealt briefly with the history of the points of order relating to what the Estimates should contain.

This history shows that during the past ten years, members have objected that in one way or another the Estimates that have been submitted from time to time by the government have attempted to do more than set out the spending requirements of the government for the next fiscal year. This is of course supposed to be the acknowledged purpose of Estimates and Appropriation Acts.

In 1971 the Chair ruled that items in the Estimates that attempt to amend existing statutes are out of order. This was confirmed by most subsequent rulings.

In 1974 and 1976 the Chair went further and dealt with the question of matters of substance being put in the Estimates. The Speaker, in effect, ruled that the Appropriation Act is not the place to seek authority to do something such as to establish a program. Rather, the Appropriation Act should only seek authority to spend the money for a program that has been previously authorized by a statute.

In 1977 the Chair continued to lay down these principles that should be followed in the use of the Estimates and added that it makes no difference whether the item attempted to spend a large sum or simply one dollar. The distinction is unimportant. The test is whether or not the government is putting forward a spending estimate under authority it already possesses, or whether it is really seeking new legislative authority to do something.

In March of that year the Speaker said:

The government receives from Parliament the authority to act through the passage of legislation and receives the money to finance such authorized action through the passage by Parliament of an appropriation act. A supply item in my opinion ought not, therefore, to be used to obtain authority which is the proper subject of legislation;—

In other words, the government may not by the use of an Appropriation Act obtain authority that it does not have under existing legislation.

The then Speaker summed it up in this way in December 1977:

Supply ought to be confined strictly to the process for which it was intended; that is to say, for the purpose of putting forward by the government the estimate of money it needs, and then in turn voting by the House of that money to the government, and not to be extended in any way into the legislative area, because legislation and legislated changes in substance are not intended to be part of supply, but rather ought to be part of the legislative process in the regular way which requires three readings, committee stage, and, in other words, ample opportunity for Members to participate in debate and amendment.

Finally, it seems clear that it is in order to extend the purposes of an item in an Appropriation Act by means of an item in the Estimates provided that it does not amend any other legislation.

The hon. member for Calgary Centre objects to 12 items contained in the Main Estimates. Of the 12, Agriculture vote 30, Department of Public Works vote L-70, Supply and Services vote 5, and Transport vote 110 each mention specific legislation which they seek to amend, and are clearly out of order on the basis of the principle established in 1971 and repeated continually in all of the rulings from the Chair since that time; that is, estimates which attempt to amend existing legislation are out of order.

The hon. member for Calgary Centre then objects to Energy, Mines and Resources votes 35, 40 and 45. An examination of these items clearly shows that they seek both to establish a new program in the absence of other legislative authority and the funds to put it into operation. This runs counter to the rulings of the Chair since 1974, which hold legislation is required to authorize new programs, particularly matters of major substance. That we are dealing here with matters of substance is demonstrated by the fact that vote 45 seeks even to grant to the governor in council the power to pass regulations. By definition, the estimates seek spending authority alone; they are not intended to ask for substantial authority, such as to pass regulations.

Accordingly, consistent with earlier rulings, Energy, Mines and Resources votes 35, 40 and 45 are out of order. I note that in his remarks last June 1, the President of the Treasury Board confirmed this view when he addressed the question of the receivability of these items by saying, "Of course, legislation will be introduced with respect to those programs". By asking for money now, he would be putting the cart before the horse.

The next items objected to are External Affairs votes L45, L50, L55 and L60, and Finance vote L15. They are grouped together because each of them seeks authority to finance international development by the use of issuing demand notes to the credit of the various named banks or institutions upon which they may draw in the Bank of Canada, or to purchase shares in the listed banks. The hon. member for Calgary Centre suggests that these items are an attempt to grant to the government authority to undertake certain actions rather than simply asking for funds, and that they also contravene the provisions of Section 80 of the Financial Administration Act, which states that the Crown cannot assign its debts without legislative authority.

While I suggest that these items do not seek, for the Crown, the right to assign its debts, three of them, nevertheless, seek to grant authority for the government to take certain action, and on a very substantial scale. This is, of course, contrary to the previous rulings of the Chair mentioned earlier, which stated that legislation and legislative changes in substance are not intended to be part of supply.

However, two of the items, External Affairs votes L50 and L55, have previous statutory authority, albeit previous Appropriation Acts, and thus are in order. With respect to the three other votes, that is, External Affairs votes L45 and L60 and Finance vote L15, they have no statutory foundation and are legislative items. Again, following the principles enunciated in previous rulings of the Chair, votes L45 and L60 of External Affairs and vote L15, Finance, must be ruled out of order.

That these items are really legislative items which deal with matters of substance is confirmed in the Blue Book. There is shown, on the same page which contains these items, an amount to be paid as a statutory item, and the statute referred to is the very programs for which approval is being sought. In other words, if vote L60, which includes the initial subscription for shares in a bank, were to be passed this year, next year the second instalment would be shown as a statutory matter, and the program consisting of the remaining instalments for shares in the international bank would be shown as a votable item.

As I said earlier, the programs described by External Affairs votes L50 and L55 are authorized by previous Appropriation Acts, and therefore the moneys sought for the instalment to be paid are in order.

I notice that on March 25 of this year, when the House dealt with a point of order in respect of similar items by the hon. member, I ended my ruling on the note that they should be raised at some future date, and I would have to be convinced that these similar matters are not really legislative items that should be introduced by separate statute. It seems that that time has come, and I am not convinced. It is certainly apparent to me that if complicated votes such as these and, for that matter, if all votes included a reference to the statutory authority on which they are based, it would be easier to determine whether or not they were in order.

While the significance of such a ruling is not lost, as was said on March 22, 1977, the function of the Chair is to ensure that what Parliament attempts to do is procedurally correct. Furthermore, the Chair is comforted by the fact that the President of the Treasury Board said on June 1 last, in reply to the point of order at issue here, that legislation will be introduced with respect to these programs, referring to the programs for insulation and conversion from oil to gas.

While the hon. member for Calgary Centre may be correct in his suspicion that there are other votes in the Estimates which are out of order, it is not the role of the Speaker to act on her own initiative in such procedural questions.

Finally, while in the past, including the Chair's ruling earlier this year, time constraints may have dictated a certain course of action, this is not the case here. The hon. member for Calgary Centre raised his point well in time, and long before the day when the House will actually deal with their adoption in the bill based thereon.

Accordingly, I must now find that Agriculture vote 30, Public Works vote L70, Supply and Services vote 5, Transport vote 110, Energy, Mines and Resources votes 35, 40 and 45, External Affairs votes L45 and L60 and Finance vote L15, as contained in the Main Estimates 1981-82, are not properly before the House, and they are thereby ordered to be deleted therefrom.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

NORTHERN PIPELINE

FOURTH REPORT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE

Tuesday, June 23, 1981

The Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline, in accordance with its Order of Reference of July 10, 1980 to inquire into any matter relating to the planning and construction of a pipeline for the transmission of natural gas from Alaska and Northern Canada has the honour to present its Fourth Report as follows:

Since the commencement of the new session, the Special Committee has kept abreast of progress on the Alaska Highway Pipeline by calling the Minister and officials from the Northern Pipeline Agency as well as witnesses from the Company, Foothills Pipe Lines (Yukon) Ltd., who have advised that the southern portions of the pipeline are on schedule and within cost limits.

The most important activity undertaken recently to assist the Special Committee in its ongoing monitoring function was a tour of the northern route which the Alaska Highway Pipeline will follow. As part of its investigations, the Special Committee met with U.S. and Canadian governments and industry officials and visited oil and gas facilities in Alaska and northern Canada during the first week of June. The Committee's objectives were to increase its technical knowledge of pipeline and related activities and to hear the concerns of local municipal and native people regarding pipeline development.

In the Yukon, the Special Committee consulted with the Yukon Territorial Government, the Yukon Advisory Council and the Council of Yukon Indians. All three groups emphasized that Territorial residents should receive manpower and employment benefits from the northern pipeline and other developments in the region. The principal concern was the restriction placed on local hiring objectives in the North by the "mobility rights" provisions of Section 6 of the Proposed Resolution respecting the Constitution of Canada.

The Special Committee learned, on its next stop in Alaska where these concerns are shared, that a state law allowing preferential hiring of Alaskans was unanimously declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the U.S.A.

The Special Committee visited Alaska to better understand the U.S. Federal-Alaska role in planning the pipeline, to study the lessons of the Alyeska experience, and to learn the functions of the Office of the Federal Inspector, the U.S. counterpart to the Northern Pipeline Agency. Generally, there is continued optimism in U.S. circles that the Alaskan portion of the pipeline is capable of being privately financed. Northwest Alaska Pipeline Company provided details on field studies being conducted to finalize design of the Alaskan section. No site preparation has commenced as yet at Prudhoe Bay.

The Special Committee then visited installations at Prudhoe Bay, Alaska and at Tuktoyaktuk and Norman Wells in the Northwest Territories to learn first-hand about the complexities of oil and gas exploration, development, production and transportation north of the 60th parallel of latitude.

In the Northwest Territories, the Special Committee also concentrated on hearing the concerns of elected officials and townspeople in small communities with regard to the impact of pipeline activities. The dominant impression was one of an overall desire to actively participate in and enjoy benefits from development activities. The resolution of the land claims issue was urged by native leaders, who saw land claims as the principal route to economic equality, and one that must precede construction of the pipeline.

The Committee was most impressed by the invariably enthusiastic reception by the various community and native peoples who were appreciative of the efforts of the Senate Committee to know at first hand of their concerns.

The Special Committee was made aware that the North is a fragile environment being exposed to a number of large projects in the future. Understanding the complex issues likely to overtake that region in the next few years is imperative, in the Committee's view. The trip north was an important step in increasing the Special Committee's comprehension; however, it realizes that a continuing effort in this direction is essential if it is to fulfill its general mandate to monitor all aspects of Canadian gas and oil development in an effective fashion.

The Special Committee, therefore, recommends that it be authorized to examine, consider and report on the transportation of petroleum and natural gas in Canada, north of the 60th parallel of latitude and any matter related thereto.

Respectfully submitted,

EARL A. HASTINGS,
Chairman.

THE SENATE

Monday, June 29, 1981

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Honourable Renaude Lapointe, P.C., Speaker pro tem, in the Chair.

Prayers.

THE LATE TERRANCE STANLEY FOX, C.C.

TRIBUTES

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Flynn, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(h):

That this house deeply mourns the death of Terry Fox, an outstanding Canadian, whose "Marathon of Hope" will always be remembered, and pays tribute to his courageous spirit and unselfish generosity so magnificently displayed in his fight against the ravages of cancer; and

That the Honourable the Speaker convey the condolences of the Senate of Canada to the family of this great young man.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, it is as hard, I find, to describe the phenomenon of Terry Fox's life as it is to find words to describe the feelings of Canadians and others on his death.

His life was really remarkable, to use an inadequate word. It is a loss for the nation and for us. Just remember that one year ago, on Canada Day, his cross-country run, his "Marathon of Hope", brought him here to Ottawa.

He lost his right leg in 1977 from cancer, and then, on September 2, 1980, had to stop his run near Thunder Bay because the cancer had spread to his lungs. On June 19 he was admitted to hospital, where very recently he fell into a coma and died at 7.35 a.m. on June 29, one month before his twenty-third birthday.

He received many honours. He deserved them all and deserved many that we did not have time to give him. He raised more than $23 million for cancer research.

In announcing on behalf of the government the establishment of the Terry Fox Humanitarian Award Program, the Prime Minister said today:

Let us keep fresh in our minds his example of boundless hope and courage . . .

The program will give help and encouragement in Terry's name to young people who are pursuing excellence in their academic studies in the fields of fitness, health and amateur sport, or in fields related to community service. That will be one way of keeping the spirit of Terry Fox alive in our land, one way of remembering a young Canadian who gave far more to his country than his country was able to give to him.

On a personal level, many of us know something of what he went through and some of us certainly know what his parents and his friends are going through. Just as it is difficult to define or describe Terry's life and one's feelings on his death, it is difficult to define the often loosely used word "hero". I do not know that I would like to try to define it in words, but Terry Fox defined it in deeds. I suppose that the comparison between heroes and those of us who are not heroes is one that we cannot easily understand. I believe it was Pope who said:

Who sees with equal eye, as God of all,

A hero perish, or a sparrow fall—

Fitzgerald, I do remember, said:

Show me a hero and I will write you a tragedy.

In both his life and his death, Terry Fox gave us a real gift, one of the rarest of gifts that a human can give to the rest of mankind—inspiration.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on behalf of my colleagues in the official opposition, I wish to join with Senator Frith in paying tribute to this uncommon young man.

Terry Fox, probably in part as a result of his illness, possessed an insight and a maturity not often found in people of his age. It was this appreciation of that which matters that led him last year, against unbelievable odds, to take action, to mount his own crusade against an enemy that threatened his life and so many other lives.

One cannot but marvel at his indomitable courage and determination. He refused to sit back and feel sorry for himself. Instead he proceeded, by his incredible cross-country marathon, to attract the attention of Canadians to the need for a renewed interest in and rededication to the task of conquering cancer.

● (2005)

But he did more than expose fear and despair to the bright light of hope. He did more than act as a beacon for those struggling to regain their health. He succeeded in galvanizing, as few are ever able to do, the faith and love of a nation.

He gave us reason to believe that we can, if we set our minds to it, some day vanquish this dread disease as we have so many others down through the history of man.

But more important than all else, Terry Fox made us feel again. He made us feel for the suffering of others. He helped us open up our hearts to those many Canadians who daily suffer in quiet dignity.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, the courage and wisdom of this young man were certainly out of the ordinary. However, if his generation was able to produce Terry Fox, our country will not be in such bad hands in a few years when his generation takes over. In offering our most sincere condolences to his parents, I want to say that they have the great consolation of knowing that they have given to the country a son whose contribution was remarkable. Senator Frith said that Terry Fox was truly a hero. I agree. We have had many heroes, and wars have produced a great many of them. We have monuments for those who gave up their lives to save their country. But we also have a monument to the unknown soldier. I wonder if, one day, we shall not also have to build a monument to those unknown people who, like Terry Fox, but without so much public support, have fought the same fight for the same objectives and who deserve all the admiration of every one of us and every Canadian.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Deputy Leader of the Government which should be of interest to all senators since it has to do with what may come to us before the summer adjournment, if there is to be one.

Would the Deputy Leader of the Government tell us what the government envisages at this time in the way of bills which could come to us, and when Parliament may adjourn for the summer recess?

I know that four bills were passed by the House of Commons last week and, of course, we have yet to deal with Bill C-57. It is my further understanding that the appropriation bill will be passed by the House of Commons tomorrow afternoon and that the government has appropriation only up to June 30, which is tomorrow. Does that suggest the government will want the Senate to pass the appropriation bill tomorrow, in a few minutes or even a few hours? Is that what is to be required of us?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank Senator Flynn for raising this question because it gives me an opportunity to share, with honourable senators, what I earlier shared with the Leader of the Opposition when we briefly discussed the matter.

Let me go in reverse order and talk first about the appropriation bill. What Senator Flynn said is correct. My information is that that bill will be voted on tomorrow afternoon in the other place, so we may not receive it until tomorrow evening.

The other statement is also correct that in March, by an appropriation bill, the House of Commons and the Senate gave interim supply until June 30—that is, tomorrow. Therefore, it would be desirable to have royal assent tomorrow evening, although, in my opinion, it is undesirable that we should be asked to do it at such short notice.

A possible justification for that, of course, is that when the bill is introduced, it will appear that it reflects the estimates with an adjustment related to the decision made by the Speaker of the House of Commons. Those estimates were debated in the Senate and studied and reported by the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. The reason I say a “possible justification” is that we know from earlier discussions why we do not want the House of Commons to get the impression that because we pre-study a bill it means the bill, when it arrives, therefore does not require any further study. But, as of tomorrow evening interim supply will be exhausted, so we expect—if we receive it—that we will be asked to pass not the adjusting bills but that basic adjusted-estimates supply bill. I regret that we are asked to do that on such short notice, because I share Senator Flynn’s feelings, or the implication in his question that it is not desirable for us to have to do it on such short notice.

Now, let me review generally the program for this week. Four bills have been introduced this evening, and second reading will be moved tomorrow. The supply bill makes a total of five bills. There is a possibility that we will have Bill C-37, to amend the Holidays Act. Bill C-50 is in committee. Bill C-57 has not yet gone to committee, but it has had quite a bit of pre-study. We would like it to go to committee tonight after second reading if honourable senators feel that its principle has been sufficiently debated.

A number of bills, I understand, are going to be introduced to correct the results of the ruling by the Speaker of the House of Commons. There was an intention that those adjustments would be the subject of an omnibus bill, but it appears now that they will be introduced individually. I believe, there is a possibility of an agreement in the other place on time to debate those bills.

I mention that, honourable senators, because it means, in turn, that there is a very good chance we will receive some of those bills tomorrow and the remainder on Thursday, when, I believe, the Commons anticipates dealing with the balance of them.

● (2030)

It means that if we sit on Thursday and Friday of this week, it would be possible—that is, technically possible; whether it is politically possible is another question—for us to complete everything that we would be asked to do before the summer recess by Friday of this week if we sit on Thursday and Friday, except for the threatened postal strike. We would be less than frank if we did not realize that we might have to hold ourselves ready for some legislative action that might relate to the postal strike. I cannot say anything more than that. I have no inside information. I am merely saying that it seems logical for us, as conscientious legislators, to know that it might be a possibility.

To summarize, there is a lot of legislative material before us, some of it quite meaty and some of it less meaty; some of it including rather important principles, some of them having been partly debated and dealt with and some—if I can use such a word about any legislation—comparatively routine.

At this stage, therefore, I cannot say whether or not we shall have to ask honourable senators to sit on Thursday and Friday, but I feel quite sure that we shall have to sit tomorrow afternoon and evening. At that time, I expect we shall be asking the Senate to grant supply under the appropriation bill. By that time we may also have some adjusting bills, and we shall have to assess the situation then.

I again thank Senator Flynn for asking me the question. Our plans for what may happen beyond Thursday will be subject to the possibility for our sitting those two days.

Senator Flynn: With regard to appropriation, I have a supplementary question. I was never told exactly what the effect might be of delaying by a few days the passage of a supply bill. We have always been told that the cheques could not be mailed, that everyone would suffer, and that the blame would be placed on the opposition. I was never convinced of that. Can the Deputy Leader of the Government enlighten me in this respect, particularly in view of the threat of a postal strike? If the cheques cannot be mailed, I cannot see why it would be necessary to have supply right away. That is my first question.

My second question concerns the other bills, namely, those we received today and those that we may yet receive, outside of Bill C-57. It does not appear that there is any rush in connection with those bills. I would like the Deputy Leader of the Government to confirm that.

I come now to what the deputy leader called "adjusting bills" in connection with the estimates. He said they would reach us tomorrow or Thursday. Does he mean that except for the problem of the postal strike we could close Parliament by Friday; or is it quite certain, as I understand it is, that Parliament will sit next week? If Parliament is going to sit next week, then, before adjourning tomorrow we need deal only with the rush bills such as the appropriation bill. That would be the only one required. If the other place is to deal with the adjustments to the estimates tomorrow, Thursday and Friday, then it's obvious they do not have to be passed by July 1. If they can wait for one or two days, it seems to me that they can certainly wait for four or five. If we were to pass them by Monday or Tuesday of next week, it would really make no difference, because these special estimates do not involve paying out salaries. With regard to C-57, if we are not to finish this week, it would not hurt if we were to pass the bill next week. Certainly we on this side would favour that.

If there is any assurance that we can finish our program by Friday, we would then adjust ourselves accordingly—with one condition that we will mention to the deputy leader when debate is resumed on Bill C-57. In any event, I think we should be helped a little in trying to determine what we on this side should do. I can understand the other side saying that everything is fine, but I do not think that is our perspective. We are not as confident and do not possess the same blind faith as the Minister for Economic Development.

An Hon. Senator: Too bad!

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, three points were raised by Senator Flynn. The first was what I might call "Why supply tomorrow night?"; the second was the urgency of the other bills; and the third might be entitled "Really Friday?"

Taking the first one, "Why supply", as I understand it, the government will be out of authority to spend money. It is not just a question of mailing cheques.

Hon. G. I. Smith: How long has it been known that would be the case?

Senator Frith: As long as we have known—from the time it got interim supply.

Senator Smith: That was a long time ago.

Senator Frith: That's right. I can say that the government and the House of Commons has known for that length of time. All parties in the House of Commons, and also the government, have known for that length of time. That's right. It always seems to develop that way. It is, therefore, not just a matter of mailing cheques. They won't be able to spend money.

[Senator Flynn.]

An Hon. Senator: Good!

Senator Frith: Someone says "good". There is a good chance for someone to stand up and reveal their conscience and say, "I, as a senator, am going to see that the government does not get any money, because I believe it should not have it." In any event, that is the reason. Therefore, we cannot really say there is no reason to have supply if there happens to be a mail strike. It is more serious than that. That is the reason why it is needed by the 30th, because—

Senator Flynn: You are skating.

Senator Frith: Skating?

Senator Flynn: Your advice—it is good skating.

Senator Frith: It is all that I know. I could find out, but I am sure that if I telephone or call for an explanation as to why there must be supply, more than what I have already said, I can guarantee that I will have some real horror stories for you tomorrow.

Senator Flynn: When you spoke of a mail strike, I was not suggesting that we would delay passage of the estimates until the strike is settled.

Senator Frith: Of course you weren't; but you said that if there might be a mail strike you were asking yourself why it should matter for two or three days. That is why it would matter for two or three days. I am simply saying it is not really related to the mail question.

On the question of the other bills and to the degree of urgency, in my view none of them is so urgent that we would be required to pass it by tomorrow night, or, for that matter, later this week, if we were sure that we were coming back the following week.

This brings me to the third question. That is, is it really possible that we will finish on Friday? In my opinion, it is, and I will tell you why. I do not think we can say that Parliament will be sitting next week unless we are sitting. Will the House of Commons be sitting next week? I would not be surprised. If we have cleaned up everything they have sent us, however, and, in my opinion, everything we are likely to get, then there is no reason for us to come back the following week.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): You cannot be sure. We may have to come back on Monday.

Senator Frith: That is a good point, Senator Roblin. But when I say there is no reason for us to come back, I mean there is no reason for us to come back just because the House of Commons is coming back. There may be a reason to come back for those other purposes I have mentioned. That is why I think that if we sit on Thursday and Friday there is a real possibility of the Senate finishing and not having to come back, except at the call of the Chair.

Senator Flynn: If we get the assurance that the House will pass those special bills, following the decision of the Speaker, I think I can follow the reasoning of the Deputy Leader of the Government; but, unless there is that agreement, I think we would have to assume that we would come back next week, and that we might be here on Thursday and Friday, not in order to wait for these bills but for something else.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I agree with that, and I should say, by way of a very short addendum, that so far I have not been persuaded that there is any reason for us to consider those other bills before we adjourn. They tell me that there are some reasons, but so far I have not been persuaded. We need them before we adjourn, but we do not need them by the end of this week, or, at least, so far I have not been so persuaded. Unless we are persuaded that they are needed, or that the House of Commons is going to pass those bills because of the agreement, then I agree with what Senator Flynn has said.

Senator Roblin: What does that mean? What does your agreement mean?

Senator Frith: The agreement that Senator Flynn referred to, namely, that they are going to allocate the time and that they are going to vote on them this week.

Senator Flynn: And if we find out that they will not pass those bills on Thursday or Friday, should we adjourn tomorrow until next Monday or Tuesday?

Senator Frith: Unless I can be persuaded, and, as I say, I am not yet so persuaded, that there is any reason for us to have those other bills accepted before we adjourn.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, by way of a supplementary and having to do with the business of the Senate, I would like to ask the Deputy Leader of the Government what the hope and expectation of the government is with regard to Bill C-57, in a somewhat larger context.

As honourable senators are aware, since last December we, on this side, have been attempting to have an appropriate committee of the Senate study the National Energy Program as a whole. Indeed, as the Deputy Leader of the Government is aware, I have a motion on the order paper to refer the National Energy Program to a committee of the Senate so that witnesses may be called from the producing provinces, from the industry, and from the various federal government departments, to enable us to examine this program.

The Deputy Leader of the Government has adjourned the debate on my motion on numerous occasions since last December. More recently he gave as his reason for so adjourning the debate that Bill C-57, after all, was coming to this chamber, and that no doubt during debate on and committee study of Bill C-57 we would have the opportunity that we have sought for so long to inquire into the National Energy Program as a whole.

As I pointed out the other day, after he put forward this rationale, when Bill C-57 came to us we would no doubt be under the gun to pass it. Indeed, Bill C-57 is here and we are under the gun to pass it. I am sure the Deputy Leader of the Government will not argue that the committee study we will be able to give in the next few days to Bill C-57 will enable us to call witnesses from the government, the producing provinces, industry, and so on, and make a thorough-going inquiry into the National Energy Program.

That being the case, I want to say in all fairness to the Deputy Leader of the Government that we would be prepared to be much more accommodating about Bill C-57 if we could have some assurance from the government—

Senator Flynn: Not “some”; “the” assurance.

Senator Murray: —the assurance from the government that when we return in the fall the government will, on its own initiative, move to refer the National Energy Program to the appropriate committee of this Senate.

Really, what I am seeking is for the Deputy Leader of the Government to reiterate the assurance he gave to me, and to the Senate, on December 11 last, as reported at page 1444 of Debates of the Senate, that he was in favour of this, that he thought it was a good idea, and that really the only question remaining was as to what committee of the Senate would study the National Energy Program.

I would like him to reiterate that commitment and to give us the further assurance that—I will wait while the Minister of State for Economic Development advises the Deputy Leader of the Government on this matter. I recall that at one point I put the question to the Minister of State for Economic Development, and he suggested that we should get on with the Constitution. Indeed, the Minister of State for Economic Development is of the opinion that we are all as limited as he, and that we can only concentrate on one matter at a time.

I want to ask the Deputy Leader of the Government, in as amicable a way as possible, whether he will reiterate the assurance he gave us on December 11 and give us the further assurance that when we return in the fall, as a matter of high priority and as a matter of immediate action, the government will move to have the National Energy Program referred to a committee of this house.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: A short, precise question.

Senator Murray: It is on a point of order having to do with the business of this house, and I regret it if some of my colleagues resent the length of the intervention. Surely, however, none of them would argue that it is not an important matter that we are dealing with.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): The rules still apply, no matter what the subject.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I still believe that it is a good idea for a committee of the Senate to study all aspects of the National Energy Program. I am not of the opinion that it is best for it to do so simply in the form of the program itself. In my view, it is better to do it with the bills as the bills appear. Bill C-57 is one part of the program; Bill C-48 is another part. I do not think I would have any trouble giving the assurance that all parts of the National Energy Program that a committee wants to study will be studied by the time the parts of the program that find legislative expression have come here. But I cannot give an undertaking that the subject matter of the National Energy Program as a whole will be referred, as a package, to a committee.

Senator Flynn: Why?

Senator Frith: I am not saying it will not be. I cannot give an assurance that it will be; that is all.

Senator Murray: Do I take it, then, that the Deputy Leader of the Government is withdrawing the assurance he gave us on December 11, as reported at page 1444 of Debates of the Senate? He said:

We may want to look into the question raised by Senator Murray as to what is the most suitable committee and what are the modalities; but the concept of giving the Senate an opportunity, through a committee, to examine this policy, and—

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: As a whole.

Senator Murray:

—to bring before it people who might have views to express by way of criticism, defence or just general observation, is, I believe, a good one.

Is the Deputy Leader of the Government withdrawing the commitment he made to us on that date?

Hon. R. James Balfour: In one word.

Senator Frith: No.

Senator Murray: Then what assurance is the deputy leader giving us?

Senator Frith: I should say that Senator Balfour was the one who insisted on the one-word answer, and so that is the one-word answer for him.

To Senator Murray I still say no, because I think it is a good idea and is desirable, and I hope it will happen, as I have said, that all aspects of the National Energy Program will be studied by a committee of the Senate that will have the power to call witnesses and examine it.

● (2050)

I believe, however, that it is better that that examination take place as the pieces of legislation come rather than taking the whole program at once, in the form of a book saying, "This is the National Energy Program." I believe the National Energy Program is of such great importance that it should receive careful study by committees, but it should receive that study on the basis that I have outlined.

Senator Murray: In that case, is the Deputy Leader of the Government prepared to wait until the fall to have Bill C-57 studied by a committee of the Senate?

Senator Frith: I hope that Bill C-57 will be referred to the committee and that the committee will decide what to do with it.

Senator Flynn: Would you not agree not to oppose a motion made by anyone referring the whole matter to a committee? We could agree to an amendment so that it could be referred to a committee other than the one proposed. However, I think that if you are prepared to say that the government would not oppose such a motion, except on a technicality such as changing the committee, you might very well give second reading to this bill tonight, have it in committee tomorrow morning and have it back tomorrow afternoon. It is a very honest offer.

Senator Frith: I am having a little trouble with the double negatives. Would I not agree not to oppose?

No, I would not agree not to oppose a motion referring the whole National Energy Program to a committee.

Senator Flynn: I asked, "Would you agree not to?" You have added a "not."

Senator Frith: I will not agree not to oppose a motion referring the whole National Energy Program in a package. I will not agree not to oppose it, but I do not see why we have to quibble about words. The difference is clear. Senator Murray thinks that the whole program should be referred and, though I can see the merits in that proposal, I believe it is better for the committee to study the National Energy Program by studying the main parts of that program, namely, Bills C-57, C-48, and so on. I think that is the best way for us to do our work; it is just that simple. We disagree; it is a difference of opinion.

In the final analysis, the only thing we have in common is that we both think that the whole program should receive careful study by committees. Of course, also from a government point of view, it should receive as expeditious a passage as possible.

[Translation]

If you were in our place, you would do the same, would you not?

[English]

Senator Flynn: No, and for a very simple reason. We do not have the numbers and we do not have the discipline that you have.

Senator Frith: We all noticed how discipline on the other side cracked completely on the Constitution question.

Senator Flynn: What!

Senator Smith: That was not a question of discipline. That was a question of belief in principle, which did not seem to worry my honourable friends at all.

Senator Frith: I beg your pardon?

Senator Smith: I was merely replying to the sort of irrelevant intervention the genial Deputy Leader of the Government made. My answer to him was just as irrelevant as his observation.

Senator Frith: I accept the description of your intervention, in any event.

Senator Smith: I refuse your acceptance unless you apply it to your own intervention.

In any event, if I may, honourable senators, I wish to raise a question with the Deputy Leader of the Government, with whom I like to agree as often as I reasonably can. I should like to remind him about another matter concerning which there has been some discussion about referral to a committee. That is the matter raised by Transport 2000 in a letter, a copy of which I received as chairman of the relevant committee. That matter is still germane, I am sure. I wonder if the deputy leader would give some commitment with regard to bringing it before a committee—not necessarily the one of which I am chairman—when we resume after the summer recess.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I do not think there is any question, in this case, as to which committee that should go to. If it is referred to a committee, it will be Senator Smith's committee.

There have been some events that have taken place with regard to the objections raised by Transport 2000 and some announcements made by VIA with reference to equipment, and so on. However, I do not intend that those developments should necessarily constitute a total answer. I will look up the correspondence, get an update and undertake to discuss with Senator Smith the referral of those items that may still be outstanding in the fall.

QUESTION PERIOD

POST OFFICE

POSSIBLE DISRUPTION OF SERVICE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I have a question for the Deputy Leader of the Government.

Has he any report to make on the impending postal strike?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Yes, I believe I do. I was given some information as I came into the chamber this evening.

As I heard the news this morning, honourable senators, the situation was somewhat deadlocked because of what I believe to be the position taken by Treasury Board. It was reported on the news that Treasury Board did not want to negotiate on the basis of a conciliation report, which included various items.

I am, however, glad to advise honourable senators that I am authorized to make this statement on behalf of the government.

The situation at the present time is very simple. The government has conveyed to the Canadian Union of Postal Workers its complete position on all outstanding items, including a commitment to negotiate on the issue of paid maternity leave. We have accepted many of the recommendations of the chairman of the conciliation board, including those on wages, the cost of living allowance and some improvements in vacation allowance. We also feel that we have accepted his recommendations on closed circuit television and, very largely, his recommendations on health and safety.

The union has refused to return to the bargaining table unless the government has agreed in advance to accept all of the chairman's recommendations. The union has also indicated that, in addition to the chairman's recommendations, it wishes to negotiate on recommendations contained in the report of the union representatives. These latter recommendations, plus those of the chairman, would increase the total pay and benefits costs for this group by 28 per cent over 1980 payroll costs.

Honourable senators, as I understood the situation this morning, there was some doubt that they were prepared to discuss the question of maternity leave. I believe—and I hope I am right about this—that the government has emphasized its willingness to discuss the question of maternity leave and that is now being considered by the union. That is, I believe, the position of the government.

Senator Flynn: At this time?

Senator Frith: At this moment, yes, as I understand it.

Senator Flynn: There is still hope that the strike will not begin at midnight?

Senator Frith: There is hope, in the sense that one of the two parties is waiting for a response by the other. In other words, the government has tried to make it clear that the question of maternity leave is definitely one that it is prepared to discuss. The government is waiting for the union to say whether it will come to the bargaining table, which the government is very anxious it do.

Senator Flynn: If the issue were settled in the sense that negotiations would take place, would the strike be called off?

Senator Frith: As I understand it, if the two parties are at the bargaining table, the strike will not go ahead. In common parlance—an expression I do not like very well—I don't think the window is very large, but there is a bit of light coming through.

ENERGY

OIL—CANADA-MEXICO AGREEMENT

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised on June 16 by Senator Charbonneau. The honourable senator asked if Canada's oil agreement with Mexico provides for a downward adjustment of the price to reflect falling international prices.

I can inform him that it is clearly stated in the agreement between Canada and Mexico that the price of Mexican oil may be adjusted for each calendar quarter subject to mutual agreement and renegotiation. In fact, in accordance with this agreement, the price for Mexican oil was decreased on June 1, 1981.

THE ECONOMY

FOOD PRICES—CONFLICTING ANNOUNCEMENTS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to respond to a question raised on June 18 by Senator Nurgitz which concerned conflicting announcements on food prices.

I can inform the honourable senator that the Agriculture Canada food survey differs from Statistics Canada's CPI food survey in many respects. For example, Agriculture Canada surveys 12 cities while Statistics Canada surveys 51; Agriculture Canada prices 99 items and Statistics Canada prices 125; Agriculture Canada surveys 64 stores while Statistics Canada surveys over 500; and, finally, the two surveys are conducted at different times during the month.

Because of these significant differences in scope and coverage, it would be inappropriate to use the May results of the Agriculture Canada food price survey to speculate what the CPI year-over-year movement would have been had prices been collected throughout the month.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

IMPORTATION OF SKILLED LABOUR BY OIL COMPANIES— FEMALE PARTICIPATION IN JOB PROGRAMS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to respond to a question raised by Senator Balfour on June 19, 1980, concerning the importation of skilled labour by oil companies and female participation in job programs. The answer is rather lengthy and I ask the permission of the Senate to have it taken as read.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Not only do you have our permission but we invite you to do that.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

I am informed that the statement made by the Minister of Employment and Immigration and referred to the honourable senator in his question is consistent with the government's position that:

- a) Canadians by right should have access to jobs generated in Canada; and
- b) there is a shortage of certain skills in Canada, a now generally established and accepted fact, a situation brought about, in part, by the dependence of Canadian firms on foreign trained immigrants and inadequate training of the domestic labour force by companies in general, to meet industry's skilled manpower needs.

Because the occupational shortage is naturally going to hit those companies hardest which are acutely in need of the skilled manpower identified, the Minister of Employment and Immigration undoubtedly wished to ensure that requests for foreign workers will reflect the companies' commitment to increasing the training of Canadians so that business opportunities, present and future, or delays occasioned by the shortage of key skills will not be lost.

The female work force is an important and growing element in Canada's economic well-being and it is to maximize the use of such workers in non-traditional jobs that the minister was undoubtedly alluding. While no quotas are anticipated, it is hoped that good business sense for which Canadians are known, will encourage companies to more actively involve women and other disadvantaged groups, through training in the Canadian labour market.

In all these endeavours, the government is prepared to play a co-operative and supporting role through its programs and services.

With reference to the honourable senator's specific question concerning alternatives to a quota system, he should know that all CEIC regions have implemented a system in which a certain number of spaces in training courses in non-traditional occupations are reserved for women. This is not a quota system in that it does not limit the number of women who can participate in the course. What it does do, however, is ensure that a certain number of women can take the course regardless of how many male applicants there are or the length of the waiting list to get on the course.

My colleague the Minister of Employment and Immigration has announced a new policy of higher wage reimbursement under the Canada Manpower Industrial Training Program to employers willing to hire and train women in the traditionally male occupations. This incentive acknowledges the perceived risk and extra costs incurred by the training employer. Therefore, an increased wage reimbursement rate of 75 per cent is being offered to employers (usual rates are 40-60 per cent) as an incentive to hire and train women in non-traditional occupations.

QUEBEC

MICMAC RESERVE, RESTIGOUCHE—INCIDENTS INVOLVING PROVINCIAL POLICE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on June 22 and 23 Senator Flynn posed questions concerning the fishing rights of Micmac Indians on the Restigouche Reserve in Quebec and incidents which involved the Quebec Provincial Police. I have answers to those questions now, but the answers are rather lengthy and I ask the permission of the Senate to have them taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

During the night of June 10, 1981, and the early morning of June 11, 1981, a detachment of over 200 members of the Quebec police force aided provincial game wardens in a raid on the Restigouche Band on the Restigouche river. Several band members were charged with obstruction of justice in connection with the raid. The next day, the bridge connecting Pointe-à-Croix to Campbellton, N.B. was closed for part of the day. Access roads into and out of the reserve were kept under surveillance by the police and passengers and cars were searched. Some band members continued to place their nets in the river and another raid was carried out by police and game wardens on Saturday morning, June 13, 1981. The Minister of Indian Affairs, John Munro, travelled to Quebec and met with the Band Council and band members on Saturday afternoon and Sunday morning.

The Quebec Regional Office of DIAND was successful in setting up a meeting between the Restigouche Band Council and Mr. Lucien Lessard, the Quebec Minister of "Loisirs, Chasse et Pêche" on June 23, 1981 but the meeting was unproductive. The local Federal M.P., Mr. Rémi Bujold, also attended the meeting. On June 25, 1981, the Premier of Quebec, Mr. René Lévesque, announced that there would be no further raids on the reserve. The band has apparently submitted a paper to the Quebec government listing the Band's grievances in connection with the raids. The Department has not received a copy of this paper to date.

The events set out above followed the failure of negotiations this year between the band and the Quebec government over fishing by band members in the Restigouche river. The Band claimed a right to fish six nights a week; the province was prepared to allow only 72 consecutive hours of fishing. The province defended this figure as a needed conservation measure. Charges of over-fishing and illegal sale of fish have been made against the band in the past few years. For its part, the Band acknowledges that a portion of the total Band catch is sold commercially but insists that this is an integral part of what continues to be a depressed local economy. Another source of conflict in the situation relates to territorial jurisdiction. The Quebec government claims responsibility for the management of fishing in the Restigouche reserve. The band claims that it not only has jurisdiction to manage fishing within the boundaries of the reserve but claims an aboriginal right to fish in rivers adjacent to the actual reserve. Although the federal government transferred responsibility for the management of the salmon fishery to Quebec in 1922, the band members have publicly stated that they look to the federal government for a resolution of the current dispute.

In response to comments by the Honourable Jacques Flynn in the Senate on June 23, 1981, I am presuming that he was referring to remarks made outside the House of Commons by both the Honourable Roméo LeBlanc and the Honourable John Munro as reported in the press on June 23, 1981 and later confirmed in statements made in the House of Commons on that afternoon.

The Honourable John Munro has indicated that any by-laws made under the Indian Act can only apply to lands and waters on the reserve. In this instance, that part of the river being fished is not part of the Restigouche Reserve. The band, therefore, cannot make by-laws with respect to the management of that fishery. The fishery is managed under the Quebec Fishery Regulations made under the Fisheries Act. In 1922, the administration of Quebec fisheries was delegated to the provincial government by order in council. In the opinion of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, the regulations are adequate to protect the fisheries. The only slight difference of opinion seems to be with the way in which Quebec is administering their fisheries. Both ministers have agreed that a review of the implications of the 1922 agreement as it is presently applied is warranted. If the review indicates that changes are necessary, they will be made by Order in Council.

HOUSING

INCREASED SUBSIDIES TO CMHC FINANCED PROJECTS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a short but rather detailed answer to Senator Nurgitz's question of June 9 concerning housing subsidies. May I have permission for that answer to be taken as read?

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

The regulatory maximum assistance available for loans under CMHC's Assisted Rental Program has been increased from $120 to $180 per unit per month. Increased loan assistance may be considered upon request from a project owner for a project in financial difficulty. The project would be subject to a comprehensive review to determine if the increased assistance would rectify the project's cash flow problems and to ensure a capability of becoming viable. Increased loan assistance would also be subject to amendments to the operating agreement, deleting protection for equity on sale and significantly reducing the allowable annual return on equity.

Specific projects have not been identified for increased assistance. Each case will be evaluated on its own merits after a thorough review and detailed renegotiation with the project owner.

FISHERIES

OVER-THE-SIDE SALES—ALLOCATION OF QUOTAS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have answers to questions posed by Senator Marshall on Wednesday, April 8, concerning problems related to fisheries. With your indulgence, I should like to have the answers taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

In answer to the question of when the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans will make a decision on the allocation of the quota which inshore fishermen will be able to sell to the foreign trawlers and draggers in respect of over-the-side sales, may I respond by saying that, when this question was asked on April 8, 1981, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans was not in a position to release this information. Following explorations of the possibility of country-to-country deals this year, which proved not to be possible in time for this year's fishery, on April 24, 1981, the minister informed concerned parties of plans to station vessels at selected locations during 1981 in the maritimes and Newfoundland. A press release was issued on June 15.

With respect to the question of whether the minister is reconciling the problems which direct sales pose to the processors, the answer is that, yes, as in previous years, the minister gave the processors' organizations ample opportunity to present their own mackerel management plans for 1981. Such proposals were unacceptable both to the fishermen's organizations and to the department.

THE ENVIRONMENT

ACID RAIN—UNITED STATES ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION AGENCY—REPEAL OF AIR POLLUTION STANDARDS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on June 22 Senator Sherwood asked certain questions in an effort to elicit facts on the background of the discussions that had been held by the United States and Canada with respect to the whole matter of acid rain.

With respect to the Canada-United States negotiations and Clean Air Act review, I may say that a meeting was held in Washington on June 23 in response to the commitment of both governments in the August 1980 memorandum of intent to begin negotiation of an agreement on transboundary air pollution. The meeting was conditioned by uncertainties surrounding the administration's position on review of the Clean Air Act by the Congress. The Canadian delegation expressed strong concern that domestic legislation be adequate to deal effectively with transboundary air pollution.

These concerns were also expressed in a diplomatic note on Friday and other senior level contacts through the embassy in Washington seeking consultation before the administration adopts a position on the Clean Air Act.

Interior Secretary Watt confirmed to Mines Minister Erola on June 24 that the administration's position is still being examined and that Canadian concerns will be considered further. The next negotiating session is scheduled for autumn, when the U.S. position will be clearer. In the meantime, the Canada-U.S. work groups established under the memorandum of intent are continuing their work.

With respect to the matter of the "leaked", and therefore unofficial, document, the government cannot issue a comment on the story concerning the Environmental Protection Agency because that concerns the EPA, since it was not an official statement of the EPA.

TRANSPORT

PURCHASE OF ADDITIONAL HOPPER CARS

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board with reference to a release dated June 26 which appeared on my desk today from the Wheat Board's advisory committee. Apparently the committee sent a letter to the minister which reads in part:

That the Advisory Committee to the Canadian Wheat Board urge the Government of Canada through the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board that orders be placed immediately for additional hopper cars in accordance with the requirements recommended by the Grain Transportation Authority.

The letter goes on to say that the authority has recommended the purchase of 1,300 cars each year for the next four years to 1985 and approximately 900 cars per year thereafter to 1990.

Can the minister state whether he in fact received that communication and whether he is in a position to respond to it at this time?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, yes, I have received that communication from the Wheat Board's advisory committee. As a matter of fact, we received at an earlier time the recommendation of the Grain Transportation Authority along the lines referred to.

It is absolutely clear, in my opinion at least, that the government is dedicated to the concept of a transportation system which is adequate for the movement of grain. I think it goes with that statement that the government is also determined that there shall be an adequate supply of hopper cars within the system to move the crops that are likely to be forthcoming. This, whenever it is made, will be an announcement by the Minister of Transport. I do know, however, that questions concerning hopper cars, the ordering of hopper cars and the number of hopper cars needed are now under active consideration.

I think it is generally agreed that from the time hopper cars are ordered it takes about six months for them to start coming off the assembly line. I feel that there are enough hopper cars in the system to move the current crop that is forthcoming, although we do not, of course, know the size of that crop. It is generally assumed, or generally agreed, that we are likely to need additional hopper cars for next year's crop.

All I can say in summary is that the whole question is under active consideration and I believe that constructive action will be taken to bring about an addition to the hopper car fleet that is likely to move the forthcoming crops.

NOVA SCOTIA SOURCE OF ADDITIONAL HOPPER CARS

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. Is he aware whether or not the railway car-making facility at Trenton, Nova Scotia, is capable of building these cars? If so, is it likely that that facility will have the opportunity of participating in constructing the rather large number of units that will be required?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): My understanding is that they have already shown their capability of building this kind of hopper car. There are, of course, other facilities in Canada for the building of hopper cars. I suppose you cannot really make a decision on where the hopper cars are to be built before you make the decision on the number of hopper cars you have to order. There is every likelihood that the facility to which the honourable senator has referred will be used once the announcement is made.

WESTERN CANADA—MOVEMENT OF COMMODITIES BY RAIL

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I, too, would like to ask a supplementary question in connection with the movement of commodities of all sorts in western Canada. It has been stated that we are facing a very critical situation somewhere between 1983 and 1985 and that it will be necessary to ration rail space. I would like to know what proposals the government has to deal with that particular matter.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, the government is looking at the entire transportation system in a very active way, with an eye to the future. It was announced just a couple of weeks ago that $700 million will be provided for branch line rehabilitation, with the program extended over the next four years. It is my understanding that the CPR has applied to the Canadian Transport Commission for authority to extend its lines in western Canada through the Rocky Mountains. That is double-tracking through the mountains. So, while there are very important questions and problems to be solved and the matters of capitalization and capital for the CNR and the CPR, I am optimistic—and I am sure there are those who are pessimistic—that over the next few years the facilities which will be built by both railroads will be adequate to haul the traffic that will be available for the export market.

Senator Roblin: May I draw to my honourable friend's attention that optimism may not prove to be enough. We all like to be optimistic about what the future will bring, but we have already been warned by Canadian National and Canadian Pacific that their systems will not generate enough capital to undertake the kinds of restructuring the western rail lines will need. I ask my honourable friend if he will move beyond optimism to action.

I have in my folio here half a dozen clippings of recent origin that, I am sure, are just as familiar to my honourable friend as they are to me, in which we have been warned very clearly that if we sit around twiddling our thumbs and not doing anything of an adequate nature to meet the situation we will find ourselves unable to export the wheat, coal, potash, timber and other commodities that we want to export. As a matter of fact, my principal authority tonight is the Leader of the Government, because he is the one who said that we are facing a crisis and that unless we do something we will be rationing our rail space by 1985. I want to know what it is the government is prepared to do.

I know about the $700 million and about the prospective purchase of grain cars, and so did the Leader of the Government at the time he made his statement. Obviously, those measures are not adequate, to his mind, and I am sorry that he is not present to speak for himself. Certainly, these measures are not adequate, to my mind, so I ask my honourable friend when we will receive a statement that will bring this whole problem of transportation together and give us a reasonable expectation that we will meet the target that we have set for ourselves in the movement of commodities.

Senator Argue: Honourables senators, I am sure that the Leader of the Government in the Senate will want to speak for himself when he returns to the chamber. Sometimes so-called reports by the press do not quote exactly what one has said or what one intended to say, but, in any event, he will explain his remarks.

The Minister of Transport is very active as a result of his concerns over this problem. The government is giving its active and concerted attention to the matter. While the honourable senator and I may disagree in our respective optimistic and pessimistic views, we will both be around, I hope, over the next few years in some capacity, some place. I expect to see the railroads doing the job for which they were built, and I believe that the railways will have the capital required to provide the expansion that is necessary. I understand that there is a problem and I understand why the railways would want to put forward as strong an argument as possible to obtain revenue to, for example, meet the requirements of the grain industry.

I am sure that the days and months ahead will bear out my optimism. The Minister of Transport has the situation well in hand. I simply do not accept some of the alarming statements which are being made in this continuing dialogue.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): That is one thing we do not do.

Senator Roblin: I am inclined to say that my honourable friend probably sucks his, but I suppose that would be unparliamentary.

Senator Olson: That would be unfair, too.

Senator Roblin: It probably would not be correct either. I have here one of the tattered news articles which seem to be of interest to the honourable gentlemen on the other side. I shall give them the benefit of a quotation from it. This news article refers to an interview given by the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate to Southam News, in which he is reported as saying:

"By 1985 we're going to have to ration rail space in western Canada."

He is further quoted as saying:

"It's an absolutely urgent priority," ... "It's the most important priority we're facing."

I am inclined to agree that that statement is not far off the mark, but my honourable friend's response to my question does not seem to indicate that same degree of anxiety. Once again, I urge him to bring to this house at the earliest possible moment a statement as to what the government's policy will be with a view to providing Canadians, particularly those in the west, with a transportation system adequate to their needs. If the railways do not receive the money out of the Crow, then it is perfectly obvious that the government will have to put up the money itself. One way or another the money will have to be found. What is the government's policy going to be?

Hon. G. I. Smith: The same as always, I suppose.

DOUBLE TRACKING OF CNR FROM WINNIPEG TO VANCOUVER

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. I wonder if he could give a progress report with respect to the implementation of the Prime Minister's commitment during the last federal election campaign to double-track the CNR from Winnipeg to Vancouver.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I do not believe that the honourable senator has accurately described the commitment, but I do not wish to get into the matter.

Hon. G. I. Smith: It looks more like a double-cross than a double-track.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: It sounds like an election statement.

Senator Argue: To many parts of the western railway system, double-tracking is absolutely essential. Honourable senators can snicker. I do not mean the honourable senator who asked the question, but there were many snickers. Many people felt that this statement was rather foolish and far-fetched.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Including the CNR.

Hon. Jack Marshall: That is what we are snickering at.

Senator Argue: The CNR has plans to double-track certain lines in western Canada—I believe, from Edmonton to Red-pass Junction, and from there to the Port of Vancouver, and certain other lines leading to Prince Rupert. I believe that the schedule for the double-tracking required to move freight from the prairie provinces to the west coast for the next few years will be forthcoming.

The application by the CPR to the Canadian Transport Commission involves, in part, double-tracking over certain parts of its line in western Canada. The government has the entire question of railway policy very much under consideration and very much in hand. I believe that the construction will go forward as it is required.

Senator Smith: You would have done better if you had left us with your first impression and not gone into the matter.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Some of those construction projects are already under way.

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, June 23, 1981, the debate on the motion of Senator Barrow for the second reading of Bill C-57, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas.

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, this evening I would like to comment on two tax measures contained in this bill, one having to do with the sales tax on newspapers and advertising supplements, and the other with the various taxes on petroleum and natural gas.

With respect to the latter, I intend to deal with the National Energy Program which will be implemented with the help of revenues collected through those taxes.

First there is the sales tax on newspapers and advertising supplements. In a brief pregnant with facts and figures which very convincingly support their point of view, a number of regional weeklies have stressed the negative impact that this tax would have on their means of production. They state that "this sales tax now looms as a threat against the editors of weeklies". The standards used to figure out the advertising content are vague and either do not apply or apply most inadequately to weekly newspapers. Besides, the administrative load of that tax can hardly be borne by many of those weeklies which are nothing more than small and medium-sized businesses subject to all the conditions resulting from a limited circulation, a shortage of specialists and a narrow profit margin.

The weeklies add that this tax will take away from the editors a certain independence in the management of their businesses since they will have to maintain a 3 to 5 per cent safety margin so as to avoid a dangerous narrowing of the gap between the advertising content and the standards, be it 75 or 70 per cent as first prescribed in the bill. The need to maintain that safety margin will undoubtedly lead to a reduction in the already insufficient profit margin and many newspapers would then operate at a loss.

Keeping in mind the current economic situation—unbelievable interest rates, rampant inflation and a labour scene upset by that inflation—it is obvious that those small and medium-sized businesses which are in the unfortunate situation of operating in the newspaper field cannot cushion themselves against this other impact of the sales tax and everything that stems from it in the form of extra production costs and uncertainty.

The editors of weeklies point out that it is not simply a matter of profit losses, but it also involves job losses which the bankruptcy of a number of weekly newspapers would entail. Considering that a certain number of them are published in less urbanized sectors, and are therefore more dependent upon each existing job since there are not that many alternatives, it is clear that the new tax which will fill the federal coffers and correct certain abuses will not help the regions of Quebec. It is true that in the past there have been certain abuses related to the tax exemptions on all supplements. However, it does seem exaggerated to slap a tax on all newspaper supplements so as to eliminate those abuses. The same standards mentioned earlier with respect to the profitability of weeklies apply in the case of advertising supplement printing. The revenue derived from supplements of regional newspapers make the difference between operating profitably and going under.

In their brief they reminded us that this tax would prompt the major advertisers to centralize the printing of supplements in the specialized shops of Ontario so as to make economies of scale. This is because most Quebec printers who produce supplements also print regional newspapers. Any loss in revenue from supplements would bring about an increase in the printing cost of weeklies, which would worsen the financial impact of the sales tax on these newspapers.

The drafters to this brief recommended therefore that the government withdraw its requirements concerning the numbering of advertising pages in a supplement, and so on, and that it simply requires that the name of the newspaper appear on the supplement. To prevent any abuse, this exemption would not extend to any catalogue or book even if the name of the newspaper appears on it.

I therefore intend to support the request of the weekly newspapers to give them what little help I can in these difficult times. Quebec must face a massive renewal of its soft sectors. For heaven's sake, let us not impede the development of sectors which could by expanding and applying high technology, supplement those sectors left behind by the evolution of the economy.

Still as concerns the future of Quebec and of Canada as a whole, I would now like to comment on the excise tax on oil and gas and its implications under the National Energy Program.

In its 17th Annual Review, the Economic Council of Canada concluded that it is now necessary:

—to give priority to securing a better rate of growth of the real income of Canadians.

It added that in the last decade, it would have seemed irresponsible to want to speed up economic growth. But today it has become essential for the economic survival of the country.

The Council recognizes that this objective will be met at some cost, that obstacles have to be overcome and that choices have to be made. What we need are policies which emphasize the growth of real income. This can be attained in various ways, but it is obvious that energy must serve as a catalyst for the economic growth of the country.

We also need some comprehensive policies which are meant this time to add to the efficiency with which resources are involved in the production process, whether it is labour, capital, raw materials, or energy. We should also promote technological progress; we should take advantage of large-scale savings and remove obstacles to the best allotment of various productive resources. Energy pricing is one of the impediments.

The council adds in its report that for several years foreign savings have allowed Canada to finance a substantial part of its investment program. Although those borrowings were profitable in several respects, they contribute to maintain the deficit of the current account of our balance of payments. The borrowings also encourage foreign ownership of Canadian industry and also increase our foreign debt. In addition, the increase in our foreign debt is less and less followed by similar increases in our capital reserve.

To enable Canadians to finance a larger percentage of investment, the council is suggesting an increase in domestic savings. They also state that the deficit of the current account should be reduced. Increased exports of natural gas, of electricity and coal, development of the production capacity in other export industries and transportation as well as reductions in oil imports are factors which could reduce the deficit of the current account.

The council concluded its survey of our current economic situation by stressing the fact that large energy projects are becoming particularly important and as emphasized, that an extended delay of those projects could increase instead of reduce the medium and long range use of foreign savings.

How ironical, honourable senators, that we should come to that conclusion when we consider the efforts of this government to increase Canadian ownership of the oil industry. Far from increasing Canadian ownership as would a program to promote personal investment, those efforts could impede the growth of the economy and our sovereignty in the oil sector.

Canadianization, and more especially nationalization, would impose costs which would result in a reduction of the gross national product without increasing our supplies by a single barrel of oil. Neither Canadian consumers nor the ownership of the oil industry would benefit from Canadianization; as a matter of fact, most of the main branches are now managed by Canadians.

Moreover, the National Energy Program is impeding the realization of great oil sands projects. Without them, it would be impossible to expect an adequate economic growth.

That is something of which the Economic Council has reminded us. An increase in energy production could greatly contribute to a rise in real incomes in Canada, but the issue of energy pricing will have to be settled first. The domestic prices for oil and gas must rise considerably and without too much delay to the international level. To ensure greater conservation and a more efficient utilization of energy, the Economic Council suggested that we need to increase the consumer's price.

It is clear that the issue of the price of Albertan oil is a source of confrontation between this producing province and the present government in Ottawa. Moreover, the carrying out of the main projects, such as the so-called "mega-projects", which in the eyes of the Economic Council represent our best chance to instil new life into our economy, must be postponed pending such an agreement. In the meantime, our imports from foreign countries have increased and as a result our balance of payments is suffering. No matter what they say about the current high interest rates being a necessary evil, it is clear that an influx of foreign and domestic capitals would strengthen our dollar and give us a greater margin of freedom with regard to American interests.

If Canada does not return soon to more normal levels of interest rates, our small and medium size businesses, already deprived of the oil sand incentives, could sustain irreparable damages. It is therefore essential that the government abandon its doctrinaire and stubborn objectives in order to arrive at some solution with regard to oil pricing. Let us not forget that it allowed an increase far greater than what was proposed by the previous government. Just like Mr. Trudeau proposed Britain should do with the Constitution, his government should "hold its nose" and approve an oil price increase satisfactory to Alberta, even if that meant putting aside his centralizing projects. This is not the time to engage in doctrinaire experiments, but rather to develop our resources and stimulate the economy.

Furthermore, there are various countries which need our resources and eventually will stop being polite, if we are not wise, or will go elsewhere to buy the required resources or force us to share. A Canada weakened by domestic wrangling and a stagnating economy will not be in a position to negotiate favourable contracts.

We should therefore take advantage today of the possibilities afforded us and of our resources while ensuring their conservation. Above all, let us not delay in increasing our resources and let us take up once again the slogan of the last few years: energy self-sufficiency by 1990.

We are being told that the oil available is decreasing and that one day all that will be left will be expensive deposits. That is why we must be able to resort to alternative energies. Yet, in this area, the government is also prepared to interfere by way of a Crown corporation or agency. This new industry is already complaining of the unfair and detrimental competition that government is putting up, in the field of solar energy for example. Canertech Inc., a subsidiary of Petro-Canada, has apparently refused to support some promising projects while pursuing the development of projects which have already proven economically sound. In other words, government wants to control the market.

Obviously, I am not objecting to the interest that the government shows in the energy field, considering its importance. However, why must it do so at the expense of the private sector?

Without a free, strong and efficient market, our country would never have known the growth it has experienced. Yet, the government seems to forget that historical fact.

[English]

Canada has been undergoing a political and economic evolution for almost a quarter century. The pace accelerates despite the result of the Quebec referendum. Economic maturity is one reason. Regional and cultural factors are others. The implications, regardless of their roots, are national in scope. Confederation is under great strain. The shifts taking place require new concepts as the old arrangements, the old methods of governing and the old balances of power become obsolete. The present conflicts are fundamental beyond ad hoc solution. The price of ignoring them is dismemberment of a nation. Western provinces that finally know affluence—affluence, incidentally, based on private initiative and enterprise—do not look kindly on the statism of the present government in Ottawa. They fear losing the climate of certainty which favours growth of their industries. Too much heavy-handed intervention in the private sector and too great a tug-back of powers to Ottawa could, in the opinion of western provinces and some of the up-and-coming eastern ones, jeopardize their future.

At the moment, Ontario itself is suffering something of a confidence crisis. Much of its industrial machine is, like that of Britain after the war, creaking with age. In many sectors its manufacturing competitiveness is being eroded. The results are to be seen in the sharply higher number of permanent shut-downs. A notable exception is the steel industry but there are a few others. In the context of the steel industry, we should note that the tar sands projects represent great potential for increased production. Since the steel industry is one of the locomotive industries of our economy, we can see how important a settlement of the talks between Alberta and Ottawa is, both for Ontario and for industrialized Canada as a whole.

The development of the tar sands and the construction of the plants will have a major impact on all industry suppliers. Most of these are located in Ontario and Quebec. It would be constructive for community leaders in Ontario to remember this fact, and an effort should be made to arrive at a compromise. Most people probably think that it is a cliché to say that Canada was founded on compromise. Unfortunately, it happens to be true. Unbending adherence to policies which divide and destroy in the name of ultimate unity is more than foolish. In my view, it is tragic.

Meanwhile, the west has become economically self-sufficient to a large degree, although it still relies on external capital to maintain the heavy pace of development. The west can generate more and more of its own capital. It can earn substantial foreign exchange. It can feed and clothe itself, put gas in its cars and heat its homes. If the west became independent, it probably could reduce its cost of living by importing from outside Canada its canned goods, its cars, trucks and farm machinery, its clothing and supplies for the petroleum industry. It can earn the foreign exchange to do it. Central Canada must abandon its concern about oil and gas prices and concentrate instead on preserving a lush and profitable market which means so much to it in terms of employment and other economic benefits. The people of central Canada must be quickly and persuasively made aware by their political and business leaders that they have much to lose economically—far more than the people in the west.

In other words, interdependence still exists in Canada, although the direction of the traffic might have changed. However, one fact is clear. You cannot hold a country together through economic dependence. As soon as a region becomes more independent economically it starts speaking of separation. This should make it obvious to us that Canada must be held together by a bond of self-fulfilment and mutual respect between regions and the central government. Otherwise, once the underdeveloped and dependent member reaches maturity, it will feel no loyalty to an old tyrant. Basic psychology tells us that tyrants are respected out of fear, but they are not served out of loyalty and love. Put some distance between tyrants and people, or between have and have-not, and the underdog will seize the first opportunity to make that distance permanent.

Energy is now Canada's greatest asset, next to its territory and skilled population. Let us not blow it. There is enough for everyone, but let us not fight over the spoils. It would be very easy for a third dog to slip into the fight and run away with the bone.

Oil and gas pricing, though of prime concern to Alberta, has become the political symbol of western discontent and alienation. The unilateral action on the Constitution is regarded as an element of that symbol, just as Quebec looked at the rejection of an equal partnership by the anglophone community as a signal of total rejection of its culture and language and a threat to their survival. Alberta is not asking the world price for its oil and gas, nor is it asking that its upper price be reached in an unreasonably short space of time. The Heritage Fund is being used to the advantage of all Canadians. Loans at reasonable rates are made to Quebec and the Atlantic provinces, which otherwise might have to shop in the open market, competing for funds with the deficit-ridden federal government.

Alberta has offered money from the fund for the eastern gas pipeline and for the rehabilitation of transport facilities. Much of that money—except direct construction wages—would be spent in Ontario and somewhat less in Quebec. To a degree the same is probably true of the loans made to sister provinces. But some people in central Canada seem generally ignorant of the economic spill-off and the considerable economic benefits that accrue to them. Certainly, the spill-off does not occur when the funds go to the OPEC countries for their more highly priced oil.

Moreover, under the existing energy policy regime, Ontario could be partly dependent on foreign oil by as early as 1984, and increasingly so as the decade proceeds.

The logic of the National Energy Program, if there is any, escapes the west. Self-sufficiency has been endangered, if not made impossible. At best, Mr. Lalonde has thrust the achievement of self-sufficiency into the next century. Canadian companies are hurt the most. It is a canard to point to the seven sisters and say, "We are fighting for our heritage against the Yanks." The federal government purchases foreign oil at ever-escalating world prices, yet does little to reduce the country's dependence on it, even to the point of probably now forcing Ontario to depend on that unstable and costly source.

The west regards the energy policy as one designed by a government determined to placate central Canada. At the same time, the west does not believe the energy policy is a good one for central Canada, even in the relatively short run.

[Translation]

The part of the National Energy Program that deals with Canadianization poses two main problems. First, it does not seem to meet the aspirations of most Canadian-owned and controlled companies, for reasons that are particular to the sector concerned on the one hand and others that are inherent in the overall program on the other. In addition, though at first glance the program seems to suit Petro-Canada, nothing guarantees that it may do so over the long term.

Second, the program introduces an important element of discrimination which, based on state ownership and not on return, seems useless in the pursuit of Canadianization.

Any Canadianization program must meet a number of criteria if it is to promote the cause of both the public and the private sectors, and ensure security of supplies. First, Petro-Canada must play a major role; that is a political fact based on a political mandate that is not being challenged.

In assuming its role, however, Petro-Canada must not impede the efforts of Canadian owned and controlled companies, nor must it limit their possibilities.

Government regulations must be reduced to a minimum and the scope of the rules of the game which can be foreseen should be stretched to the limit to take full advantage of the entrepreneurial spirit.

Canadian-owned and controlled companies must be encouraged and not hampered in their decisions.

Canadians must be encouraged to invest in Canadian industry.

With regard to financial operations, there should be no difference between Canadian-controlled companies and non-resident-controlled companies and nothing justifies encouraging Canadians to invest through means that are not available to foreigners.

Recently, during a conference on the National Energy Program sponsored by Prentice-Hall Canada, a speaker made the following remark: Most people agree to declared objectives of the National Energy Program but many do not agree with its terms. This program seems to involve hidden and different intents from its avowed objectives which are at best debatable and would not be readily accepted by people if they ever knew that it was the true purpose of the program.

Outside federal government circles there is a prevailing impression that the implementation measures contained in the National Energy Program will not make it possible to reach its objectives.

There must be better ways to reach the objectives of the program.

It is obvious that the taxation of oil provisions contained in Bill C-57 which evolves from the implementation of the National Energy Program constitute a backward move. The economy of this country needs fiscal policies that are favourable to its development and not likely to have negative effects. The government must rethink its energy program in order to put this country back on the tracks of self-sufficiency . . . there is not much time left to act. If indeed we have spent 53 years searching for a new Constitution and we must therefore speed up the process, the resources of this country are well worth stopping this mad race towards disaster that is the National Energy Program. There is no room in the economic history of a country as prosperous and full of potential as ours for narrow and doctrinaire policies which endanger our national heritage and our common future. There must surely be ways to solve the economic and federal management problems other than through an authoritarian program which will adversely affect the positive influence of private enterprise and personal initiative by Canadians and which will prevent them from becoming the true owners of their own natural resources. The state should serve the citizenry and not take away its responsibility and privilege to exercise its talents for the benefit of society.

[English]

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, first I should like to congratulate my colleague, Senator Charbonneau, on his eloquent and excellent speech. You will perhaps be glad to know that in addition to making me feel that he ought to receive the warmest compliments for his effort, he has reduced by a substantial quantity the amount of time which I shall ask honourable senators to spend in listening to me, because he has put some of the most cogent arguments that I believe should be put against the contents of this bill and of the National Energy Program, in terms which I could not hope to improve upon and which, except to indicate my concurrence with them, I will not take your time to try to improve on them.

I have to observe that I can find absolutely no excuse whatsoever for a government which introduced this bill in the House of Commons months ago, first calling upon the opposition in the other place to pass it in a relatively short time, and then asking us to deal with it in a matter of days. I know the Deputy Leader of the Government is not to blame for this, and I do not find fault with him. Indeed, I suspect that if he had the opportunity to say exactly what he thought on the matter, he might be just as indignant about it as I am.

The only instance of worse mismanagement that I can think of lately in the affairs of government is the fact that it still has not got to this house the appropriation bill which it knew months ago, or at least from March 30, had to be passed before June 30. It has not got it here yet. The government cannot use the excuse that it did not know. I cannot use the excuse that there was not any time.

An Hon. Senator: Right.

Senator Smith: The government has had all of this time, and it throws it at us not today, when we might have 24 hours to deal with it, but some time in the expiring hours of tomorrow, when the right to spend money disappears at midnight, as I understand the Deputy Leader of the Government.

What possible excuse can there be for this? What possible reasons can there be, except, on the one hand, incredibly bad planning and, on the other hand—which I think far more likely—an equally incredible disregard for the rights of Parliament. It seems to be that if there were any reasonable way in which this chamber could delay passage of that bill, it should be done. But I realize, as well as anyone else, that when the authority to spend money runs out, the process of government, in large measure, ceases and therefore it is not really a practical proposition, much as we may resent the circumstances, for us to refuse to accede to that bill before the dying hours of tomorrow.

It seems to me that it is a deliberate, cold, calculated plan to put this chamber in the position where we would have to bear the onus of bringing to a halt the financial operations of the government in many respects, or of throwing aside our right to give proper and fair consideration to the business of the country, particularly the business which involves the spending of enormous sums of money, some of them beyond the imagination even of those of us who are accustomed to hearing enormous sums of money expressed in the spending plans of this government.

I suppose we have been faced with this same situation year after year after year, and I can remember quite a number of such occasions myself. I think it is an incredible thing that we should be asked to do this, except by some accident of fate over which we could have no reasonable control. It is time we registered our dissatisfaction with the process, and, indeed, sooner or later, in order to bring to bear our due and proper consideration on such spending operations, and the financial business of the country, we will have to consider accepting the onus which would come with bringing to a halt the financial operations of the government in such large measure.

The delay and lateness in bringing this bill to this chamber is not by any means the only odious feature of Bill C-57. It is shot through with such features from beginning to end—principles that ought to be rejected out of hand by any responsible government that wants people to believe it governs according to the principles of democracy.

Let us look at one of the first—in the sense of the place in which it appears in the bill—of these objectionable features. I refer to the provision which intends to, and will, change the method of calculating duties upon certain commodities such as wine from a specific duty on a specific quantity to an ad valorem duty, which will be calculated in relation to the consumer price index, or some other method of relation to the cost of living.

I am well aware that there are other substantial taxes which rely on the ad valorem method of calculation, but the fact that these wrongs exist is no excuse, and no reason, and no justification, for extending the principle further.

There are many objectionable features to this. One—and a fundamental one—is that it removes the power of Parliament to control the specific imposition of taxes. It hands to the Governor in Council—indeed, even to Statistics Canada—the duty of deciding what amount of taxation shall be paid on a gallon, or litre, or whatever kind of measurement you want, of wine, or a unit of any other substance to which this change will apply. It seems to me that if you look back in history you will find that Parliament was born out of the determination of the people of England that Parliament, and only Parliament, would impose taxes and spend them. Parliament, and only Parliament, would exercise control over the public purse. This government, it seems to me, is getting away from that principle as fast as it can. It is doing so by degrees. It is not ready just to say all at once, “Let us not bother with Parliament imposing taxes, or keeping control over the public purse,” even though that is almost true already; but little by little, and more and more, as more gets behind them, they are working towards the stage where, whether intentionally or not—and I confess I find it hard to believe anything except that it is intentional—Parliament will not be imposing taxes, except in a very general way, and some calculator, like Statistics Canada, will calculate what tax shall be imposed on the people of Canada. Then somebody else, who is equally irresponsible as far as the electorate is concerned, will decide how to spend it, which, in large measure, is what is happening now.

It seems to me that the sooner we realize this, and say, “Thus far and no further,” the safer will democracy be, and the more closely we shall be adhering to the principles upon which democracy as we know it was built.

Almost as bad, though not quite, because the democratic process is fundamental to our kind of life, is the fact that this bill gives every incentive to the government not to worry too much about inflation, because as the price of a litre of wine goes up under this system, so does the take of the government. There is no incentive for the government to reduce inflation, except perhaps thinking about what people may think of it, though it does not seem to be paying very much attention to that these days. The more inflation, the more taxes. That is exactly what happens.

Worse than that; if you take a look at page 9 of this odious bill, in the section which bears the figure 24 in very heavy black letters, and then go down to paragraph (2) under that numeral, you will see this:

(2) The excise taxes imposed by subsection (1) shall be adjusted

(a) on the first day of April, 1981—

And then on for the future.

—so that the taxes imposed in the five month period commencing on that day are equal to the amount obtained

(i) by multiplying

(A) the taxes set out in subsection (1)

by

(B) the ratio, adjusted or altered in such manner as the Governor in Council may, by regulation, prescribe—

So there. You do not even start by having the power to say what this rate of tax shall be, or by how much it shall be adjusted. You do not even start by giving it to the people who calculate the consumer price index, or the cost of living, who, I suppose, are part of Statistics Canada: But then, having let them calculate it, as I read this and as I think anyone else will have to read it, you allow the Governor in Council to adjust that ratio up or down by regulation. That is what it says. If that is not taking control of the imposition of taxation on the substances which are subject to this kind of thing away from Parliament, and putting it into the hands of the Governor in Council, I do not know what it is. It would be hard to devise any other means of doing it, except boldly to say, “Let the government do it.”

Well, that is a lovely way to start out, by looking at a piece of legislation to find that a situation will be produced, when it becomes law, where, first, the imposition of taxes of a specific amount on a specific item of goods, or quantity of any substance, is handed to the Governor in Council, and, second, the government is given a vested interest in keeping inflation from falling too low, because if inflation drops the government's tax shield drops, and if inflation rises its tax shield rises.

This, of course, is without anybody really knowing what is going on. This does not happen by way of legislation which is debated in Parliament. It happens quietly. It might get published in the Canada Gazette. Unfortunately, the Canada Gazette is not number one on the reading list of Canadians, and it will be quite a while before what appears there becomes an object of knowledge to them.

● (2200)

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Which section are you referring to?

Senator Smith: If you look at page 9—and, incidentally, you have to look hard because the number 9 is put in a very obscure place—you will see the heavy black figure 24. Then go down the page until you come to the subsection where the figure (2) appears. Then look at the (a), then at the (i), then at the large (A) and then at the large (B). Eventually you will trace the obscure trail through the dense verbiage and come to the place you are looking for. Mind you, you will not see it the first time through. By the time you get through all of this mass of verbiage, it is pretty hard to relate back to where you began. If one were a suspicious person—which I am not—one would think that the draftsman who invented this method of writing things was as anxious to hide the meaning of it as are the people who draw up the income tax rules.

Of course, you need not stop there. You can turn over to the next page, go down past the (ii) until you get to the (b), then go through the (i) and the big (A) and the big (1) and you will find the same thing again. I suppose that the hope of the draftsman was that nobody would bother to read this too carefully. I must confess that it doesn't do one much good to read it carefully because, even doing that, you will not be sure of exactly what it means. I can, however, tell that it means something I do not like.

Senator Roblin: You have a sound instinct there.

Senator Smith: There are quite a number of other unfortunate features—odious features, rather; I will use that word because it is one which I think best describes it in courteous terms, although there are some other terms that might be more appropriate.

One might turn, for example, to pages 81 and 82. There, having to do with the change in taxes on tobacco, cigars and cigarettes, you will find that the same thing is happening; duty is being imposed not by legislation but by regulation as the Governor in Council may decide. I suspect that there are more places like that which I have missed, but I have given you a couple of examples, at any rate.

Turning back to page 54, honourable senators, we come to another extraordinarily odious provision, as I read it. This is with regard to the definition of "natural reservoir in Canada." It has to do with this extraordinary way of slipping in a tax on petroleum and gas along with the amendments to the Excise Act and the Excise Tax Act, then giving it a separate life as another bill altogether, saying that it shall be referred to by a separate name.

In any event, regardless of the name—and a piece of nonsense and skulduggery by any other name would sound just as odious—it defines a natural gas reservoir in Canada as follows:

"natural reservoir in Canada" includes a natural reservoir situated in the submarine area adjacent to the coasts of Canada in respect of which the Government of Canada or the Government of a province has granted a right, licence or privilege to explore for, drill for, take or remove minerals or hydrocarbons in any form;

Look at that, honourable senators: an area "in respect of which the Government of Canada or the Government of a province has granted a right." That is an outright grab, as I read it. No matter what a province claims with reference to a submarine area, if it has gas in it, it is designated as a natural reservoir in Canada and Canada is going to have the gas. That is a bald disregard of the law in Canada, completely dashing aside the claims of provinces like Nova Scotia and Newfoundland, to whom this means a great deal. This cannot be done merely because the government, the draftsmen or the sponsors of the bill in the other place wish it. Incidentally, I do not include in that category the remarks made by my colleague from Nova Scotia who explained the bill to this house. I have to say that my colleague and friend explained it well indeed, although it is quite understandable that he did not take the same care that I have with regard to the more obscure parts of it. I have, however, no complaints—indeed, I have nothing but compliments—about the way in which he placed the bill before us. Of course, I would have been more complimentary if he had drawn some attention to these things. I suspect, though, that he felt that somebody on this side of the house would assist in that respect and that he did not need to do it.

Everybody in the other place and in this place knows that, whatever the federal government may say about the ownership of the minerals in the submarine lands off the coasts of Nova Scotia, Newfoundland and the other provinces except British Columbia, those provinces claim ownership as well. Here I come to the very learned argument put forth by my respected friend, the Deputy Leader of the Government, when he was dealing with the question of the British Columbia Reference case and the ownership of lands off the coasts of any province. As I recall, he convinced himself, at least, that there was little substance to the arguments of Nova Scotia and Newfoundland. I do not intend to indulge at very great length in that argument tonight, but I do want to draw attention to two or three of the things which, as I understand his argument, he felt were very important. In particular—and he will certainly be able to correct me if I am wrong—he argued under the common law of England and referred to the Keyn case, to the effect that the Crown owned only the foreshore and not even the territorial sea. He also argued that there was no parliamentary enactment giving to Nova Scotia any offshore rights, referring to enactment, as I understand it, of the Parliament of Great Britain.

Well, I do have to bring to the attention of the house that the phrase "relating to any kind of delegation of authority" used in the British Columbia Reference case by the distinguished judge who wrote the decision did not refer to legislation but to rights to which the British Crown was entitled. It spoke of delegation by the British Crown of the rights to which it was entitled. It made no reference at all, as I read that case, to any parliamentary or similar enactment. It was a delegation by the Crown of the rights of the Crown.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): But the Keyn case did.

Senator Smith: No, that is what the judge said in the British Columbia Reference case. The Keyn case, as I understand it, dealt with the ownership of lands beyond the foreshore.

Senator Frith: But the Keyn case did talk about legislation.

Senator Smith: Oh, yes, it did, that is quite true, but not the judgment of our own Supreme Court in the British Columbia Reference case.

It is my submission that the British Crown did confer rights—the rights it had—on the Governor, Council and Assembly of Nova Scotia. Indeed, not only did it confer them, but it required in the most direct and mandatory terms that the Governor of Nova Scotia should hustle up and do what it had previously commanded him to do, namely, have a legislature elected, so that with their help he could govern Nova Scotia. That legislature was convoked so that it could pass whatever laws were reasonably necessary for the governance of the country.

With respect to the Keyn case, it dealt with the common law and it was decided, I think, in 1874 or about that time. The extent to which the common law of England applied to Nova Scotia is dealt with in a case called Uniacke and Dickson, which was decided in 1848 by the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia, or rather, as they operated then, by the Governor being advised by the judges of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia. They held—and it has been the law of Nova Scotia ever since, and I don't think anybody would ever dispute it—that the common law of England applied to Nova Scotia to the extent that the circumstances in which the colony found itself made it reasonable for it to apply. Of course, the common law can never apply when there is valid legislation contrary to the common law.

Incidentally, if I did not give the date of the Uniacke and Dickson case, it was 1848, which is nearly 30 years before the Keyn case.

The common law has always held, whether in England or in any of the derivatives of England, that whenever a legislature having proper jurisdiction passes a law which is contrary to the common law then that statute prevails. That has always been the law and I don't think anybody would argue that.

If you go back, you can see long before the Keyn case—long before Confederation—this Governor, Council and Assembly in Nova Scotia were passing laws which were clearly inconsistent with any common law rule that there was no jurisdiction beyond the foreshore.

With all deference to my learned friend—and it was indeed a learned argument he presented—two of the main theses of his argument, as I understood them, do not in fact exist, one of them being that there was no legislative enactment conferring the right on the British Crown. Of course, there wasn't, but there was a conferring of those rights upon the Governor, Council and Assembly of Nova Scotia, and those rights were used, and that complies with the conditions, as I read them, as laid down in the British Columbia Reference case. The other thesis was, as I followed him, that the common law as illustrated by the Keyn case did apply in Nova Scotia.

Well, that will indicate to honourable senators that at least there is another side to the argument put forward by the learned senator, and that it is certainly not by any means a clear-cut, open-and-shut, case, if it is any kind of case at all, that the decision in the British Columbia Reference case applies to Nova Scotia.

If you come to look at the situation with regard to Newfoundland, you will find an even stronger case there, because, for many reasons in Newfoundland's history, its position is different from that of any other province of Canada. Part of it, I think, was outlined by Senator Cook when he spoke on the matter some weeks ago.

What I say, then, is that the taxes imposed, or the taxes that would be imposed if this piece of garbage ever became the law, would be imposed on property which is claimed certainly under a very strong colour of right by the Province of Nova Scotia and by the Province of Newfoundland, and perhaps by other provinces as well, and yet they would be imposed without so much as a how-do-you-do. They just write it down on this bit of paper and hope that a majority in both houses will bring about the establishment of these words in the law, and then they will go and raid the revenue which comes from those natural resources and use it for their own purposes.

There is another provision I should like to refer to, but at the moment I can't find the exact spot where it appears. Perhaps I will before I am through, although you may not wish to wait that long. It says that the provisions of this statute—and it says it two or three times within the whole bill—"shall bind Her Majesty in the right of Canada and the right of the provinces." That is another bare-faced assault on the rights of provinces.

Without repeating all the things I said before in respect of this, I will simply say I feel just as strongly that this kind of provision is outside the right and jurisdiction, as well as the principles of fair play, for the Government of Canada to try to assert.

Honourable senators, there is plenty in this bill to make one doubtful, no matter how loyal one is to one's party or to one's affiliation. There is enough in this bill to make anyone who is interested in the rights of the provinces, or in protecting the rights of the regions, look at it askance and feel that it should be subjected to the very strongest of scrutiny on the basis of the sober second thought of this house and on the basis of being referred to a committee of this house. So, honourable senators, I suppose I do not have to conclude by saying that I do not like this bill, and I do not intend to vote for it.

• (2220)

Senator Frith: I was about to ask Senator Smith, "Apart from that, how do you like the bill?"

Senator Smith: As one of my predecessors once said, "I like it not."

However, as I said at the outset of my remarks, I do want to concur as strongly as I can in the remarks of Senator Charbonneau about the necessity of realizing that the power which has always been exercised by the centre of this country—and, indeed, politically it is exercising it right now—is shifting away. At the moment, and as it has been for the past few years, this power is shifting westward. If the gas discoveries off Sable Island and the oil discoveries off Newfoundland and Labrador materialize, as the discoverers hope, where it will shift after that I do not know, but certainly power will continue to shift away from the centre of the country.

This subject is a very delicate one because it involves saying to the people of central Canada, "Look, you fellows have run the show for a long time and, although you are in the saddle right now by virtue of the concentration in population, you must realize that the situation will not continue in this way forever and that there are people in other parts of Canada who will not allow you to let it continue forever."

I have always said—and I think I can say it without the slightest reservation or without any fear that anybody can contradict me with any facts or assertions as to what I have said in the past—that I believe in the principle that the growth and strength of central Canada was a good thing for Canada. Although I argued that the rest of Canada had paid a very high price in this situation, it was a price worth paying because Canada's strength—of which I, as a Canadian, am very proud indeed—has arisen, until very recently, in large measure through the growth in population, production, or in any way one cares to look at the matter, of the central part of the country.

I come from a part of the country that helped to pay that very great price, but I do not regret it or complain about it at all. Since the price we paid in the past has helped the country to develop, our payment of that price ought to be recognized by more attention and more assistance now. But I have never complained about the fact that most of the growth has taken place in the central part of the country, because I have always believed that that is what has made Canada strong.

However, the change in the direction and the location of growth in this country has created a very different situation for the people of central Canada. It is to their credit that they have always been the very best of Canadians in terms of being willing to see that their wealth, of which they had a great deal compared with the rest of the country, was shared throughout this country, and I honour and appreciate them for that. Indeed, I suppose that over the years one of the strongest supporters of equalization was Ontario—and I spent a good many years dealing with this matter firsthand, and I do not need to emphasize it.

Senator Roblin: That's right.

Senator Smith: I am glad to hear my colleague, Senator Roblin, confirm what I have just said, because, in a similar capacity, he was dealing with the matter through almost the same years as I was.

I feel that the people of Ontario would do the same now as they did then. However, I do not believe that they have adapted themselves to the change in climate. I do not believe that the people of Ontario realize, from the point of view of power, wealth and resources, that they no longer occupy the same prominent place they did some time ago. I feel that when the people of Ontario recognize this fact, many of the difficulties which some of us think arise in this province now, will be adequately dealt with because, based on their past record, I feel that they are fair, reasonable and decent people who want to see Canada grow but who have not yet had long enough to realize how the centre of power and growth is changing. I merely want to say to the people of Ontario, as I believe my colleague, Senator Charbonneau, did, that they must accept these changes very soon, or the realization may not come in time to save us all a great deal of trouble which could otherwise be averted.

I thank honourable senators for their attention and their patience. I know that I have taken a good deal of the Senate's time. While I do not apologize for doing so, I am sorry that it seemed to me necessary that I take as much time as I did to say the things I thought had to be said.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I rise for the purpose of proposing the adjournment of this debate. In so doing, I make one last or perhaps penultimate appeal to the Deputy Leader of the Government to consider his position overnight to determine whether or not some way can be found to refer the National Energy Program as a whole to a committee of the Senate when we return in the fall, thus expediting passage of the bill that is before us and sparing the Senate the necessity of listening to an abusive speech by me tomorrow afternoon or tomorrow evening.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, until the last remarks by Senator Murray, I was prepared to give an undertaking to think of little else overnight. But if the only reason for such thought is that I would be spared a speech by Senator Murray, I am afraid I will not be persuaded, admirer as I am of his rhetoric.

On motion of Senator Murray, debate adjourned.

THE ESTIMATES

CONSIDERATION OF REPORTS OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Orders:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on the Supplementary Estimates (A) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1982.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending 31st March 1982.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would like to speak to Order No. 4 and Order No. 5. It will be recalled that these orders have been dealt with together, and that we have had a good deal of excellent debate on them with interventions by Senator Everett, Senator Lamontagne and Senator Roblin. I feel that these three senators have thoroughly and eloquently exhausted the principles involved and, therefore, unless there are other senators who wish to speak, I would ask that these two orders be considered debated.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, if no other senators wishes to speak, these orders are considered debated.

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B)

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on the Supplementary Estimates (B) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1982.

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, Supplementary Estimates (B), 1981-82, have just been tabled following the ruling made on June 12, 1981, by the Speaker of the House of Commons. Madam Speaker then decided to delete 10 items from the Main Estimates for 1981-82 because, and I quote:

These items are really legislative items which deal with matters of substance.

This ruling like as previous ones, is based on a principle already recognized by your committee, namely that appropriation bills should not be used to amend existing statutes or to enact legislation. I quote again the ruling by Madam Speaker:

The Appropriation Act should only seek authority to spend the money for a program that has been previously authorized by a statute.

For their information, honourable senators will find attached to the report of your committee, the complete ruling made by Madam Speaker.

The government has amended six of the 10 items ruled out of order and has reintroduced them in its Supplementary Estimates (B).⁶ The minister responsible for the Treasury Board, who was the main witness at the June 18 sitting of the Standing Committee on National Finance, has also indicated that he would introduce legislation dealing with nine of these items.

I should like to take a few moments to review the items contained in the Supplementary Estimates.

[English]

In the case of vote 30b pertaining to the Department of Agriculture, the original vote was objected to because it requested authority for payments to "owners of animals affected with diseases under that Act that have died or have been slaughtered in circumstances not covered by the Act." The new vote is identical to the original with the exception that this phrase has been deleted. The dollar amount of the estimate has not been changed, as the actual estimated outlays associated with the changes are estimated to be minimal.

Votes 35b, 40b, and 45b, pertaining to the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, deal with the Home Insulation Program, the Canadian Home Insulation Program and the Canada Oil Substitution Program respectively. All three received funding under an interim appropriation bill passed in March in the amount of 25 per cent of the full estimate. When these votes were ruled out of order, because they were deemed to be establishing new programs, in the absence of other legislative authority, Parliament was put in the position of having authorized expenditures for which there existed no estimate.

[Translation]

In order to correct the situation, the Supplementary Estimates deal only with interim supply. As I said, Parliament should introduce bills designed to properly set up these important programs and pass the relevant appropriations for the rest of the fiscal year.

The initial Vote 5(b), Supply and Services, was intended to allow certain adjustments in the calculation of the department's accounts. The unacceptable terms included in the vote have been deleted from the supplementary item.

Finally, item 110(b), Ministry of Transport, included certain terms that were intended to amend a particular section of the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act dealing with payments to truckers. Once again the unacceptable terms have been deleted, and the item has been put forward without change.

Finally, I want to repeat that your committee has been concerned for quite some time about the fact that the Main Estimates can amend or enact other acts. We believe the ruling made in the other place provides us with a unique and major opportunity for an in-depth study of the legislative process.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in the same manner exactly as orders 4 and 5, Supplementary Estimates (B) will give rise to a debate, or at any rate to the introduction of the supply bill. For that reason, as I understand the context of the report, I respectfully submit that this order may be considered as having been debated also.

[English]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I only wish to say that this matter has been dealt with in the context of a debate under items 4 and 5 on the order paper, and I think there would be no objection to considering the sixth order included in that category and, therefore, disposed of.

Senator Frith: I apologize to Senator Roblin for not asking if someone wanted to speak before I made my suggestion.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Are honourable senators agreed that this order is considered debated?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, June 30, 1981

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Honourable Renaude Lapointe, P.C., Speaker pro tem, in the Chair.

Prayers.

THE SENATE

THE HON. THE SPEAKER—ABSENCE FROM CHAMBER

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I want to make an intervention on behalf of His Honour the Speaker with regard to his absence. He has been asked very frequently to perform diplomatic functions for the country. This is a function he performs well, and we are proud of the way he does it. In my opinion, however, he is being asked rather too often to do so, and I think that is his opinion also.

For the last two days he has been absent because he was required to represent our country at the installation of President Marcos in the Philippines. Anyone who has taken trips of that kind knows that they are anything but holiday junkets. You spend half your time on an airplane, and most of the other half trying to catch up with both ends of jet lag because of the short turn around. That is the reason he is not here today, however, and I want honourable senators to know that.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN GALLERY

SENATOR AND MRS. ALAN MISSEN OF AUSTRALIA—MR. AND MRS. G. W. BALDWIN

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Before we commence our proceedings, I should like to draw the attention of honourable senators to the presence in the South Gallery of Senator and Mrs. Alan Missen of Australia. Senator Missen is Chairman of the Senate Standing Committee on Constitutional and Legal Affairs and is a member of the Standing Committee on Regulations and Ordinances.

On behalf of all honourable senators, I wish Senator and Mrs. Missen a pleasant stay in Canada.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to draw the attention of the Senate to the presence, with Senator Missen and his wife, of a very well-known former member of the House of Commons, Mr. Ged Baldwin, and his wife.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

EIGHTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz, for Hon. John M. Godfrey, Joint Chairman of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, presented the following report:

Tuesday, June 30, 1981

The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments has the honour to present its Eighth Report as follows:

(Statutory Instruments No. 13)

1. In accordance with its permanent reference, Section 26 of the Statutory Instruments Act, S.C. 1970-71-72, c. 38, your Joint Committee has determined to draw to the special attention of both Houses the Atlantic Coast Marine Plant Regulations, Section 6(a) of which, as made by SOR/78-867, is, in the Committee's judgment, ultra vires Section 34.3 of the Fisheries Act.

2. Section 34.2 of the Fisheries Act empowers the Minister to set conditions, of types there defined, in licenses issued for the harvesting of marine plants. Section 34.3(a) of the Act empowers the Governor in Council to make regulations prohibiting, subject to the conditions of any licence issued by the Minister under Section 34.2, the harvesting of marine plants. Section 34.3(b) of the Act empowers the Governor in Council to make regulations prohibiting, notwithstanding the conditions of any licence, the harvesting of marine plants or of any class thereof in any area or areas of the coastal waters of Canada for such period or periods as are specified in any such regulation. Section 6(a) of the Regulations under report prohibits the harvesting of Irish moss of the species Chondrus crispus, wire weed or horsetail notwithstanding the conditions of a licence issued by the Minister, but fails to specify any period or periods during which the prohibition is to be in force. Section 6(b) of the same Regulations does, by way of contrast, specify periods during which prohibitions of harvesting are in effect notwithstanding the conditions of licences.

3. In correspondence with your Committee the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has claimed that Section 6(a) of the Regulations was made not under Section 34.3(b) of the Act, but under Section 34.3(b). However, that cannot be the case as the prohibition which may be imposed under that latter provision is expressly subject to the conditions of any licence issued by the Minister. In earlier correspondence from the Department of Fisheries and Oceans the prohibition in Section 6(a) of the Regulations was said to be applicable at any time, by which was meant "at all times". Yet, Section 34.3(b) of the Act is clear: the prohibition may be imposed for such period or periods as are specified by regulation. The failure to specify any period does not satisfy Section 34.3(b) of the Act, and does not amount to the prescription of an indefinite period. If authority for this interpretation of the plain words of the Statute is wanted, your Committee refers to Dantex Woolen Co. Inc. v. Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (1979) 2 F.C. 585.

4. Your Committee's Joint Chairmen restated your Committee's objection to Section 6(a), and its response to the argument advanced by the Minister, by letter to the Minister dated November 6, 1980. A further letter requesting the Minister's response was sent under date of May 19, 1981. While both these letters have been acknowledged there has been no response to their substance.

Respectfully submitted,

NATHAN NURGITZ, for JOHN M. GODFREY
Joint Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Nurgitz moved that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, normally at this point in our proceedings I would make a motion with respect to the time of the next sitting of the Senate. I intend to do so before we leave.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I hope so.

Senator Frith: Obviously, yes. However, I do not wish to do that now. Rather, I should like to warn honourable senators that I might be asking leave to revert to Notices of Motions later.

The state of play, as honourable senators can understand, always changes from moment to moment at this time of year. I hope you will accept my assurance that I am not trying to make a cliff-hanger out of this or a "Perils of Pauline", leaving senators in an undecided position owing to a lack of clarity about our plans.

As things stand at the moment, we have a number of pieces of legislation before us for this afternoon's sitting. There are the second readings of certain bills and perhaps the third reading of any of them that is of an uncontroversial nature.

While the fact that a bill receives three readings at one sitting without debate in the other place does not determine whether we would so treat it, it is fair to say that it is a factor, and that happens to be true of some of the bills before us. I will leave it to the sponsors to explain that to honourable senators when introducing those bills on second reading.

I understand that the appropriation bill will be voted on in the other place at three o'clock this afternoon. However, because of the possibility of a number of votes taking place there we cannot anticipate receiving that bill within, for example, a half-hour. It might take longer than that. We do hope to have it later this afternoon, and in time for royal assent at 5.45.

There are then three other bills that are more or less corollaries to the appropriation bill. I refer to three of the eight bills that are meant to deal with the ruling of the Speaker of the House of Commons, and we have been informed there is some urgency attached to them. I believe the other place will deal with those three bills immediately after the vote on the appropriation bill, in which case we might well receive them later this afternoon. If that is so, and if we are convinced that we ought to deal with them, I will suggest that they be assented to at 5.45 p.m., or perhaps later at 9.45 this evening. In any event, we shall wait to give royal assent to the appropriation bill and to any other bills that receive third reading, and we shall see whether we can be helpful with those three bills to which I have just referred and to which I shall refer more particularly when I introduce the appropriation bill. If the aforementioned happens, then I shall suggest that we not sit on Thursday and Friday.

We are still awaiting the reporting of two major pieces of legislation from committee, Bill C-50 and Bill C-57. I have been advised by the committee chairman that there is serious doubt as to whether the committee will be ready to report those bills on Thursday or Friday, but that there is a good chance that the committee will be ready to report them on Monday. If we deal with the appropriation bill and any corollaries there may be to it, the bills to which we have given third reading, plus any other bills that are ready, then it seems to me that it will be unnecessary to sit on Thursday and Friday, for we would be here, as I understand it, only to await those other five bills which are of the package that deals with the ruling made by Madam Speaker in the other place.

So, honourable senators, that is the plan and that is why I cannot give definite information yet. In my opinion, it is quite probable that we will finish either with a late afternoon royal assent or royal assent this evening, which will discharge our obligations for this week, pending receipt of more legislation next week.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I have two points to raise. The more important point is with regard to the three bills the deputy leader mentioned might come from the other place this afternoon. As I understand it, the deputy leader indicated that he wishes the Senate to give those three bills second and third reading and royal assent today. It was once my understanding that all the deputy leader would want would be for second reading to be moved and for them to be explained by the sponsors today.

One of the bills in question is Bill C-77. I should point out to Senator Frith that we do not have the bill itself and, therefore, do not know the purpose of the bill.

I cannot convince myself that there is the same urgency with regard to these bills as there is with regard to the appropriation bill itself. The appropriation bill will provide money for the current operations of the government and, since interim supply will expire today, I can understand why it would want them as of tomorrow. But even if they were delayed, I am not convinced that a serious problem would thereby be created. If, for example, we pass the bill dealing with the insulation program on Monday or Tuesday of next week, I cannot see that this would make any great difference. Certain cheques may be delayed, but I don't see that they are of a type to be considered urgent. It seems to me that the situation is similar with regard to all these bills.

But, that having been said, if we on this side are willing to pass the appropriation bill and give three readings to these other bills this afternoon and have royal assent at 5:45, as has been suggested, then the government should be very happy and should be willing to indicate immediately whether we will adjourn until Monday.

My second point is with regard to Bill C-57. As the deputy leader mentioned, the committee is not willing to report at this time, in spite of the fact that we are only dealing with the subject matter of the bill. What we on this side of the house want to do with regard to this bill is to continue the debate this afternoon and adjourn it until Monday evening, at which time we would complete the debate on second reading. Since we on this side of the chamber would like a recorded vote on this bill, that could be dealt with after the debate on second reading Monday evening. I am sure it would suit senators, generally, much better to have that vote on Monday night rather than, for instance, on Thursday or Friday afternoon.

● (1415)

On the whole, it seems to me reasonable and responsible on our part to suggest that the Senate, when it adjourns today, be adjourned until Monday evening.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I agree. There are three main points. The first is whether the opposition is behaving reasonably, and I believe they are.

The second point is whether these three bills are necessary. In introducing the appropriation bills, it is my responsibility to persuade you that they are corollary, and that there is good reason to tack them on, to the appropriations. I think that is, in effect, what they are. However, I agree with Senator Flynn that, at this point, I am not sure that it is necessary immediately. I am trying to find out why we have been told that these particular three are more important than the other five. I am asking honourable senators to give me an opportunity to explain why I think they should be treated separately.

[Senator Flynn.]

The third point deals with Bill C-57 which I had hoped to have referred to committee today since Senator Hayden has said that he could call a committee meeting on Monday afternoon. That would mean that if the opposition desired a recorded vote on both second and third readings—

Senator Flynn: Only on second reading.

Senator Frith: Only on second reading? On the principle of the bill, but not on third reading? Then we could have Bill C-57 referred to committee and vote today on the principle of Bill C-57.

Senator Flynn: I say Monday.

Senator Frith: We could have a recorded vote today on the principle of the bill and then refer it to committee, deal with it on Monday, and have third reading on Tuesday. I am not dug in at all on that question. I will support any procedure that will allow us an opportunity to vote on the second reading of Bill C-57, and on third reading next week, so long as it meets the wishes respecting a recorded vote and the bill can be considered by the committee.

Senator Flynn: I believe that having a recorded vote on that bill this afternoon would not be fair since there was insufficient warning to senators, generally, that there would be a vote today.

Senator Frith: I was under the impression that we would terminate the debate today and refer the bill to committee. Senator Hayden's understanding was that the committee would meet on Monday to study both Bill C-50 and Bill C-57.

Senator Flynn: We could meet on Monday, but the committee is seized only with the subject matter of the bill, which creates another problem. If the committee wishes to meet on Monday to consider the report it has now prepared, we will not need a vote on second reading today. The committee may meet on Monday.

If my proposal is adopted, the recorded vote would take place on Monday night and the bill would be referred, in the normal way, to the committee for a meeting on Tuesday morning.

Senator Frith: As a member of that committee, does the Leader of the Opposition anticipate any problems in receiving a report from the committee next week?

Senator Flynn: I would prefer that you put that question to Senator Hayden.

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: It is a peculiar request to ask the chairman to speculate on what a committee is going to do. As a member of the committee, my honourable friend was present at the meeting this morning and heard the pros, the cons and the difficulties that exist with regard to certain sections of the bill. Those difficulties have been set out in a report of the committee on the subject matter of the bill.

● (1420)

We have been studying the subject matter because the bill has not reached the stage in the Senate where it can be referred to committee. We described our approach to various problems with the bill. We noticed the minister's attitude yesterday afternoon with respect to the position of the Senate and the reasons why these particular amendments have been included in the bill. As yet, we have not been able to decide on authoritative and understandable language to deal with a number of the items.

As you can imagine, the minister did not stir me or any member of the committee into any great ecstasy when he said that the House of Commons had dealt with the subject matter of these items, and he was not prepared to review that consideration. Our answer to that was, "It is nice to get your concurrence in our suggestions, but we don't really need it." We felt we could deal with the bill in the absence of that concurrence, and then it is up to the Senate. These are the "ifs."

We have another stage of dealing with these "ifs" and that is the language to cover a statement by the committee as to what changes should be made and to what degree the department or the minister might be prepared to delve into them. In some cases, there have been no suggestions; in other cases, basic information is not available to support the conclusions either one way or the other. The question of whether or not to suggest amendments is not very difficult to answer when you are not supplied with basic material.

I am going the long way around to explain why it is not easy to say this will be dealt with on Monday. However, I think we can reasonably expect, if we meet on Monday afternoon and in the interim an effort is made to resolve the question on the different points presented by the minister, we will have something to deal with.

In saying this, I have to put in a couple of "ifs." I still think it is reasonable to expect that we might be able to conclude our hearings on Monday in time to present a report on Bill C-57 on Monday evening. But, first, we must deal with Bill C-50 which presents some of the same problems, such as waiting for the latest proposals based on and differing from the proposals which were contained in the committee report. The best I can say in those circumstances—and I cannot prejudge what the decision of the committee will be, although I could make a good guess—is that it is reasonable to proceed on the basis that if those "ifs" are met, we could present a report on Bill C-57 on Monday evening.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, we should avoid spending so much time talking about what we are going to do that we will not have any time in which to do it. What I am asking honourable senators to do is to be prepared to sit this evening, and we will know later this afternoon whether we need to, and if we can accomplish what we have been talking about, then I think we will not have to sit on Thursday and Friday.

QUESTION PERIOD

ENERGY

THE BUDGET—LOWER CHURCHILL RIVER—POLICY RESPECTING HYDRO-ELECTRIC POWER DEVELOPMENT

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have two delayed answers. The first is in reply to Senator Marshall's question regarding an inquiry on the Lower Churchill River hydro development.

The federal government has been supporting studies of the hydro-electric potential of the Lower Churchill River through the Lower Churchill Development Corporation established in 1978, with the federal and Newfoundland governments as 49 per cent and 51 per cent shareholders respectively.

There has as yet been no decision by either government as to which of the two major development possibilities—Gull Island or Muskrat Falls—might be undertaken on the Lower Churchill.

Under the National Energy Program, provision has been made for a federal equity contribution of up to $200 million. It is also anticipated that federal credit support would be provided to ensure that debt financing could be obtained at acceptable rates.

IMPORTED OIL PRICE DIFFERENCES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a delayed reply to a question asked by Senator Smith concerning the difference in prices of oil imported by Canada from various suppliers, and so on. It is a rather long answer, and if senators agree, I should like it to be incorporated as having been read.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

There are a number of factors bearing on the price of Canadian oil imports, including quality differences, the particular pricing policies of supplier nations, and the world oil market situation. Under the OPEC pricing arrangements, the normal situation has been for the various OPEC producers to price on a quality basis in comparison to the price set for Saudi Arabian crude. Over the last eighteen months or so, however, there has been a pricing split within OPEC, with Saudi Arabia, Kuwait and other Gulf States pricing significantly lower than other OPEC producers.

Canada also imports oil from non-OPEC nations. In the case of North Sea oil, for instance, a high price is commanded based on the exceptionally high quality of the product, although there has also been a significant recent price decrease by the United Kingdom. Mexico, while not an OPEC member, has tended to follow OPEC pricing patterns for similar quality oils, but with variations in response to world market conditions.

Obviously, continuing reliance on oil imports subjects Canada to the uncertain and erratic movements in world oil prices. One of the specific objectives of the National Energy Program is to balance domestic oil supplies with domestic demand by 1990.

TRANSPORT

MANITOBA—CHURCHILL—GRAIN SHIPMENTS

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board pertaining to the use of the Port of Churchill, Manitoba. I have had many inquiries with respect to the increased use of Churchill, and I am wondering whether the government intends making more use of that port for the export of grain this coming season.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I should like to thank Senator Hastings for his question. There is a widespread campaign, a lobby campaign, from western Canada in support of the Port of Churchill and demanding that the Canadian Wheat Board should each year make a commitment to use that port to the extent of 3 per cent of our grain exports.

I wish to make it crystal clear that the Wheat Board and the federal government are fully in support of the continued use of that port. However, I wish to say for the record that the board has great difficulty this year, under current circumstances, using that port for anywhere near 3 per cent of likely exports. Because of last year's drought and the shortage of supply, the Wheat Board has been able to program one-quarter of a million tonnes of grain through that port for this year. This is being done, under the circumstances, at a projected net loss of some $2 million to the Wheat Board, and to the producers who use the Wheat Board, for the use of the Port of Churchill. If the Wheat Board went up to half a million tonnes, this would incur an additional loss of $4 million, which would work out to a loss of about 40 cents a bushel on that additional quantity of grain. There is no way that the Canadian Wheat Board feels justified in using the port this year to that projected amount, with such a heavy loss to the producers. If the port is to be used, I think it should be used in an economic sense, and used to its full extent in the years in which it can make an economic return to the producers who use the Canadian Wheat Board.

● (1430)

In 20 of the last 23 years the port has been used to the extent of more than half a million tonnes; so I do not think it is possible to give any kind of guarantee that the port will be used to the extent of 3 per cent of the projected export in every single year, because particular circumstances may mean a very drastic loss to the grain producers, through the Canadian Wheat Board, in the use of that port. I do feel, however, that the Wheat Board should use as its target that kind of volume of use, but that in years when there is going to be an absolute loss that factor should be taken into consideration, and the suggested use should not be held to that point.

The federal government's position with regard to the point is very strong. Over the years it has been committed to the use of this port, and the amount of money that has been spent by the federal government in the use of the Port of Churchill over the years has been very great. I do not want to give the details of all of these figures, but I think some of them should be on the record.

The Keewatin re-supply service has been included at a total cost of $7.5 million. Capital investment by the National Harbours Board since 1973 has been $12.5 million. The operating deficit since 1979 totals $25 million. The Port of Churchill is supported, in the main, by use by the Canadian Wheat Board and moneys from the federal government. These amount to $1 million in NHB wages, $0.5 million in grants in lieu of taxes and $0.5 million in local purchases. The National Harbours Board planned expenditure for phase 1 of this port's revitalization is $8.2 million. The government's payments for the upgrading of the Herchmer subdivision will be $29.5 million.

A study is in progress as to the feasibility of upgrading the line I have just referred to, and with regard to the problems of discontinuous permafrost, to the point where the line can carry fully loaded hopper cars. If the study shows that this can be done, and is technologically feasible, I expect that it will be done.

Between 1971 and 1978 Canadian National Railways received $5.9 million for expenditures under the branch line subsidy program on this line. The railway passenger service into the Port of Churchill has cost the federal government $11 million annually. The air services cost is $1.6 million.

That is a major commitment by the federal government to the Port of Churchill, a major use by the Canadian Wheat Board, and virtually only the federal government and the Canadian Wheat Board use this port.

For the future, the challenge with regard to Churchill, is to the provincial governments, to make sure that they participate. Saskatchewan supports the Port of Churchill, and a lot of speeches are made there in favour of it. Saskatchewan puts in $20,000 a year for the development board that supports the Port of Churchill. As far as shipments of potash are concerned, however, not a tonne of potash has been sent. With regard to Alberta's commitment as far as the shipment of coal is concerned, they sent not a tonne of coal.

Because of the meeting in Dauphin on June 3, 1981 and because of our discussions there, I feel that the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, and perhaps the province of Manitoba—although circumstances are more difficult for Manitoba—may in fact take the Port of Churchill seriously, and may endeavour to program some exports of coal and potash through that port in the years ahead. I hope this will be done.

The federal government stands behind Churchill. As I say, the challenge is to the provincial governments to show that they are prepared to get in and help.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I do not suppose, honourable senators, that my honourable friend thought that I would be less than forthcoming in asking a supplementary question to a supplementary speech with regard to the Port of Churchill. I congratulate the minister on his speech. It was a good one. As usual, it was succinct and to the point. I refer, of course, to the political point. I am not so sure that it was to the economic point with respect to the Port of Churchill.

My honourable friend has given us a recital of the defects of the Port of Churchill, as much as anything else. He has told us that all that is going to happen is that a trickle of something less than 3 per cent of the Wheat Board flow is to go through that port, and obviously that is not going to maintain it on an economic base.

I am surprised to hear that there has been a subsidy of $25 million since 1976. Did I hear the minister correctly? In any case, very large sums of money are being paid out by the federal government, according to his recital, for very little return. Then he says, "But the problem is that the provinces do not play their part". I am not going to make any judgment on that point. I do know, however, that we have to be practical about the kind of materials that move through Churchill. In 10 long years of struggle, insofar as the province of Manitoba is concerned, we found it very difficult to get bulk commodities through that port, and if you do not have bulk commodities you do not have very much. We have brought in sweets. We used to bring in liquor, toffee, things of that description. Obviously, however, that does not keep a port going. You have to have bulk commodities.

What are the bulk commodities that are possible? Potash is one. Only Saskatchewan has any potash in the area which is possible as a service area for Churchill. Bringing coal through Churchill is a very difficult proposition, because the rail line that goes into that port is not suitable for the shipment of modern freight cars with potash and coal. When you get into the Port of Churchill itself, the handling facilities for these bulk commodities leave something to be desired. So there is a problem.

The impression that the minister gives me is that he is going to do his part with regard to solving the problem by throwing more money at it. Well, I have seen an awful lot of money thrown at the Port of Churchill, both by the provinces and by the federal government, in days gone by, and I do not think either party could say that they were satisfied with the results.

What the minister did say, however—and I am surprised he did not mention it today—when he was in Dauphin, on June 4, was that the federal government was awaiting the results of research and feasibility studies. I am not usually much of a man for studies, because they are usually an excuse for not doing very much. In this case, however, with the problems that have been elucidated with respect to Churchill, it might be a very good idea to have a study in depth in order to tell him what should be done on the matter.

My question to the minister—and I assure him that I have a question—is, what happened to this research and feasibility study? If it is in process, will he furnish this house with the terms of reference so that we can have some idea of exactly what kind of study is being made on an extremely important topic?

Senator Argue: The study I referred to is the study that is being made on the possible upgrading of the railway line, so that it can take hopper cars. That is a technical study. It is believed, or, at least, the indications are, from the study to date, that there is probably a real possibility of methods being adopted which will allow for the reconstruction of that line across the discontinuous permafrost. In a way, that will allow the full use of hopper cars. That study has not yet been completed, but I hope that it will be and that this is the way it will go.

With regard to the problems of the Port of Churchill, the use of it for shipping bulk commodities and so on, everything that Senator Roblin has said about the difficulties is certainly true. I was, however, encouraged by a discussion among provincial ministers with regard to the possibility, for example, of the export of coal through the Port of Churchill. While the spokesman for the Government of Alberta quickly pointed out that the export of coal is in the hands of private companies and not those of government, he felt that there was a real possibility that these companies could be encouraged to use that port.

Mr. Planche went on to talk of an experiment which I believe is going on in Switzerland—and Senator Olson probably knows of this—to do with the conveyance of coal on a belt system. Although he was not putting that system forward as the conclusion of any study, he did say, and I think he was sincere, that there are real possibilities for the use of the Port of Churchill to ship some of the huge quantities of coal that are likely to be exported from Canada by 1990.

My figures show that exports of coal will go up from some 14 million tonnes in 1980 to some 53 million tonnes in 1990. Mr. MacMurchy said that if that line would take hopper cars, they would be prepared to see whether they could export some potash through Churchill.

I believe that there should be meetings of ministers from the various levels of government who may be interested in the Port of Churchill. Through these meetings we can see whether precise programs facilitating the full use of that port can be undertaken, not only for the shipment of grain, but also for the shipment of potash, coal and any of the other commodities that may be proven to be feasible.

Senator Roblin: I think that is an encouraging reply. I would urge the minister to take the lead in convening such a meeting so that these basic matters can be looked at. In the last little while we have been inclined to have our attention diverted by the wheat business, and have been throwing up our hands in the face of problems. Until we get all of the players on the stage, we are not going to find out what we can do. I hope that what the minister suggests can be done.

I would ask the minister if he would tell us whether the Port of Churchill receives the same winter grain freight subsidies that are in place for other ports in eastern Canada. Will he also give the house a statement as to the icebreaking facilities that are made available to Churchill as compared to other ports? Those are two important factors in forming some assessment of the competitive position of that port with respect to other outlets in the country.

Senator Argue: I do not think there are any special subsidies with regard to shipments going through the Port of Churchill or to the east. Although I would like to check this information to be sure that I am right, as I recall it the Canadian Wheat Board uses the Port of Halifax for winter shipments. They do so not on the basis of having that transportation subsidized by the Wheat Board itself, but on the basis that it is an economic use of that route and that port at that particular time. I would think that that kind of general statement would apply all around.

There is an icebreaker, the M.V. Arctic, which is capable of carrying grain. If my memory serves me correctly, it was used last year in the Port of Churchill to take out a shipment of grain some weeks after the port had officially closed. That vessel is capable of many other things, but it is available on an agreed-to basis for the shipment of grain in the Port of Churchill.

I mentioned earlier that the port may be used this year for 250,000 tonnes. The Wheat Board is hopeful, as the barley crop is coming on—and that crop now looks promising—that it may be possible to have some additional shipments through Churchill, perhaps towards the fall and perhaps comprised mainly of barley.

THE SENATE

CONDUCT OF QUESTION PERIOD—POINT OF ORDER

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I wish to rise on a point of order to observe that this is really a travesty of an answer, as far as questions and answers are concerned. It would be quite suitable for the minister, if he wanted to make a prepared statement of several pages in length, to rise and ask for leave to make the statement. It would then be discussed, as it has been. However, I should like to draw the attention of the minister to the fact that his colleagues sitting beside him has embarked upon an endeavour to bring some order to the Question Period. He has referred to a good many authorities with regard to the form that the questions should take and, to some extent, to the kind of answers that should be given.

I have made some effort in that regard myself. The Minister of State for Economic Development may have observed that in the last while I have been in support of his contention as to what the rule for questions and answers should be. I simply ask the minister: How can he expect us to pay the slightest attention to his protestation about the proper conduct of the Question Period when his colleagues stands up—having been invited, I have no doubt—and proceeds to make a speech of several pages in length about a matter which he knew to be controversial, which he knew would provide responses on this side of the house, and which took him something like 10 minutes to give.

I simply say that if we want to play games with the Question Period, all right, we will all play them. If we want to make the Question Period a reasonable and suitable one according to the general rules applicable to Question Period, well, then, let the honourable gentleman's colleague, the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, decide whether or not he wants to seek opportunities to make long-winded debatable answers, or whether he wants to stand up, as is the custom in many legislatures, and say, "With leave, I would like to make a statement about the use of the Port of Churchill." I am certain leave would be granted, and he could make his statement. That would result in a debate without disturbing the general attitude toward the Question Period.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to applaud again the offer of Senator Smith to try to improve Question Period. It is true that Question Period is used for a genuine seeking of information. As he pointed out, though, and quite properly, we cannot play games. This game cannot be played on one side of the house unless and until the questions on the other side are going to seek information rather than give it. If they are going to refrain from making a speech, however short—and "a speech" is clearly defined in the rules—then I believe it is not proper for him to suggest that they play the game any way they like on that side of the house but we have to follow the rules on this side.

Senator Smith: I did not say that at all.

Senator Olson: In spite of your protestations, we have not noticed any reduction in the length of the so-called preamble to the questions from that side of the house, which usually are made up of a whole lot of opinions and turn out to be speeches.

Hon. Allister Grosart: What are you doing now?

Senator Olson: I am replying to the point of order raised by Senator Smith.

Hon. Robert Muir: The minister is lecturing, as usual, and does not abide by his own lecture.

Senator Olson: Therefore, it seems to me that Senator Smith could do a great service to this chamber if he would carry the message he has tried to direct to me and to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board into his own caucus, and ask that the rules be cleaned up.

Senator Muir: Senator Smith has forgotten more about rules and orders than you will ever know.

Senator Olson: He sure has forgotten them.

Senator Smith: I thank my colleague for that. Though I still remember a few, I do not have to remember very much because the minister has just demonstrated now that he does not care in the least for the rules. He only wants to read them when it suits him. If that is the way he wants to conduct affairs, I simply say that we on this side of the house are probably his equals in making speeches.

Senator Olson: You are probably better than I am.

Senator Smith: With regard to the length I would not claim that, though I might as to the quality.

I am sure there is a custom in the other place, as there is in this house. What was to prevent the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board getting up and saying, "I would like leave to make an important statement about the use of the Port of Churchill," which is a national port and a very important part of our country? Nothing! Or, if he wanted to make a dissertation defending the action of the government, why did he not resort to an inquiry? Why does he have to use this travesty of Question Period, which he has done time after time after time? And we never mention it until my honourable friend the Minister of State for Economic Development—having forgotten the manner in which he tried to conduct Question Period when he sat on this side of the house—gives us a lecture on the contents of the rules.

POST OFFICE

DISRUPTION OF SERVICE

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate, and could he respond briefly, not giving me a professorial lecture, as some other senators do, with respect to the conduct of the house?

May I ask him whether, apart from what we learn from the news media, both written and electronic, he knows what the situation is at the moment with respect to the postal strike? Are there any recent developments he can relate to the chamber?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): No, there are not.

PUBLIC WORKS

THE LATE RIGHT HONOURABLE JOHN G. DIEFENBAKER— MONUMENT

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I wish to pose a question to the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate. According to the news media, which oftentimes are correct, it would appear that the government has made a decision not to erect in Ottawa any monument to the memory of the late Right Honourable John G. Diefenbaker. If that is true, can the deputy leader tell us why the government has made that negative decision and what the reasoning behind it is?

I trust that the report I will be given will be as full and comprehensive as those usually delivered by the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, but perhaps with a little more content in it.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will obtain as much information on that question as I can. Unless either of my colleagues who are members of the cabinet know anything about the matter that they think would be helpful at this stage, I will have inquiries go forward.

Senator Muir: I wish to address my sincere thanks to the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate. If the information I have gathered from the news media is correct—and, again, I have no reason to think it is not—then the government has made that decision. I hope I am wrong in that, however, and I hope that when the response is made it will prove that I am wrong and that the government has decided to erect a monument in Ottawa to the memory of the late Right Honourable John G. Diefenbaker, who was friend and foe alike to members of all sides of the house and of all parties. Moreover, if the news item is correct, I am puzzled as to why they would decide to erect a monument in Prince Albert, where there is already an outstanding monument to the late right honourable gentleman. Would you kindly check on that for me?

Senator Frith: I shall see that those comments also come to the attention of the government.

Senator Muir: Thank you.

NATIONAL REVENUE

CUSTOMS—EFFECT OF DECISION OF SUPREME COURT OF CANADA

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, in the absence of the Leader of the Government in the Senate, I should like to direct a question to the deputy leader. Last week the Supreme Court of Canada, in the case of The Queen vs. Shelley, indicated that in customs matters there is an onus of proof which remains on the individual—that is, on the traveller—but that for the customs officials there must be some information or something which triggers that onus. In other words, the position is not that the onus is on the traveller to start with.

In view of the rather constant complaining—certainly that I have heard in the part of the country I am from—with respect to harsh if not shabby treatment by customs officials of Canadian and foreign travellers, will the deputy leader have an inquiry go forward with respect to whether the contents of this judgment have been made known to the customs officials and, if so, what the impact of that knowledge is? If not, I should like to know why not. If the customs officials have been informed of that judgment, I should like to know the changes that will take place at border crossings.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am sure that it is a formal departmental practice to have judgments of the Supreme Court—in fact, even judgments of lower courts—circulated on matters such as this, which is so central to the discharge of the duties of every customs officer at every entry port. If I find that the contents of the judgment have not been made known in this case, I shall certainly advise Senator Nurgitz. I shall also ask the department to give us, from a policy point of view, its response to that judgment. The judgment, as I understood it, seemed to analogize, somewhat, to reasonable and probable grounds for arrest. Something has to act as a trigger, and then the onus shifts to the traveller. It is certainly a matter of great importance to all Canadians, and I will try to obtain information on it as soon as possible.

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Barrow, seconded by the Honourable Senator Graham, for the second reading of the Bill C-57, intituled: "An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas".—(Honourable Senator Murray).

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, in the absence of Senator Murray, I should like to speak to this order for a few moments.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Doody: Usually, I am a little hesitant to speak in this chamber because I am fully cognizant of the calibre of the speeches which take place during the normal course of debate. I was made even more forcibly aware of that during Question Period today. Rarely in a legislature do you have such eloquent and excellent speeches being delivered during Question Period. That is really a tribute to those who participate in the business of this chamber. Keeping that in mind, I shall make my comments reasonably brief and shall deliver them with modesty.

Undoubtedly, the government will make certain that Bill C-57 passes and finds its way into the law books of the nation. Anything I can say here this afternoon will have little or no effect on its passage. Despite that certainty, honourable senators, I feel I should say just one or two words on the subject. The valiant efforts of the opposition in both this place and the other place have been to no avail, because although numerous objections were made and amendments proposed to the bill they have simply been discounted. The bill was rammed through the other house and undoubtedly it will pass here.

The objections raised to the bill, certainly those that I have read, appear to me to be legitimate, reasonable and well thought out. By and large, they have been practical and common sense suggestions. They have not been in the political mainstream. They have reflected the sort of fair and reasonable concerns that the people all across this nation have with respect to this bill. As I say, however, those objections have had no effect. The concern legislators have for this country, for its economy, for its future, reflect, as I have said, the concern that they hear expressed by their constituents, their friends and fellow citizens from various parts of the country.

It is obvious to all except the most devoted followers of this government that the National Energy Program has been, and continues to be, a most unfortunate disaster. The National Energy Program has met with cries of anguish from every part of our country, for one reason or another. There seems to be something in the program which makes people all across our country cry out in alarm. From my point of view, there have been one or two good items that have surfaced recently, but, by and large, the reaction has been very negative, and, I think, with good reason.

I say that on behalf of most Canadians, but, of course, I am not speaking on behalf of the shareholders of Petrofina. I am sure they are quite pleased with the National Energy Program. If they can send out Canadian money amounting to $1.5 billion to make those wealthy ladies and gentlemen in another part of the world happy, then undoubtedly it meets their very strong approval. Perhaps I may envy them, but I certainly do not excuse the decision. What the acquisition of $1.5 billion in oil pumps across the country has to do with national energy self-sufficiency requires a great deal of elasticity in one's imagination in order to be comprehended. So perhaps I will let that one pass.

But this Petrofina purchase, nevertheless, is a most unusual deal, the details of which have yet to be made public. The consultant's report on which the absurd evaluation was reached has not been produced. This purchase is huge, although it is only one small item in the whole of the national energy stupidity.

If the Government of Canada had deliberately set out to disrupt the oil and gas industry, to strangle the Canadian economy to alienate the producing provinces and to hoodwink the electorate of Canada, they could not have done a better job. The cold, raw statistical facts set forth so well by Senator Balfour a few days ago demonstrate with frightening precision what this ill-starred program has done and continues to do to the oil industry and to our country. This emerging Canadian giant, this huge new industrial colossus, has been given a blow which we all hope will not be completely disastrous. Exploration and related activity has been reduced by 50 per cent. Almost half those people employed are to be laid off by midsummer. Rigs are heading south in a procession reminiscent of the wagon trains of another era, except for the very important difference that in the 1981 version, the wagon trains are heading south to help develop the United States of America.

How can we really expect the western provinces to trust the central government when they are told on a daily basis that foreign oil is worth almost three times what their oil is worth. If we apply this rather weird line of reasoning to other commodities produced in other provinces—iron ore, manufactured goods, food items, wheat, fish and so on—we can see how truly discriminating it is.

Now, honourable senators, we have before us a bill, C-57, which in effect is another form of discrimination. The purpose of the bill is to tax one resource in one region of our country. People in all parts of this nation in all walks of life have stated over and over again that the single biggest impediment to economic growth in Canada now is the oil-pricing impasse between Ottawa and Calgary. I submit that this bill which is before us now will not help in any way to resolve this terrible dilemma.

The consequences of this government's national energy policy on the pocketbooks of the voters of this country is another matter. It is not a matter of the people of Canada having to pay a realistic price for the products—gasoline, home-heating oil and so on. Canada should have joined the rest of the industrial world in facing the facts of economic life a long time ago. It should have done it gradually over a period of time, and not have that tremendous economic shock lurking on the horizon. But, no, this government promises cynically, falsely, that under their boast of an energy program the cost of the increase in gasoline would be less than that proposed in that terrible Tory budget. Well, honourable senators, here it is before us now; another 8 per cent plus and it is still climbing. We have seen few examples of political trickery in our day or in any other day, I submit, to equal this one.

So perhaps, just barely perhaps, this government did not—or perhaps it did—set out to hoodwink the voters of Canada.

Senator Roblin: It succeeded.

Senator Doody: I will not take any more of your time this afternoon, honourable senators. Most of these points have been raised before over and over again and they will make no impression on the government or the government supporters in this chamber. Several previous speakers in this debate have said that the government majority will see Bill C-57 through and we will all collectively suffer the consequences.

But at least, honourable senators, let us do this: For the sake of our country and for the sake of this chamber, let us support Senator Murray's suggestion that this program in its entirety be referred to a committee. Let us look at and examine the program collectively and let us hear impartial testimony from witnesses in industry, governments, unions, labour and so on to satisfy ourselves that this policy is indeed in the best interests of Canada. Surely, we can find no better way or no better opportunity of exercising and demonstrating the role for which this chamber was created.

On motion of Senator Roblin, for Senator Murray, debate adjourned.

SUPERANNUATION AMENDMENT BILL, 1981

SECOND READING

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat moved the second reading of Bill C-65, to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act and the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act in respect of the early retirement of air traffic controllers.

He said: Honourable senators, I would like to begin by indicating to Senator Donahoe that my comments will be short enough for him to meet his deadline and to give his response to my comments. It is my pleasure this afternoon to propose that the Public Service Superannuation Act be amended to establish special pension arrangements for air traffic controllers.

For many years now the unusual needs of employees in this unique and demanding occupation have been recognized. Air traffic controllers actively engaged in the control of air traffic, of course, bear a great responsibility for the safety of air travellers and must, accordingly, maintain the highest standards of effectiveness at all times. Operational controllers are required to pass stringent medical examinations each year and to demonstrate that technical proficiency has been maintained in an occupation that is subject to rapid technological change and ever-increasing volume, and where the consequence of error can be of tragic importance.

Obviously, it is essential to provide such employees with optimum working conditions and to a great extent this has been done over the years in the establishment of wages, hours of work and other conditions of employment. The fact remains, however, that many controllers cannot continue in operational service for the same periods as other public servants because the occupation imposes a physical standard which may not be maintained in an individual's later years. This fact has been recognized in many countries. Belgium, France, Switzerland and the United States have all passed special pension arrangements of a sort which are proposed by the introduction of this bill.

These provisions are intended to be a fundamental part of an integrated program to permit controllers to move out of operational service and into alternative employment. The program was developed in co-operation between the Department of Transport and the air controllers' union, the Canadian Air Traffic Control Association. Both groups have co-operated in this proposal.

Other things have also been put in motion—for example, a re-training plan which is one aspect of the program. This has been provided by the Department of Transport for controllers who are removed after 10 years or more of service. This is a relatively new plan, but the initial indications, from both the management and the employee sides, are that it will be of great use to controllers who find themselves in this situation.

The proposals in Bill C-65 constitute the other aspect of the program, namely, the provision of pension benefits at ages earlier than these normally would be available to public servants under the present terms of the Public Service Superannuation Act. This is the first time that modified terms have been proposed under that act for a specific employee group which is, in itself, an indication of the unique needs and career patterns of controllers.

It is proposed, therefore, that controllers be eligible to receive benefits at earlier ages and with less financial reduction where it is necessary to leave the operating environment after a substantial length of service.

Where the move is essential because the controller can no longer meet the medical or the technical standards, or because management feels that continuing service would endanger health, or that there would be some particular problems, then the immediate accrued pension benefits would be payable on termination of employment in the Public Service, provided that the controller has had 20 years or more of service. If the air controller has had 10 years of service but less than 20, then a reduced benefit would be payable immediately.

In either case, if the controller is continuing employment in the Public Service, but in some other category, he may choose to draw up to one-half of his benefits as a supplement to the income from his second career which may very well be less remunerative than his first career.

A controller who leaves the operational service voluntarily will be able, under these proposals, to draw his full earned pension if he has served for 25 years in the operation and is aged 50 or more. This compares to the existing provisions for retirement at or after age 55 with 30 or more years of service for the Public Service in general. Therefore, there would be a reduction to 25 years from 30 years, and from age 55 to age 50.

At the same time, the controller who does not meet this age and service requirement but who leaves after age 45 will be eligible for a reduced pension with the reduction being based on the age-50 and the 25-years-of-service standard rather than on the age-50 and the 30-years-of-service standard as it applies to the rest of the Public Service.

It should be noted very clearly that the controllers will share in the cost of these improved benefits by contributing an additional two per cent of salary to the superannuation account. While the bill before us provides that the new benefits will apply retroactively to April 1, 1976, as was originally agreed upon in 1976 with the Canadian Air Traffic Control Association, the additional contribution will take effect only from the date of enactment for reasons of equity arising out of the delay that has occurred since this plan was originally proposed and agreed to by the controllers and the government.

As my honourable colleagues may recall, the provisions of this bill were originally included in the pension legislation introduced in the House of Commons in October 1978. This legislation was only at the report stage when Parliament was dissolved on March 26, 1979. Apart from the removal of the somewhat incongruous requirement for the added two per cent contribution for the retroactive period from April 1, 1976 to the end of 1976, and a change in the pension indexing arrangements applicable to the special benefits, Bill C-65 essentially contains the same provisions as the earlier bill.

The indexing payments or the cost-of-living adjustments to pensions, after they are payable, were originally proposed to become effective only at age 60 or on disability, but convincing arguments were advanced by the Canadian Air Traffic Control Association that such benefits should receive immediate adjustments where a controller is forced to leave operational service. Therefore, the bill before you proposes such immediate adjustments and is less restrictive than was originally proposed for those who leave operational service voluntarily.

This feature will ensure that the controller retirement program proposed in this bill will retain its value for those controllers who are forced to leave operational service. As a consequence, another step will have been taken to ensure that the air traffic control system in Canada maintains the highest standards of efficiency and, hence, its purpose respecting public safety.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I should like to congratulate Senator Molgat on his presentation of the principles involved in this bill. If my remarks respecting the bill are somewhat less comprehensive, and perhaps less incisive than his, I should like you to understand that that is because I was not originally the person to whom was assigned the task of responding to this bill. It was only a short time ago that I learned that it was to be my duty or obligation to make that response.

I have had the opportunity to do some rapid research into the question of what was said and how this bill was handled in the other place, and I have come to the conclusion that this bill is one which arrived before Parliament after a very long and protracted series of negotiations. As Senator Molgat has said, previous bills have been introduced intending to deal with this particular situation. They did not reach fruition and, consequently, this bill had to be brought forward. As a result of that delay and of further negotiations, this bill, I think, is an improved one.

I think there can be no question in the minds of reasonable people that this is a particular branch of the service—if there is one at all—where it is easy to justify a treatment with respect to retirement and retirement benefits that differs somewhat from the general manner in which retirement from the government service is dealt with.

In the course of perusing Hansard, I observed that, when this bill was before the other place, the opposition house leader made some remarks about it. I was struck by one thing that he said. He said that if anybody who was listening to him had the opportunity of knowing, being related to, or having close association with a person who had served in the capacity of controller, he would be easy to convince that the occupation does make extraordinary demands and does require the maintenance of a strong head and a steady nerve if the well-being of the public is to be genuinely protected.

The nature of the work is such that it makes exceptional and heavy demands upon the nervous systems of those engaged in it. As a result of performing that work over prolonged periods of time, there is every reason to believe that an air controller's physical and mental state is likely to be such that it would be desirable from all points of view—the point of view of the controller, the service and the public—that he be retired. Since the need for early retirement devolves from the quality and nature of the work in which he has been engaged, it does seem right and proper that he should be given special consideration in terms of retirement.

I do not think there is any need to delve deeper into the nature of the benefits that are being given to these air controllers. Senator Molgat dealt with that in a comprehensive and satisfactory way, and I cannot really add anything more to it. But a point that he made deserves mention, and that is that these additional benefits are not simply granted in respect to the nature and kind of service rendered, but that they are required to be, to some extent, financially supported by those who are to be the recipients. That seems to me to be a reasonable and proper way of dealing with it.

There has been a certain element of generosity involved in this, in that the contributory obligations are not being made retroactive, although the effectiveness of the statute is made retroactive to a considerable extent—I believe back for a period of almost five years. That probably is a concession to this group that is justifiable and properly should be made.

Having regard to those thoughts and considerations that are advanced by the honourable sponsor of the bill, I am pleased to say that it meets with full and complete support from this side of the house.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: With leave of the Senate, now.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, is there any particular reason why this bill should not be referred to a committee? Normally, I would expect it to be referred to committee, even though we have general agreement in principle, so that we might examine the details at our leisure.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I know of no reason to refer it to committee. I agree that that should always be our normal approach, so I have no quarrel with the fact that giving it third reading now without sending it to committee is an exception, but I understood that this should be such an exception. There was full support for the measure in its present form.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CANADIAN AND BRITISH INSURANCE COMPANIES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. W. M. Benidickson moved the second reading of Bill C-66, to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill was passed by the other place on second reading on June 23. The mover of the motion for second reading proposed that the bill be referred to a standing committee, but by unanimous consent the other place agreed instead to consider the bill in Committee of the Whole. Later that day, it also agreed to third reading of the bill. It will now be up of the spokesman of the opposition to indicate whether he feels that this bill should be referred to committee, and, also, whether or not, as we approach the summer recess, we should have third reading.

Honourable senators, the main purpose of the proposed amendment to the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act is to clarify the authority of the Superintendent of Insurance to incur certain types of expenses in exercising control of a company for the purpose of its rehabilitation, or for the purpose of winding it up under the Winding-up Act.

Section 91.3 of the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act authorizes a court, under certain circumstances and on the application of the Attorney General of Canada, to issue an order directing the Superintendent of Insurance to take control of an insurance company for the purpose of its rehabilitation or for the purpose of winding it up under the Winding-up Act.

Section 113(1) of the act provides that where the superintendent has control of a company for its rehabilitation or winding-up, the costs incurred by the superintendent in exercising such control are to be assessed against some or all of the other insurance companies registered under the act or the Foreign Insurance Companies Act. The objective of this provision is to preserve the remaining assets of a company having financial problems for the payment of policyholder claims by charging all the expenses involved in carrying out the rehabilitation, or the liquidation, against the insurance industry as a whole.

The Strathcona General Insurance Company, a federally incorporated company having some $39 million of claims outstanding, encountered financial difficulties earlier this year. In the prospect of a plan to enable the company to meet all its obligations being put together by a consortium representing certain segments of the insurance industry and other interested parties, the Supreme Court of Ontario directed the superintendent to take control of the company for the purpose of its rehabilitation. The company was short of cash and it was essential that it be able to borrow funds so that claims could be paid while efforts were made to collect its receivables. The consortium agreed as part of its plan to guarantee the repayment of the funds borrowed by the company on condition that the interest costs would be paid by the superintendent as part of the expenses incurred in exercising control of the company for purposes of its rehabilitation.

The payment of the interest costs by the superintendent, and their subsequent assessment against the industry, seemed to be well within the intent of the legislation, which is to permit the superintendent to do whatever is necessary to carry out a plan to enable a company under his control, for the purpose of rehabilitation, to meet its obligations. On this basis, the plan put forward by the consortium was implemented. The costs associated with the implementation of the plan, including the interest costs, will be paid by the superintendent and assessed against registered companies one year from now, at the time the companies are assessed for the department's regular operating expenses for the 1981-82 fiscal year.

Although the interest costs associated with meeting the temporary liquidity needs of a company seem to be just as essential an expense of rehabilitation or winding-up as are the costs associated with salaries of persons conducting the company's business or winding it up, and with its equipment and supplies, I am told that the Department of Justice has expressed the view that the current wording of section 113 is such that the payment by the superintendent and subsequent assessment against registered companies of interest and certain other costs might be open to challenge.

The main purpose of the bill, therefore, is to remove any doubt about the ability of the superintendent to pay and then assess against the industry, in the event of the rehabilitation or winding-up of a company, interest costs incurred in borrowing to meet a company's requirement for liquid funds and costs involved in terminating employment contracts and property leases.

The bill will amend section 113 of the act to make it clear that where the expenses arise in respect of a company that carried on only property and casualty insurance business, the assessment in respect of that company will be based only on the premium income of the property and casualty business of the other registered companies.

I am informed that the executive committee of the Insurance Bureau of Canada, the principal trade association for property and casualty companies, is aware that the interest costs associated with the plan to enable Strathcona to meet its obligations will be assessed against the industry, and that the provisions of section 113 may be clarified in this regard, and has not raised any objection.

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Could the honourable senator tell me if, after the bill was examined in Committee of the Whole, there was any amendment to it?

Senator Benidickson: No.

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, as a member of the insurance industry, I wish to support what I call this housekeeping bill, although I am not totally enamoured of it.

As honourable senators know, the superintendent, in his involvement with a company in trouble, is granted authority under the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act to take expenses incurred in exercising control of the assets of the company out of sums allocated for the administration of his department—that is the Department of Insurance—which reports to the Minister of Finance.

This particular amendment to section 113 of the act further defines the sort of expenses that can be taken out of the department's funds. The newly listed expenses include interest costs on money borrowed to help keep a company afloat while it is being rehabilitated or wound-up by the superintendent. They also include costs of terminating leases or employment contracts or other similar expenses, as Senator Benidickson mentioned.

According to the superintendent, this particular amendment is required because of the Strathcona Insurance Company, which was recently in trouble. I will refer to that again a little later. Objections arose to paying interest costs on money borrowed to keep that company afloat while it was being rehabilitated. In his estimation, such expenses are covered by the spirit of the act because its primary purpose is to ensure that policyholders' liabilities can be discharged by the company in trouble and that its assets are not squandered.

At this stage, I agree that these expenses are needed to help keep the company afloat, and I must add that the track record of the Department of Insurance, over a number of years, has been extremely good. It was suggested in the other place that this was the first insolvency since the depression. However, that is not quite right. I recall that during my 30 to 35-year career in the industry, there have been two other insolvencies.

The case of Strathcona was not quite the same as that of the previous failures. A member of the other place mentioned—wrongly, I believe—that Strathcona really acted as a reinsurance broker. It was not quite that. It was more what we in the industry would call a fronting company. A fronting company means that you insure everything you can, fronting for offshore or other companies, and keep as little as you can; and, of course, get as much commission out of it as you can. So you do not have your bucks invested in it. Therefore it leads—and that is what happened in this case—to very shoddy and unrealistic underwriting.

In their case I would call it gambling, because their net retention was out of all proportion to their capital. It reached the point, as some honourable senators may have read, where they had to resort to what we call unlicensed reinsurance, which means it is offshore and not registered in Canada. It is not under the control of the Department of Insurance, and therefore you collect if you can, and if the company is not sound it might renege on its commitments. That is what happened with Strathcona.

In addition, you find yourself with a major Canadian company not being able to collect on its claims, and therefore having to buy debentures from a company such as the Strathcona Insurance Company which is really insolvent. This company had to buy debentures for $2,300,000. I hope they collect. This is what we are faced with, however.

● (1540)

It was decided by the superintendent, and rightly so, that he would try to bail out the company as best he could. Obviously, because of their underwriting practices, a lot of other companies decided, "Why should we bail out the black sheep in the family when it is not trying to mend its ways?" When they saw the handwriting on the wall, they just kept on going.

I must say that they were encouraged by certain of my broker colleagues, who, because of the competition that had been going on in the industry for the last three or four years, were trying to secure accounts, as was everybody, and were using Strathcona.

Senator Benidickson said that the industry came to the rescue of the Strathcona. I would say that it was not the major insurance companies who did this, but a consortium of brokers who probably had become worried about the image of the industry, and decided that they would themselves, together with this major client who could not get paid, loan money in order to keep the company afloat, and shift the administration to another insurance company.

Be that as it may, although the Canadian and British Insurance Act is basically sound, and has been serving the country very well, I still think, although I approve of this bill and will move its adoption, that when we reconvene in the fall the Senate, or the other place, should take a good second look at the whole act, so that these things will never occur again.

Hon. W. M. Benidickson: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, I wish to point out that if Senator Benidickson speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Senator Benidickson: Honourable senators, it will be seen that Senator Charbonneau has more inner knowledge of the workings of the industry as a whole, from 30 years' experience than I have. Notwithstanding that, he has said in a general way that he approves of this amendment, and, indeed, the basic purposes of the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act. We are dealing particularly, of course, with section 113(1) of that act. Senator Charbonneau proposes that the Senate, when we resume our duties after the summer adjournment, give some attention to an examination of the administration of the act. The minister who introduced the amending bill in the other place did hear the speech of the representative of the official opposition, who had blamed re-insurance by foreign companies, very largely, for the difficulties that resulted in the trouble here. The minister said that he was anticipating a report from the Superintendent of Insurance, particularly with respect to the re-insurance aspect of that business. He did not expect that it would be forthcoming until perhaps the fall.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: When shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. W. M. Benidickson: Honourable senators, if there is no intention of requesting that this bill be studied at this time by a committee of this house, and in view of the fact that it was not seen fit to have it sent to committee in the other place but was dealt with in Committee of the Whole, and in view of the time schedule we have before us, I feel that I should move third reading now.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ECONOMIC COUNCIL OF CANADA ACT AND OTHER STATUTES

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault moved the second reading of Bill C-13, respecting the relocation of government agencies.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill is making its third appearance on the order paper since 1978. It is quite simple and self-explanatory.

A number of departments and agencies which must by law maintain offices or fulfill certain functions in Ottawa, have already been or will soon be relocated outside of Ottawa. This bill, which contains amendments to the present legislation concerning each of the agencies concerned, should rectify the situation by recognizing legally the new location of these departments and agencies. Bill C-13 provides the necessary changes. In five places, the words "city of Ottawa" are replaced by "National Capital Region". With regard to the Canadian Pension Commission, which comes under the Department of Veterans' Affairs and which is scheduled to be transferred to Charlottetown, the words "city of Ottawa" are replaced by the words "at such place in Canada as may be designated by the Governor in Council". During the two previous Parliaments, the Minister of Public Works introduced bills to rectify the situation, but none got past first reading.

The present bill is identical to Bill C-22 introduced on November 6, 1979, during the first session of the 31st Parliament, which replaced Bills C-32 and C-23 introduced by the former Liberal government during the third and fourth sessions of the previous Parliament. This bill does not mention the Farm Credit Corporation because the previous government, that is the Conservative government decided in July 1979 not to move the corporation to Camrose, in Alberta.

Most of the agencies mentioned which have been transferred within the last two years are still located in the National Capital Region, either in Hull or in Vanier. The agencies concerned are the Economic Council of Canada, the Department of Indian and Northern Affairs, the Land Titles Office, the Canadian Transport Commission, the Public Archives and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. In addition, it is planned to move to Prince Edward Island both the Canadian Pension Commission and the Pension Review Board, which come under the Department of Veterans Affairs.

Very specific aspects of various relocation and decentralization programs have been discussed in the other place, both in the house and in the committee. Indeed, most of the programs were developed following decisions made in the past by the government.

● (1550)

[English]

Honourable senators, as I stated a moment ago, in my humble opinion this is a mere housekeeping bill, but it does establish, to my mind, a precedent that I am in favour of. Although, like every Canadian, I am proud of my national capital and of the capital region, I think that this bill may, in the long run, go far to entrench in the minds of bureaucrats and politicians the idea that Ottawa or the Montreal-Toronto area is not necessarily Canada. That is why, as a maritimer, I am proud of the fact that the government has decided to relocate the Department of Veterans Affairs in Charlottetown. I hope that in years to come there will be other decentralization decisions made so that the government of this country will realize that Canada stretches from one ocean to the other.

I understand that some other honourable senators may wish to say a few words on this bill, and I would be happy to hear their comments.

Hon. Rhéal Bélisle: Honourable senators, may I be permitted to say to the sponsor of this bill, Senator Thériault, that he was short and sweet, and that his explanation was apropos?

As he said, this housekeeping legislation is necessary because of the relocation of some government departments to Hull and the decentralization of others to locations outside the National Capital Region.

This is the fourth time this bill has been introduced. It was numbered C-32 in the Third Session of the Thirtieth Parliament, C-23 in the Fourth Session, and C-22 in this First Session of the Thirty-first Parliament.

The bill revises certain statutory references to the city of Ottawa to provide equivalent references to the National Capital Region and other areas of Canada. The words "National Capital Region" are substituted for the word "Ottawa" in the following statutes: the Economic Council of Canada Act, the Land Titles Act, the National Transportation Act, the Public Archives Act, and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion Act.

The bill also amends the Pension Act to expand the area in which the chairman must establish residence and to allow the Pension Review Board to sit outside the National Capital Region.

[Translation]

As it has been mentioned, the Economic Council of Canada and the Atlantic Development Council might henceforth hold their sittings in the National Capital Region, and no longer in the city of Ottawa only.

Land titles offices for the registration districts of the Territories might be established in the National Capital Region, and no longer in the city of Ottawa only.

Storage rooms for documents left in the Archives Building might be located in the National Capital Region, and no longer in the city of Ottawa only.

The head office of the Canadian Pension Commission, the residence of its chairman and of its members as well as the location where the Pension Review Board holds its sittings might henceforth be outside the National Capital Region, as directed by the Governor in Council.

Honourable senators, this is not a case of absolute opposition in principle, but it is a costly operation.

The house is being asked to approve a fait accompli retroactively. We should have had an opportunity to debate this bill in the Senate. Regional and municipal authorities were not consulted either.

Maintaining British North America Act section 16, which stipulates that the seat of the Government of Canada shall be Ottawa until the Queen otherwise directs, paves the way for judicial objections from discontented citizens.

Relocating government agencies makes patronage easier and may just be perceived as such by the people. It might be politically advantageous for the government in office to relocate an agency or a regional office in a Liberal riding. For instance, in 1977 the government proposed to transfer 13 services to ridings, all of them Liberal except one.

Relocations breed discontent among the employees involved and bear directly on their morale.

When it was proposed to move Parks Canada regional offices from Cornwall to Peterborough, $160,000 was spent for nothing, on the rental of offices in that city. Managers asked for transfers. In the end, the government had to buy back the homes that officials had bought in anticipation of the move.

The relocation of federal agencies in Hull only serves to aggravate the deterioration of downtown Ottawa.

As for the move of the Department of Veterans Affairs to Charlottetown, it only increased the backlog of claims for disability pensions submitted by handicapped veterans.

In conclusion, honourable senators, I think the government takes pleasure in making certain moves without prior authority and in coming to the Commons and the Senate afterwards to announce, "Those are the facts, you must legislate them into existence." I believe it could become a very dangerous precedent that could lead to serious consequences. If the mover of this bill wants to propose third reading today, I think that we would agree.

[English]

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I will not take up much of your time. Even though we all agree that the relocation of various departments of the federal government across the land is of benefit to the people of Canada, I should like to stress one of the problems that can arise.

Dealing mainly with the relocation of the Department of Veterans Affairs to Charlottetown, I would point out that this has caused certain problems which one could not predict or project. The Department of Veterans Affairs, and particularly the Canadian Pension Commission—that agency of the Department of Veterans Affairs which deals with the adjudication of disability pensions—is an agency which is different from any other bureaucracy. One of the reasons is that the adjudication based on the assessment of a veteran's wounds requires a particular kind of knowledge on the part of those civil servants, a knowledge based on experience in veterans' affairs and experience in war so that they can adjudicate in a fairer and quicker way than would otherwise be possible.

• (1600)

One problem that has arisen is that most of the heads of the agencies involved—agencies such as the Canadian Pension

Commission, the War Veterans Allowance Board, the Bureau of Pensions Advocates and the Pension Review Board—are second world war veterans who are due to retire soon. It is obvious that not all of them will be moving to Charlottetown. Consequently, for the many thousands of applications now before the Department of Veterans Affairs and the Canadian Pension Commission, the widely known delays that are being experienced will continue.

Again, while we agree to the relocation of federal agencies to other parts of Canada, the government should take cognizance of certain facts so that there will be no further delays in pension applications and their adjudication. For instance, before we allow these experienced people to retire—and second world war veterans are now in the 64 age group—the federal government might agree to allow them to continue beyond the mandatory retirement age so that the relocation of the Pension Commission can take place without interrupting the hearing of applications. As will be brought out in other parts of the legislation, that move is of tremendous significance to the treatment of veterans, because as things stand now the cases take so long to process that many of the veterans die before their cases are actually adjudicated. So I think it is most important that the government recognize these facts and extend the term of service of these experienced people who head up these agencies of the Department of Veterans Affairs, at least until there can be a logical and good move of all of the files to the province of Prince Edward Island.

Apart from the treatment of veterans, I think it is worthwhile mentioning that the Department of Veterans Affairs holds files for people in the Department of National Defence and people in the RCMP, who are wounded at times and have to be treated and who have to apply for pensions in the same way as anybody else. There are also eight or ten other agencies of government that the Department of Veterans Affairs looks after.

If memory serves me correctly, the annual report of the Department of Veterans Affairs makes note of approximately 11,000 applications to the Canadian Pension Commission. Looking at a breakdown of those applications in terms of the nation as a whole, approximately 6,000 or 7,000 of them are from the central part of Canada, coming from the cities of Quebec, Montreal and Ottawa. Apart from a little over 1,000 of them, all of the other applications come from west of Halifax.

Senator Frith: What percentage comes from west of Halifax?

Senator Marshall: Of the 11,000 applications, about 9,000 come from west of Halifax. In other words, before we move the Pension Commission to Prince Edward Island, we should consider the fact that that will mean that they will have to travel from P.E.I. to Vancouver, whereas if they were in central Canada they could at least be dealing more quickly with the pension applications right in central Canada, of which, as I have said, there are about 6,000 or 7,000. I do not have the actual figures before me.

Now, the War Veterans Allowance Board is already in Charlottetown, but I wish to stress the fact that the Pension Commission is the most important segment of the Department of Veterans Affairs and that, in my opinion, it should not be in a hurry to move, at least until it is able to catch up with the backlog of applications that are being seriously affected—not to mention the problem of the medical officers who would have to go with the Pension Commission to Charlottetown, and, as you know, there is already a national shortage in that respect.

Once again, I say that the government should look seriously at this move because, in my opinion, in order to help these veterans to whom we are committed, we should leave the Pension Commission here in Ottawa until the system works so that they will be able to treat them as well in Charlottetown as they can under the present circumstances.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, if the Honourable Senator Thériault speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I have taken note of the points raised by both Senator Bélisle and Senator Marshall, and while I realize that my colleague from Newfoundland, Senator Marshall, is an expert on matters related to veterans' pensions and has all of the facts at his fingertips relating to veterans' services, I personally cannot accept the suggestion that the commission should be given more time before moving to Prince Edward Island, because I can hardly accept the idea that decisions with respect to pensions, or decisions of any sort, cannot be made just as well in Charlottetown as they can in Ottawa, Toronto or Montreal.

I was pleased to hear Senator Bélisle say he was prepared to give leave for third reading of this bill, but I did note in his kind remarks a little of the flavour of the philosophy of the party he represents—namely, that the status quo should be maintained and that we should not change because it will disturb a few people.

I was equally surprised to hear my colleague Senator Marshall say that people don't want to move. You know, for a person who has lived in the maritimes himself and has seen hundreds, even thousands of his people, including friends and relatives, I suppose, having to move over the years to Toronto and Montreal and out to western Canada, he surprised me by suggesting that the commission should not move to P.E.I. It seems to me that it is only fair that some of those well-paid bureaucrats, who after all are being paid by all of the taxpayers of Canada, at least once in a while should be given the opportunity—not "told" that they should move but "given the opportunity"—of going to the Atlantic provinces. I am equally confident that in the future there will be opportunities for such bureaucrats to move to western Canada.

That is all I have to say at the moment, and I thank honourable senators for their attention.

Senator Bélisle: If I may be permitted to reply to the sponsor of the bill, may I say that I do not think he interpreted my remarks correctly, either in English or in French, if he thinks I am for the status quo. Perhaps he will read my speech tomorrow to see what I actually said, because I was certainly not suggesting that we retain the status quo. I am for moving, but I believe that when we move we should look at all three lights and proceed with caution.

Senator Thériault: I thank the honourable senator for his remarks. I hope what I have said will not be taken to suggest that I think he is for always staying in the same place; but sometimes if you look too long at the lights you miss the green light and you never move.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I think we have received the green light so, with leave of the Senate, I move that the bill be read the third time forthwith.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CURRENCY AND EXCHANGE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Peter Bosa moved the second reading of Bill C-68, to amend the Currency and Exchange Act.

He said: Honourable senators the aim of this bill is to permit the Governor in Council to issue gold coins. The gold mining industry had been advocating for some time a program to market its products, and the government responded, on the advice of the Board of Directors of the Mint, by proposing an amendment to the act which took the form of Bill C-39 and which was assented to on June 30, 1978.

The original amendment was modified to limit its provisions to January 1, 1981, and to have the minister responsible report to Parliament twice a year on the administration of the gold coin program. The aim of the modification was evidently to limit the gold coin program to a three-year trial period, after which it would be evaluated.

Following the amendment, the Royal Canadian Mint launched a gold bullion coin program. The Board of Directors of the Mint were asked to monitor the program to keep cabinet informed on the advantages of such a program to Canada and the advantages to the Canadian gold mining industry as well as other relevant economic factors such as inflation, the impact on the balance of payments and the overall profitability of the program.

The Board of Directors of the Mint commissioned the services of Price Waterhouse Associates to undertake a rather complex study, the main conclusion of which was summarized as follows:

—the overall impact of the “Maple Leaf” program on Canada and the Canadian industry is positive.

While the program had a modest impact on the overall economy, it did create an estimated more than 100 new jobs at absolutely no cost to the government. The study by Price Waterhouse Associates was unanimously adopted by the Board of Directors of the Mint, who recommended that measures be taken to authorize the continuation of the Maple Leaf gold coin program. The Royal Canadian Mint has never asked the government for financial help in its operations since it became a crown corporation. The last report tabled in Parliament following the 1978 amendment shows that for the period from July 1, 1978 to December 31, 1980, the gross income from the sale of gold coins amounted to $1,456,911,000, and the net profit was $31,682,500.

Private companies that are involved in the distribution, publicity, processing of precious metals, supplying of materials, transportation services and risk insurance have benefited from the gold coin program, as have the various provincial governments that have imposed sales taxes on coins sold in Canada. The gold required by the Mint to produce the coins is produced by Canadian mines. In the event that they cannot produce enough to supply the needs of the Mint, the Mint can obtain the balance from the Bank of Canada's exchange fund account.

The Maple Leaf gold coin became available to the public for the first time in September 1979, and it was well received throughout the world. Over 2.2 million coins were sold during the first 16 months of the program. This coin offered an option of great value to gold negotiators, to international bankers and to investors who wanted an alternative coin to the South African Krugerrand. The Krugerrand has been on the market since 1967.

The only uncertainty expressed with regard to the Maple Leaf coin was the temporary nature of the program, which influenced the strategy used to market the coin. The official distributors in North America and Europe, therefore, were unwilling to stimulate investment in a program which had an uncertain future. When Bill C-68 was submitted to the House of Commons on June 25, and given second and third reading in the same sitting, it was agreed during the debate by all parties to extend the provisions relating to this particular program to January 1, 1991.

Everyone who participated in the Maple Leaf gold coin program and, more particularly, the representatives of the gold mining industry, are anxiously awaiting the decision to continue this program. The $100 gold coin commemorating special events, and the $50 gold coin, commonly called the gold Maple Leaf, are prestigious items for Canada, and have called worldwide attention to the importance of the Canadian gold mining industry. The gold coin program has been profitable to all those who have participated, such as the mining industry, the Mint, the distribution agencies, and it has created over 100 new jobs. It has provided a new source of revenue for Canada.

[Senator Thériault.]

For these reasons, honourable senators, I move the second reading of this bill.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I am sure we are all grateful to Senator Bosa for his detailed explanation of this bill. As he mentioned, Bill C-39 was passed in 1978 for a trial period of three years. Prior to that time, it had been required that the value of the gold in a gold coin be equal to the denomination of the coin. Bill C-39 enabled the cabinet to vary the amount of gold in that coin, to issue gold coins of any denomination and to specify the maximum number of gold coins to be struck in any given year.

When Bill C-68 was first introduced, it was to enable the Governor in Council from time to time to issue gold coins. That was objected to on the grounds that it gave too much authority. Consequently, an amendment was made whereby the policy was extended for a 10-year period which, apparently, satisfied all the parties concerned. At the time of the 1978 amendment an objection was raised to the effect that the proposal would give the cabinet too much authority, and there could be the danger of debasing the currency. However, that objection was overcome by putting in the legislation the provision that there be a report to Parliament every six months.

As the sponsor mentioned, the Mint engaged Price Waterhouse Associates to make a study of the effect of this program over the three-year period. As a result of that study, they recommended that it be continued. As far as I know, the results of that study have not been tabled, although I understand a copy has been given to some members in the opposition in the House of Commons. Perhaps the sponsor would arrange to have a copy of that report tabled in this house.

I was interested, of course, to hear of the great number of coins that have been issued and the tremendous value involved. Not only that, but in about a 30-month period over $31 million profit was made, which is over $1 million a month. Of course, this should be encouraged.

● (1620)

Perhaps the sponsor would inform me as to what the sales of these coins have been in the last few months, and how they compare with sales made during the first year. It is my understanding that a tremendous number were sold when the program was first put into effect. However, I must admit that I have not looked at the last report.

The original act stated:

—the standard weight so prescribed for a coin shall be such that the value of the gold contained therein is equal to the amount that appears on the coin as the denomination thereof.

That was amended in 1978. What is the relationship now between the value of the amount of gold and the value of the denomination? Again, I do not know.

It is also interesting to note that in the original act gold was considered to be legal tender for payment of any amount. That was also changed in 1978.

Section 7 of the act states:

(1) Subject to this section, a tender of payment of money is a legal tender if it is made

- (a) in gold coins issued under the authority of section 4;
- (b) in subsidiary coins that are current under the provisions of section 6;

“Subsidiary coins” means coins other than gold coins. It goes on to state:

- (c) in notes issued by the Bank of Canada pursuant to the Bank of Canada Act intended for circulation in Canada

I do not know what is meant by the words “intended for circulation in Canada.” Perhaps it refers to notes that are sometimes issued to deal with the balance of payments and which are not in general circulation.

Section 2 of the act, as amended in 1978, describes legal tender as follows:

- (a) in the case of coins of a denomination greater than ten dollars, for payment of any amount, if the tender consists of not more than one coin;

I take it from that that gold can only be legal tender for amounts over $10.

Section 2 goes on to state:

- (b) in the case of coins of the denomination of ten cents or greater but not exceeding ten dollars, for payment of an amount not exceeding ten dollars, but for no greater amount;

I suppose that would take in quarters and half-dollars.

What intrigued me was the phrase:

- in the case of coins of the denomination of ten cents or greater but not exceeding ten dollars,

I know there are coin denominations of 25 cents, 50 cents and one dollar, but I do not know of any others.

Section 7(2) of the original act goes on to state:

- (c) in the case of coins of the denomination of five cents or greater but less than ten cents,

Again, I know of no coins which are greater than five cents and less than ten cents. This applies to the payment of an amount not exceeding five dollars.

Subparagraph (d) states:

- in the case of coins of the denomination of one cent or greater, but less than five cents,

Again, I know of no coins which are greater than one cent and less than five cents. However, I suppose there is a reason for wording it that way.

There is general agreement that this is a good program and that it should be extended. Certainly, any program which can make over $1 million a month is worthy of consideration. We, on this side, support the bill since it is simply an extension of the present program. I see no reason why it should not be given third reading today.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

Hon. Peter Bosa, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), moved that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

NORTHERN PIPELINE

CONSIDERATION OF FOURTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the fourth report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings moved the adoption of the report.

He said: I beg the indulgence of honourable senators this afternoon to make a few remarks with respect to the work of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline and its fourth report.

Throughout this session your committee has continued to fulfill its primary task of monitoring the progress of construction of the northern pipeline from the Alaska-Yukon border to the United States border.

In our examination we have paid special attention to Canadian content requirements of the pipeline, employment opportunities for native people, and opportunities for people living within the region of pipeline construction.

In our meetings with officials we have also paid special attention to the matter of impact on the communities affected by the pipeline. Special attention was also given to cost escalation of the pipeline.

We have explored these avenues in four meetings: one with the minister, our colleague, the Honourable Senator H. A. Olson, the minister responsible for the northern pipeline; officials of the Northern Pipeline Agency; and, of course, Foothills Pipe Lines (Yukon) Ltd., the contractor responsible for construction of the line. As of today, the construction phase of the western leg from Caroline—a point just north of Calgary—to the United States border at Kingsgate in British Columbia has been completed. That is 260 kilometers of pipeline. It was on schedule and under budget. The United States portion from Kingsgate to the San Francisco area is proceeding on schedule.

● (1630)

On the Canadian portion there is a compressor meter station under construction. When completed, the pipeline on the western leg will be ready to accept gas this fall and facilitate the export of 240 million cubic feet a day to the California market.

With respect to the eastern leg from Caroline to Monchy on the Saskatchewan-Montana border, construction commenced the first week of June, and it is on schedule.

The 1981 program proposes 258 kilometers in Saskatchewan which would complete the Saskatchewan portion with compressor stations at Monchy and Piapot and also 170 kilometers in Alberta and construction of a compressor station at Jenner, Alberta.

The United States section of the eastern leg is on schedule. Construction commenced in North Dakota and it is proposed that 200 kilometers will be constructed in that area this year.

The 1982 program will see a completion of the Alberta section amounting to 206 kilometers. A pilot spread of 58 kilometers will be constructed in the James River area of Alberta. By the fall of the 1982 the line will be ready to accept gas for export to the Chicago area.

With respect to the Yukon area, it is anticipated that clearing of the right-of-way in that area will commence the beginning of 1982.

In monitoring the various areas of concern to your committee, we are gratified to report that with respect to construction of the line in the Canadian section Canadian content continues to be maintained at or about the 90 per cent level.

With respect to the employment of native people, this varies from month to month, but in general over the western leg the rate of employment averages between 7 and 9 per cent. It is not bad, but neither is it good. We are impressed with the efforts of Foothills to increase that percentage of employment of native people. However, we are not as impressed with the work of the subcontractors in this respect. Your committee and the pipeline agency have taken steps to find ways and means of encouraging employment of native people on the line.

In regard to the Alaska portion, of course everything awaits satisfactory financial arrangements for the construction of this portion of the line. At the moment, President Reagan's Council of Economic Advisers are preparing, or have prepared, a package for presentation to Congress which will contain the necessary financing ground rules that were not provided in the original legislation authorizing the construction of the line. It is hoped that within 60 days after presentation to Congress the package will be approved. Essentially, it contains three very significant waivers to facilitate the financing of the line, the first of which would be to permit the producers on the North Slope of Alaska to participate equitably in the construction of the line. It is proposed that Exxon, Arco and Standard Oil of Ohio—the prime producers on the North Slope—be authorized to participate equitably from 30 per cent to 49 per cent in the pipeline.

The second important waiver will provide that the construction of the plant on the North Slope of Alaska—the cleaning plant which will cost in the neighbourhood of $6 billion to $8 billion—will be included in the cost of the project.

The third waiver, which is very important to Canada, will provide for the cost of construction of the Canadian portion to be paid when it is completed and not when gas flows.

Therefore, we await the approval of these and other waivers contained in that package by Congress, after which the package will be presented to the Federal Energy Commission of the United States for approval and, thereafter, to the financiers to secure the necessary financing—in the neighbourhood of $30 billion—for one of the largest projects ever attempted without government participation or guarantees. The contractors are hopeful—indeed, they are anxious—about the first overtures that have been made to the financiers. But, they really have little to be concerned about until the waivers are passed and the financiers can take a serious look at the financing arrangements. At the moment, they are nothing but confident that the financial proposals will receive positive consideration from the financial community.

The most significant activity of your committee over the past session, honourable senators, was a recent trip to western Canada, the Yukon, Alaska and the Northwest Territories, which was designed primarily to tour the route of the pipeline from Calgary to its source at Prudhoe Bay in Alaska. More importantly, it was designed to assist committee members to gain a more comprehensive and significant understanding of the issues surrounding pipeline construction. In our eight days in western Canada and the north, you may be interested to know that we covered over 8,000 air miles and held 18 meetings with Canadian and United States government officials and industry representatives. We viewed oil and gas facilities throughout the north. But what is most important, honourable senators, is that we talked to the people of the north. We went to the community halls, to the church halls and to council chambers and we talked to those people who will feel the greatest impact of the pipeline and other developments in the north. In all our meetings with the people in the north, we received nothing but appreciative comments that the Senate should come to their locale to listen to their concerns and problems, and make whatever legislative contribution we could to their solution.

For our part, I believe that all members of the committee gained a greater knowledge and understanding of the feelings of the people of the north, and when I refer to the people of the north, I mean those who were born and raised there, those who came from other parts of Canada, and, perhaps most importantly, the native people. Their greatest concern, we found, is the same as that of any other Canadian who realizes the development that is likely to take place. They are not anti-development. I believe they fully understand and appreciate that one cannot stop the hands of the clock, that development is going to take place. But their simple wish is to participate in that development in a meaningful way, and not to be the victims of development or react passively to that development.

In the development of the north, honourable senators, we are entering a very fragile environment. There have been many better and more poetic descriptions of that great part of Canada than I can give today. We received, I believe, a glimpse of what the north means to Canada and the important role that it will play in the future. The resources that exist in that frontier area represent a considerable potential to assist Canada toward self-sufficiency in oil and gas by the end of the century. But the environment presents a challenge to engineering technology when faced with the problem of the accessibility of those resources.

There are major projects under consideration and under construction at the moment. Dome Exploration is slated to spend $40 billion in the area of the Beaufort Sea in the next 10 years. Gulf recently announced that it is moving into the Beaufort. We have the Arctic Pilot Project, designed to bring liquid natural gas from the high Arctic to a point in eastern Canada on the St. Lawrence or in Nova Scotia. All of those projects are being considered which will transport those resources to southern and eastern markets of Canada.

However, the question is asked by northerners, and should be asked by all Canadians as we enter that precious area, our last frontier: Do we know all we need to know before we undertake these projects? Do we know all we should know with respect to the impact of technology on that environment? Are we maximizing the industrial and regional benefits to northerners? What type of regulatory mechanisms should be in place to oversee these megaprojects?

The construction of the northern pipeline will receive more monitoring, more inspection, than any other project in the history of Canada, and rightly so. Should not those other projects receive as much consideration with respect to monitoring as they proceed? Have we identified the manpower skills and training programs required? One issue that was raised over and over again in our meetings with the native people and the people of the north was the need for manpower training in the north, in the environment of the people, to prepare them over the next 10 years so that they can participate meaningfully in those projects and not simply cut the brush for the right-of-way.

Are we assured that Canada will stay at the leading edge of all of this technology in the development of the Arctic? Finally there are the manpower, financing and technology conflicts which will exist over the north on the east coast and in western Canada.

The efficient allocation of precious human technological and financial resources can overcome all of those obstacles if we are prepared to do the work and put them in place before we proceed hell-bent on development. In other words, honourable senators, we must strive for a balance between development, the ecology, the environment, and the impact on human, social and economic conditions of the area. We must know what we are doing before we do it, because one mistake in that environment, in that ecology, will be irreparable.

It is for this reason, honourable senators, that in our report we have asked you to authorize the Special Senate Committee on the Northern Pipeline to undertake a study and report on the impact of transportation in that area of Canada north of the 60th parallel with a view to bringing together all of the technology that is available, all of the research that has been done, and make a worthwhile contribution to legislation in the future. We could be in the forefront, leading the way legislatively into the north, because over the next 20 years—just as was the case with the west at the turn of the century—the north will replace the west in development. The work of this chamber can be of crucial importance to the development of that area. Working with the people of the north, we can give them the sense of participating with legislators in their destiny and in the development of the Arctic.

I am therefore proud to move the adoption of the report and I recommend it to honourable senators for their favourable consideration.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

NEWFOUNDLAND

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, May 27, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Cook calling the attention of the Senate to certain matters relating to the development of hydro power in Labrador, and to the development of the offshore oil resources of Newfoundland.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, may I first commend Senator Cook on his calling attention to matters relating to the development of hydro-electric power in Labrador and to the development of the offshore oil resources of Newfoundland, a subject which is of such vital importance to Canada's future as we strive towards energy self-sufficiency. I think it is probably appropriate to deal with this subject at the present time in view of the debate on energy arising out of Bill C-57, and Senator Hastings' well-worked-out speech on the northern pipeline. I can sympathize with Senator Hastings' feelings with regard to the development of the north and its impact on the economic environment. However, I want to talk about another north, namely, northern Newfoundland and Labrador. Today I am going to deal only with the hydro-electric potential, and will leave the offshore oil to another day. Meanwhile I will gather some more statistics.

If Senator Cook's figures are accurate—and I am sure that they are—there is a potential of 7,770 megawatts, or almost 8 million kilowatts, of hydro-electric energy in Labrador. If the federal government's figures are accurate, every million kilowatts is the equivalent of 700 barrels of oil. In these circumstances the potential availability of 8 million kilowatts in Labrador is the equivalent of 5,600 barrels of oil a day.

To stress my point, honourable senators, I want to refer to a speech made by the Minister of the Environment, in which he put into perspective the oil equivalent of hydro-electric power. The minister was speaking on behalf of his government. I am, of course, referring to hydro-electric power on a national basis, and not only from the point of view of Labrador.

The minister pointed out that hydro is the only fully developable form of renewable energy in Canada today. Already, hydro-electricity is contributing about 25 per cent of our primary energy needs.

This brings about a number of possibilities for Canada. It is said that there is about 63 million kilowatts of economically developable conventional hydro across the country, which is the equivalent of about 1 million barrels of oil per day. If all the developable potential of hydro-electric energy were exploited, say over the next 20 years, the number of jobs created by the projects, directly and indirectly, would amount to some 140,000 man-years, through project construction and support service employment. This would amount to some $2.2 billion in wages and salaries in current dollars.

In addition to this, there would be jobs created in the manufacture of electrical equipment and machinery, of steel and concrete and other materials for turbines, pumps, generators, accessory equipment, transmission cables and towers, controls and switching stations. Up to 90 per cent of the purchase value of these items, related to hydro development, is capable of being produced in Canada, and the labour content and skills required are high. They could involve an additional 750,000 man-years of work for Canada's secondary industry and its suppliers.

The economic benefits of hydro development would come to Canada as a whole, and also to various regions. Canada benefits through job creation in any region, especially in high unemployment areas, and by any additions to labour income anywhere. The national benefit is also increased through additional exports of hydro-electric power, and its beneficial effects on the balance of trade and the value of the Canadian dollar in international exchange. It is expected that new hydro development may add up to $1 billion per year in short and longer term energy export sales.

Regionally, most of the benefits of project construction employment and service purchases would go to the regions with developable hydro resources, like B.C., Quebec, Manitoba, Labrador and the Northwest Territories. There would, however, be substantial economic fallout to central Canada, where the hydro-electric equipment manufacturers are located, and where other suppliers of materials and services are found.

In a speech given recently to the Conference on Environmentally Compatible Hydro Development, by the minister responsible, it was indicated that the government was going to find out just how much hydro-electric power we have in Canada, which, to my mind, is just another form of procrastination on the part of the government, because, as he stated in the same speech, there is about 63 million kilowatts of developable conventional hydro, the equivalent of 1 million barrels of oil per day, available in Canada through hydro-electric power.

Certainly most provinces have an inventory of their hydro potential, and certainly Newfoundland has an inventory of several potential sites. For example, while the difficulty of the problem regarding transmission of power through Quebec persists, and is indeed reaching impossible proportions, Newfoundland has been going ahead slowly by developing hydro sites to fulfil its needs. The Upper Salmon is a $155 million hydro project in the Bay d'Espoir area of Newfoundland's south coast, which, when completed, will add 84 megawatts of hydro generating capacity, and an average energy capability of 497 million kilowatts annually to the province's generating system, and will displace some 830,000 barrels of oil annually.

Another project has been the construction of the North Salmon dam, spillway and diversion channel, valued at $11.5 million, and a further project valued at $22.9 million for construction of the West Salmon River dam power canal and channel improvements. These projects will come on stream in 1982 to help meet the province's energy requirements until late 1984.

Without listing other potential sites, the two which have undergone an impressive series of technical, marketing, economic, financial and environmental analysis are Gull Island and Muskrat Falls, which together can produce the energy equivalent of 27 million barrels of oil annually.

Muskrat Falls, where the installation of 618 megawatts is anticipated, would cost $3.2 billion, including transmission facilities, and can be constructed over five and a half years.

The cost of the Gull Island project, with the capability of 1,690 megawatts, is estimated at $4.3 billion and will take six-and-a-half years to complete.

Taking into account the comparative cost related to oil delivered to the island from Labrador, the cost of Gull Island would be the equivalent of $36 per barrel, or 60 mills per kilowatt hour. As related to Muskrat Falls, it would be 85 mills per kilowatt hour, the equivalent in terms of oil of $51 per barrel.

I mention these figures, honourable senators, to try and stress what increases in costs have come about since 1966, when the Upper Churchill Falls project was completed in order to produce 5,325 megawatts, which was sold to Hydro Quebec for an insignificant three mills, and which Hydro Quebec is in turn selling for 20 mills, just one-quarter of what it will cost to produce at Muskrat Falls. This situation will get worse as long as there are delays in construction.

The cost to produce, 1,698 megawatts at Gull Island is four times the cost of the Churchill Falls project. Even at 20 mills Hydro Quebec is earning some $600 million a year. This is what Newfoundland is contributing to Quebec.

Furthermore, the delays in developing the Lower Churchill emphasize the lack of sense that is being exhibited, and the lack of that co-operation between provinces for the national good that we should be seeing in a spirit of Confederation.

A study commissioned by the Newfoundland government from Acres Bechtel, a consulting firm, confirmed the viability of the Lower Churchill in the middle 1970s which would, if given the go-ahead, be coming on stream next year at a cost of less than $2 billion in order to produce the equivalent of 27 million barrels of oil. One of the requirements to bring about development of the project was the need to recall 800 megawatts from the Upper Churchill, which Hydro Quebec refused. So that today, even if agreement could be reached with Quebec, it would cost $7.5 billion, at today's dollars, and as long as agreement is delayed it will cost more, eventually reaching the point of doubtful cost effectiveness. Of course, the other problem has to do with the controversy over the transmitting of power across Quebec to proposed buyers in the United States, which again they refuse.

Newfoundland now has agreement in principle for the purchase of surplus power in Labrador by the Power Authority of the State of New York, which could now be provided from either the Muskrat Falls or the Gull Island sites. Since it is a long-term offer, the risk of financing is relieved and this agreement of sale is certainly of advantage to the federal government, which is a 49 per cent shareholder in the Lower Churchill Development Corporation.

One would imagine that, as a result of the discussion draft of the Energy Security Act, 1981, there is a small ray of hope for the possible expropriation of a Quebec corridor for the power Newfoundland plans to sell to the United States. In the discussion paper which the government has produced, it is envisaged that a designated international power line could provide at least a partial solution to the dispute between Newfoundland and Quebec concerning hydro-electric power derived from the Lower Churchill River.

Under existing arrangements, Hydro Quebec buys electricity at the border of Newfoundland, transports it across Quebec, and then sells it to the United States. While the National Energy Board currently has authority to approve construction and operation of a separate line from Labrador through Quebec to the United States, it lacks the authority to expropriate a right-of-way for such a line. Quebec has long held the position that power generated in Newfoundland and Labrador has no automatic right of access to markets via Quebec lines, just as it now claims that Newfoundland has no right to a corridor. Quebec insists that Newfoundland sell the power to Quebec Hydro at the border, at a price and at a time decided upon by Quebec. However, Newfoundland argues that it is being discriminated against by geography, and that it is losing some $600 million a year because of its inability to establish its own delivery system through Quebec.

While Quebec claims strong rights, in that it has the power lines, the facilities and the land that Newfoundland wishes to traverse, how far should Quebec be permitted to go? Would it insist on buying and reselling western natural gas that is destined for maritime customers at the end of the proposed Quebec and Maritimes pipeline? Would it similarly seek to regulate the sale of Sable Island gas that might be required by Ontario customers in pinch situations?

It should be the view that provinces are entitled to fair compensation for the utilization of their facilities, in the same way that a trucker would be paid for sharing a delivery assignment with the railways. However, to tell one province that it must sell its power to only one customer, and at wholesale prices, is extremely unfair. Such policies deny this country workable energy programs to help resolve our industrial and employment problems, and to help, as well, our striving to reach self-sufficiency.

Still, the concept of expropriation is not the only option, nor is it the best one. It would be preferable, from our point of view, were the federal government and the provinces to establish the long-sought national power grid proposal to enable all parts of Canada to supply and receive power one from the other.

After seven long years of exasperating negotiations with Quebec, Newfoundland has had to explore several alternatives in order to fulfill its objectives for development. Members of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance were made aware of the submission to them by the Newfoundland Minister of Finance regarding the introduction and rationale underlying the Upper Churchill Water Rights Act and the obstacles that Quebec has placed in Newfoundland's way over the past number of years to prevent it from gaining access to the vital energy resource. This act would recover rights under a 99-year lease, which was signed in 1966 by the Churchill Falls Labrador Corporation Ltd. If the courts found in its favour, Newfoundland would regain the resource.

Newfoundland also took court action against Quebec for the recall of 800 megawatts of Churchill power in order to develop the Lower Churchill more economically. Quebec refused and agreed to release only 300 megawatts, even though it has been shown that Quebec is not using the full potential of the Upper Churchill, and estimates indicate that enough water is being spilled to generate some 2,200 megawatts. As pointed out by Premier Peckford, however, after four years the trial of the main issues has not begun.

The Province of Newfoundland has had to look at the feasibility of laying underground cable connecting Newfoundland and Labrador, which would cost 10 to 20 per cent more than a line through Quebec. Newfoundland has had to look at an alternative route, known as the Anglo-Saxon route, which would bring the power down the west coast of Newfoundland and thence across to the Atlantic, at considerable extra cost.

I am sure, honourable senators, that I have bored you with facts, many of which you are already aware. I do so, however, because of our concern and worry about the future price of oil and about possible energy shortages. Surely the benefit to Canada can be seen in the potential of a renewable energy resource in Newfoundland, which desperately needs such a resource for domestic consumption, as well as the potential production for export markets.

Through the vision of the Honourable J. R. Smallwood, the Upper Churchill Falls project in Labrador has brought benefits to Quebec of some $2 billion since 1972, while Newfoundland has benefited by a mere $100 million.

Mr. Smallwood's successor, Premier Frank Moores, tried diplomatically to develop further the potential of Labrador power. Premier Peckford is now attempting to negotiate, though certainly with a different approach, and rightfully so, with a sister province.

While I speak as a Newfoundlander in support of Premier Peckford, and while I recognize the aspirations of the Premier of Quebec, surely in a spirit of Confederation we should realize and exploit our resource potential for the good of our nation. There is a way to rid ourselves of the greed and power which prevails in our country. The two parties should sit down in a spirit of goodwill to resolve an issue which, through its delay, is not only hurting our ability to be self-sufficient, but is making us dependent on foreign oil-producing countries, who must be laughing at us all the way to the bank.

As I indicated, and as stated by the Minister of the Environment, Canada has the developable potential of hydro-electric power equivalent to one million barrels of oil a day. Surely, if Newfoundland has the proven potential of a good portion of that oil equivalent in hydro power to which I have referred, isn't it time that an all-out effort be made to ensure immediate action before it is too late? Shouldn't the federal government exercise its power and intercede by bringing the two premiers to a bargaining table in an effort to resolve this problem which is so important to our nation?

On motion of Senator Marshall, debate adjourned.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

FOURTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Fourth Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.—(Honourable Senator Grosart, P.C.).

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, Senator Grosart has indicated to me that he will not be speaking in this debate, and that he favours the adoption of the report at this time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to speak, this order is considered debated.

LABOUR RELATIONS

MOTION TO APPOINT SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets, pursuant to notice of Tuesday, June 23, 1981, moved:

That a special committee of the Senate, to be composed of seven members, be appointed to inquire into and report upon

(a) any matter relating to labour relations in Canada with particular reference to problems concerning the free collective bargaining process and the constructive settlement of disputes; and

(b) any proposals for a more orderly and less disruptive exercise of the right to strike;

That the Committee have power to engage the services of such technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purposes of the inquiry; and

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, to report from time to time, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee.

[Translation]

He said: Honourable senators, I shall take only a few moments of your time because I understand that Senator Lawson would like to say a few words on this matter. On Tuesday, June 23, 1981, I explained that, in my opinion, it was a matter of some urgency to submit to a Special Committee of the Senate certain aspects of labour relations so that it could recommend action to reduce not only the number of strikes in Canada, but also their duration.

A national Post Office strike began last evening at midnight. The strike will mean the loss for all Canadians of an essential service to which they are entitled. As in any labour conflict of this magnitude, it is difficult to point with any accuracy at who is responsible. I believe I speak for all of us in asking both parties to resume negotiations unconditionally and try to find a reasonable solution. Because of its tremendous financial implications, Canada cannot afford to lose for long the essential service of the Royal Post Office, and when the government becomes convinced that it has explored every other avenue, I hope that it will not hesitate to introduce emergency legislation which would allow all parliamentarians to make a fair decision based on facts.

Honourable senators, I have included in the text of my motion a few of my own ideas concerning the way that this special committee should be established. I want it to be well understood that the important thing is for us to set up this committee. As to the terms of reference of the committee I am not adamant and I would be willing to accept any amendment you might suggest.

[English]

Hon. Edward M. Lawson: Honourable senators, I know that because of the lateness of the hour it is tempting to let this proposed motion go without comment, but the matter is far too important to do that. It has too much impact on the economy of Canada not to make some comment on it.

I congratulate Senator Deschatelets for bringing this important matter to the attention of the chamber. Having said that, however, I would also urge extreme caution before any hasty move is made to establish a committee to take a walk out on this landmine that exists across Canada called "labour relations." The last time there was a hasty move to try to do something in this area was the creation of the Anti-Inflation Board guidelines, which were intended to create wage and price controls. They turned out to be wage controls and not price controls. The labour movement went along, albeit kicking and struggling, feeling that they were making the only sacrifice for the economy of the country, and what we are reaping now, with all the many man-days lost, is the harvest of that hasty action.

I am also concerned about what is proposed by Senator Deschatelets regarding "a more orderly and less disruptive exercise of the right to strike." That sounds pretty good, except if we are talking about a free society, free collective bargaining and free trade unions, the most essential ingredient in that is the right to strike—the right of the worker to withdraw his services, to withdraw his labour. To tamper with that would be to insist on changing the whole system.

I think it is important to look behind the causes of some of these strikes and the many man-days lost. It is not a good record that has been achieved by labour and management, but there are many factors that contribute to this kind of situation. I think it is imperative that we take a look at that. If we are going to have continuing run-away inflation, if we are going to have the high interest rates that we are presently subjected to, if we are going to have the banks making their reports of profit increases of from 20 per cent to 79 per cent, we cannot stand back in shock and surprise if working people insist on getting 12, 15 or 20 per cent increases in an attempt to keep pace.

In many areas of the country, for instance in my own area of British Columbia, the prospective home owner has to pay $80,000 to $100,000 for the lot alone. So it is not surprising that working people insist that they find some way of keeping pace with run-away inflation and with high interest rates—18, 19 and 20 per cent. And they say, "Nothing is being done. Nothing appears to be planned by the government to control inflation. Nothing is being done to control run-away interest rates." And if nothing is being done, the only device available to them is to negotiate for the sale of their labour—that's all they have—at the highest price possible.

When we talk about other reasons that contribute to strike situations, and to this rather bad record of man-days lost, we have to take a look at some of the disputes. We had a major one in British Columbia, the B.C. Telephone dispute. If anyone examined that carefully, and the people who were close to it, he should have seen that, first, there were the normal negotiations; there was a conciliation board of learned gentlemen, experienced men who recommended a settlement; there was a union that voted to accept. Then there was a strike because the B.C. Telephone Company decided for its own reasons not to accept.

Was this an abuse of the right to strike, or were there other reasons? Well, many people who were on the scene know that one of the major reasons for that strike was that the telephone company wanted to achieve a higher rate increase, which is now presently before the CRTC, and the basis on which they felt they could justify that was that, if they had resisted a settlement of their dispute and had withstood a lengthy strike, then they could go and get a higher rate increase.

So you cannot lay all of the concerns on the working people involved; you have to examine all of the many reasons that contribute to these kinds of disputes.

Senator Hastings talked about the problems of the north and all the major projects that are on the planning boards. I do not know how many of you had a chance to hear the report of the Major Projects Task Force last week. They have done a most detailed inventory of the projects that are planned between now and the end of the century. They only counted projects of $100 million or more. Between now and the end of the century they anticipate $439 billion-worth of projects in Canada. That will mean one thing, as we already know: a shortage of skilled tradesmen in this country.

What happens when we go through this kind of process? What do you see when you look behind the scene to see what causes strikes? In the last booms we had in pulp mill and hydro-electric power development and so on, we find a simple example that illustrates one of the major contributing factors to some of these kinds of conflicts—a shortage of tradesmen. What happens when there is a shortage of tradesmen? Contractor A goes to contractor B's employees and says, "I need a few plumbers and electricians. I know we all have a contract that says $15 an hour and I can't pay you any more, but I will bonus you a couple of hours a day." So he steals the tradesmen and brings them to his company. Now the tradesman has a bonus of about $30 a day, or $4 an hour, so that his effective rate is $19 an hour. Every day the contractor pats him on the head and says, "You're doing great. We are making money. We are making progress. The job is finishing, and everything is just fine." After the job is finished, he winds up in a union hall somewhere involved in negotiations, and some business agent says, "Well now, we have to be aware of our responsibilities considering that inflation is about 10 per cent or 12 per cent. So why don't we propose an increase of 10 per cent or 12 per cent, or maybe another dollar and a half or $2 an hour? This will bring the rate to $17 an hour. This is a fair settlement for the next year following our negotiations."

● (1720)

But then the tradesman says, "Wait a moment; hold on now. I've been getting $19 an hour as a result of this bonusing system introduced by my contractor. He has been telling me every day that he is making money from me and that I am doing fine, and now you are proposing a cut in my pay of $2 an hour." These are the kinds of situations which result in a strike. Then we hear the reports in the media about the greedy workers and the greedy tradesmen who are trying to obtain a huge increase of $2 and $3 an hour. Whereas, the fact of the matter is, in the particular scenario I have described, that the contractor, anxious to finish his job and to avoid penalties for delay, is stealing tradesmen from other contractors.

In other jurisdictions, such as Sweden—which I will come back to in a moment—such a situation would not be allowed. There would be penalties against the employers for these kinds of practices. I do not want to lay all of the blame on the employers, because we have irresponsible unions and irresponsible members who get a little carried away as well. I am merely suggesting that we proceed with great caution in dealing with this very delicate area and the balance inherent in this kind of problem.

I had the opportunity to make a trip last fall during one of my many absences. I make that self-criticism because Senator Godfrey is not here to make it on my behalf. I travelled with a number of French-Canadian trade union leaders to six different countries last fall to meet with employers, industry officials, government officials and trade union officials to see what we could learn and to see if we could find a better way to deal with the concerns which were expressed by Senator Deschatelets. After visiting countries such as France and Italy, we wound up in Sweden, which is supposed to be Utopia for labour-management relations. We were met at the airport by a taxi driver with a nice Volvo who took us to our hotel. The bill was $52 American.

Upon investigating the situation, we found that 95 per cent of the blue-collar workforce is organized in some form of trade union and more than 90 per cent of the white-collar workers are organized in a trade union; whereas in Canada one-third of the blue-collar workers are organized and only a small handful of the white-collar workers. Sweden has a strong central body which negotiates on behalf of virtually all the trade unions in the country; whereas the Canadian Labour Congress is in the process of a great cleavage and of expelling all the building trades. There is no strong central body in this country which can negotiate and set such standards.

Senator Deschatelets referred to a ceiling rate increase of 12 per cent. The difficulty with such ceilings is that they become the floor. The 12 per cent would become the minimum, not the maximum. The system in Sweden is entirely different from what we experience in this country, and it would be very difficult to transfer that system to Canada.

Upon meeting with many other workers in the plants and so on, I found that the average worker—be he a trucker, a warehouseman or whatever—makes about 5,400 kronor per month. That calculates out to about $1,500 Canadian. Forty per cent of those earnings are taken off the top to pay for the social programs which exist in Sweden. Gas costs $3.50 to $4 per gallon. Where it is common for working people in Canada to have at least one automobile, it is a rare occasion for a family to have even one over there. Food and entertainment costs in Sweden are at least double what they are in Canada. Yet, their wages are no higher than the wages in this country. So when one talks about applying those kinds of systems to Canada, it simply will not work.

Senator Deschatelets referred to the figures on the man-days lost in that country. Certainly, it has a very enviable record. I believe his figures stopped at 1976. It is interesting to note that within two years following 1976 there was a general strike involving 600,000 workers. When I asked officials of the parent labour body of Sweden what had gone wrong, they indicated that there had been a change in government and, instead of leaving the matter to labour and management to work out, the government intervention was to such a great extent that it resulted in a general strike. That is why I advocate caution when dealing with this area.

The officials of the labour movement in Sweden also indicated that they have many real problems. Most of their energy is imported, which results in very high costs. As a matter of policy and philosophy they work very hard to minimize wild cat strikes, illegal strikes or work stoppages, because they say that they could not afford to compete with the European or world market if such labour practices were tolerated. Their whole philosophy is based on the commitment to minimizing waste. I believe this is an important area which could be much improved upon in Canada.

Every now and then there is a proposal to try a new system. Some years ago many were advocating the Australian system, which involves binding arbitration for all its disputes, the theory being that such a system would eliminate strikes in Canada. While the system eliminated almost all their legal strikes, they now have the worst record for illegal strikes of any country in the free world. Speedy solutions or magic formulae found in other countries just cannot be applied to the Canadian system.

There is one area in which I think the Senate committee could do some good. A report by the Employers' Council of British Columbia dealt with man-days lost as a result of compensation or accidents on the job. There are many more man-days lost as a result of absenteeism than there are from strikes or lockouts. The report stated that the number of man-days lost due to absenteeism in Canada is approximately eleven times the total lost days due to strikes. It estimated the yearly cost of absenteeism to the Canadian economy to be $10 billion. The other report said that it was about $14 billion. In other words, for every million man-days lost due to strikes, eleven million man-days were lost due to absenteeism, boredom, alcohol and drug abuse and so on. It seems to me that if we were really concerned about what is best for the Canadian economy we would organize a major task force or Senate committee to investigate this area of absenteeism.

My own organization feels that the problem of absenteeism is so important that we have a full-time director of human relations who deals with alcohol and drug abuse problems and with setting up joint committees with companies and trade unions across the country in an attempt to deal with this problem. When we think in terms of $14 billion per year simply going down the drain, imagine if we could cut that back by 10 per cent. It would mean a new industry for Canada which would offer a net $1.5 billion to the economy without affecting our environment or burning up our resources. It would simply mean the recovering of our most important resource, the human resource, and putting the people involved back into meaningful employment in our society and within our economy.

These are the kinds of directions which I think we should be taking. We should be talking about the problems of boredom, compressed work weeks, more meaningful jobs, dealing with alcohol and drug abuse and so on. I once asked officials of one of the major banks if they had such a problem. They replied that according to their estimate, of their 25,000 employees, 2,500 could not function because of what they called the banker's disease—alcoholism. When I asked them about their program, with the idea in mind that I might learn something, they replied that they had no program. It seems to me that there are enough people dealing with labour and management problems that it is not necessary for unskilled amateurs to become involved. Because labour-management involvement can be so visible and so vocal at times, many people are anxious to become involved, but at the same time there is this problem which is ten times as bad, yet we spend no time concerning ourselves with it or dealing with it. This is an area we should look at very carefully, because it is an area in which we could do so much for the economy of the country.

There are problems with industrial relations, but there are also many records of achievement all across the country that are rarely recorded. My own organization has been negotiating with the dairy industry of British Columbia since 1919. There have been 62 or 63 years of collective bargaining without a single man-day lost as a result of strike or lock-out. This says much to the credit of an enlightened management, an intelligent and informed membership, and the responsibility of the union leaders involved. There are many examples of that all across this country that are rarely reported. We only report, in great detail, all the major conflicts.

It has been my experience that the average Canadian worker wants very badly—it is a sense of pride with him—to give a good day's work for a good day's pay. If he feels he is being unfairly treated or taken advantage of, he is quite prepared to militantly stand up and fight for what he thinks is right. On balance, all he wants is to be fairly treated. He wants someone to do something about the question of interest rates, high land costs, housing costs, and so on. If the Canadian worker sees that fairness is being applied, and that it is necessary to make sacrifices for the good of the economy of the country as a whole, then he is more than willing to make his share of that sacrifice.

On balance, I think that we need to deal in areas of training as well. The federal government is to be congratulated for the contributions it has made over the last number of years. Money has been made available to trade unions to promote better understanding in business agents, shop stewards and members, and to give them some understanding of the economics of profit and loss. That is an investment the government has made for which it will see many returns over the coming years. It is a program that should be continued and expanded to cover areas of alcohol and drug abuse, absenteeism and so on.

Every now and then the government seems to spring into action with a training program. I remember a few years ago they did so, and trained and re-trained all kinds of people for jobs that were not available. In this country we turn out hundreds of teachers, lawyers and so on when there is a need for truck drivers, plumbers, electricians and nurses. The major programs task force suggests that some of these major jobs should be phased in. It suggests that there should be training to fit the needs, and that we should make an inventory of what is available and have training to fit the particular job. It is a simple, basic, bread-and-butter solution to this kind of problem. If we do that, we can prevent much of the conflict that is taking place.

You must remember that, when you are dealing with labour relations, less than 15 per cent comes under federal jurisdiction. The bulk of it comes under provincial jurisdiction. Inter-provincial transportation, longshoring, telecommunications and so on come under federal jurisdiction, but the majority of labour relations comes under the jurisdiction of the provinces.

There is a different system in each province based on the particular needs. We would be invading a very delicate area if we talked about establishing a committee to deal with that.

I conclude simply by saying that, basically and on balance, I think we have a good system in this country. We should learn whatever we can about industrial democracy, which is a very important issue, from West Germany and the other countries which we visited. The West Germans are very keen on keeping their people involved in what is taking place. If a major technological change takes place, they are very anxious that their workers know about it. They are anxious to share this information.

However, in Canada, there is a great reluctance on the part of the Canadian employer to share that information because he thinks the employee will know as much as he does, or know too much, and that is a serious mistake. The sharing of information and a better-informed work force makes a more productive and efficient work force with a greater commitment to the employer and the economy. We should try to sell mutual trust instead of mutual mistrust. If we can deal in those simple, bread-and-butter areas, I think the kind of system we have can benefit from what other countries have done. However, let us not simply try to adapt a formula from somewhere else. It simply will not work here, and will add to the conflict.

The need here is to proceed with great caution. I question the advisability of establishing a committee at this time. Many attempts are being made by industry associations and trade unions across the country to co-operate, and those are rarely reported. On balance, basically, we have a good system. Let us just find out some of the shortcomings, make the minor repairs and adjustments and build for a better economy for Canada.

Hon. Guy Williams: If a strike is called and put into effect and, at a later date, there is a partial lock-out by the company, is negotiation much more difficult?

Senator Lawson: The answer is yes. It is more difficult to achieve a settlement but, at the same time, if there is to be any equality or balance, we have to preserve the employer's right to a lock-out as much as we preserve the union's right to strike.

Part of the problem which causes long strikes is that you have an imbalance—either a strong union and a weak employer, or the reverse. Where you have strong employers and strong unions, strong trade associations and strong councils on the union side, you have organizational balance and equality, and it often results in economic equality as well.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 2, 1981-82

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-80, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1982.

Bill read first time.

[Senator Lawson.]

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), that this bill be read the second time now.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the bill that has recently been distributed is Bill C-80, Appropriation Bill No. 2, 1981-82. You will remember that we passed Appropriation Bill No. 1, the interim supply bill, in March.

I do not know whether it is because I spent a good part of my early life listening to sermons that I tend to divide comments into three parts but, in this case, such a division comes naturally because Appropriation Bill No. 2, 1981-82, provides three basic things.

First, it provides for the release of the balance of the adjusted main estimates for 1981-82 amounting to $20.054 billion. Second, it provides for the release of the whole of supplementary estimates (A), 1981-82, amounting to $2.143 billion. Third, it provides for the release of the whole of supplementary estimates (B) 1981-82 amounting to $184 million.

The total spending authority provided for in the bill is, therefore, $22.381 billion. You will find the exact figures in clause 2.

If you make a quick perusal of the bill, you will see that there are six clauses. In clause 1 there is the title of the bill, and then what I submit to honourable senators is the key provision, that is, clause 2, and you will notice the exact amount is $22,380,767,383.41. If you continue with that clause and go to paragraph (a) at the top of page 2 you will see:

The Main Estimates now before the House and Supplementary Estimates (B) for the fiscal year ending the 31st day of March 1982 less the amounts voted by Appropriation Act No. 1, 1981-82, as contained in Schedule A to this Act—$20,237,467,383.41.

Then we go to supplementary estimates (A) in clause 2(b), and the amount shown there is $2,143,300,000.00.

To complete our general familiarity with the bill, I refer to the Summary of Requirements at page 43 where we see the total of $20,237,467,383.41. On the next page is Schedule B, which contains the amount that we already saw in clause 2.

As I mentioned, interim supply for the first three months of the 1981-82 fiscal year amounting to $8,267,119,391.59 was approved by Appropriation Act No. 1, 1981-82, passed by us on March 31, 1981.

The main estimates were tabled in the Senate on March 2, 1981 and referred immediately to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. Those estimates were discussed in committee with the President of the Treasury Board and his officials on May 28, 1981—just last month.

Supplementary estimates (A) were tabled in the Senate on June 9, 1981 and they, too, were immediately referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. Supplementary estimates (A) consist of one vote, vote 20a, of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, and provide for increased oil import compensation payments to refiners and other importers of crude oil and petroleum products. These supplementary estimates were discussed in committee with officials of the Treasury Board on June 10, 1981.

Supplementary estimates (B) were tabled in the Senate on June 18, 1981 and also were immediately referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. That is where I split an infinitive, to the chagrin of Senator Macquarrie, and said it was our habit “to immediately refer” instead of “immediately to refer”.

The report of the National Finance Committee on supplementary estimates (B) was presented last night by Senator Leblanc. These estimates are necessary due to a ruling by the Speaker of the House of Commons on June 12, 1981. That ruling ordered 10 votes be deleted from the tabled main estimates because they contained words deemed to be inappropriate for authorization through the process of supply. You might remember that the principle of that ruling is something that Senator Grosart warned us about when we dealt with Appropriation Act No. 1.

Therefore, these estimates reintroduce three votes with the offending words removed: Agriculture, vote 30b; Supply and Services, vote 5b; and Transport, vote 110b. Also included are three votes of Energy Mines and Resources—votes 35b, 40b and 45b. We are to consider, later in our sitting today, the three bills that relate to these votes. Interim supply in March authorized money to be spent for these programs up until June 30.

Since a vote cannot appear in an appropriation act unless it is covered in an estimate before the house, it was necessary to place these Energy, Mines and Resources votes in these estimates at the exact amounts approved earlier in Appropriation Act No. 1. Therefore, it was a technical necessity to include these votes. These supplementary estimates were discussed in committee with the President of the Treasury Board and his officials on June 23, 1981.

Therefore, honourable senators, on the three branches, we talk of the release of the balance of the adjusted main estimates, the release of the whole of supplementary estimates (A), and the release of the whole of supplementary estimates (B). They have all been referred to and considered by the Committee on National Finance.

I need only add, in accordance with tradition, that I give the usual assurance that the form of this bill is the same as that passed in previous years taking into account Madam Speaker's ruling of June 12, including a summary table with Schedule A to reconcile the amounts contained therein to clause 2(a) of the bill.

Honourable senators, if you require additional information, I shall try to provide it.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to say a few words on this proposition because we are now being asked to give first, second and third readings to this very large appropriation bill, and it is my opinion that it would not be prejudicial to the public interest that we should consent to this abbreviated procedure. The reason I am able to take that stand is because this bill is fresh in my mind, and its contents are certainly not strange to me at all, nor are they strange to anyone who has been following the proceedings of the National Finance Committee or the debates in this house that have arisen from reports of the National Finance Committee.

As the Deputy Leader of the Government said, the subject matter of this bill and, indeed, of the other three bills that he mentioned in his remarks, has been before us for some time—in fact, since March 3—and as the estimates made their way through examination of the National Finance Committee. I will be the first to admit that when one is dealing with such enormous sums of money one would be rash, indeed, to say that every appropriation has received the attention that it is due. I think it is probably fair to say they have received all the attention possible. If the committee is to conduct its work in any orderly and reasonably timely fashion at all, it has to make certain judgments as to what it will study in detail and what it will examine in a superficial way. Being a member of the committee, I can say with candor, and perhaps with some colour of right, that that committee does approach its task in a very conscientious way, and is, in my experience, one of the committees of this house in which we may take some satisfaction.

So I am satisfied that, as things go, the contents of this bill and the material that makes up the appropriation we are being asked to grant, has received appropriate scrutiny in the committee of the Senate. It has also received some attention in the Debates of the Senate, because when the Chairman of the National Finance Committee reported to the house, he did so on all three items that are now before us—the main estimates and supplementary estimates (A) and (B)—although in the latter case he was represented by our cordial deputy chairman who gave us the information just recently.

As a result of those reports, we have had an interesting debate. Perhaps not as many senators took part as had wished to, but under the circumstances those who spoke did so for so long—and here I must include myself—that they probably outwore the patience of other senators who had to listen to them.

So on the basis of that approach to the question of the appropriation bill, I believe we would be justified in acceding to the suggestion of the government that we deal with this matter into either this afternoon or this evening.

On the other matter that was raised namely, three supplementary bills that are expected and which also deal with estimate items—I would offer a comment. I must say that I am mightily pleased that the House of Commons decided that proper procedures should be followed and that where those procedures had not been followed, as was the case with the main appropriation bill in the House of Commons, the Speaker, prompted by Mr. Harvie Andre, a leading member of the opposition from Calgary, quite properly ruled that the way in which they were going about things was the wrong way, and that the government should not try to bootleg items in under an appropriation bill which should have been dealt with in some other manner.

Even though that is true, and I am pleased that the Speaker has ruled that remedial measures should be taken, let us not forget that the remedial measures that have been taken do not disturb the fact that the items in the first case were part of the appropriation, and therefore considered as part of the appropriation and part of the estimates in the various stages that the estimates go through in both the House of Commons and the Senate.

So I really have no objection to responding positively to the suggestion of the Deputy Leader of the Government that we deal with those three bills in the same manner as we deal with this one, because in substance they are the same thing. They are not the same in form, and form is important, but they are the same in substance, and, therefore, I see no reason why they cannot be handled in that way.

While I shall not attempt to pre-empt the right of other honourable senators, particularly those in my corner of the chamber, from expressing their views on this matter, I can say that so far as I am concerned we are willing to approve of the procedure that has been suggested, and deal with these matters in toto either this evening or this afternoon.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): With leave, honourable senators, I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

[Senator Roblin.]

RIDEAU HALL OTTAWA GOVERNMENT HOUSE

June 30, 1981

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable W. R. McIntyre, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber to-day, the 30th day of June, at 9.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,

Your obedient servant,
Edmond Joly de Lotbinière
Administrative Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thought I saw some eyebrows raised at the mention of 9.45 p.m.

The first of the three bills has been passed by the House of Commons, and the other two will probably be passed soon after 8 p.m., so I thought we should retain the time as 9.45 p.m. The Deputy Governor General is not far away, and it is possible to have royal assent a little before 9.45 p.m.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

● (2020)

At 8.20 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

OIL SUBSTITUTION AND CONSERVATION BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-77, respecting oil conservation and the substitution for oil of other energy sources.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave, I move second reading now.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, perhaps we should have some explanation. This is the first time we have heard of this.

Senator Frith: I am going to give an explanation if leave is granted.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, when we were dealing with the appropriation bill I mentioned that supplementary estimates (B) were tabled in the Senate on June 18, 1981. Perhaps I may pause there to say that honourable senators will remember that the three parts of the appropriation bill that I felt we should look at were: first, the release of the balance of the adjusted main estimates for 1981-82, amounting to a certain figure; secondly, the release of the whole of supplementary estimates (A), 1981-82, amounting to a certain amount; and, thirdly, the release of the whole of supplementary estimates (B), 1981-82, amounting to a certain sum.

I had mentioned earlier, honourable senators, that there were eight bills that were going to be coming to us as a result of a ruling made by the Speaker of the House of Commons to the effect that of those eight bills three were characterized by the same urgency as the appropriation bill, and those three bills related to the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Coming back now to the connection between these bills and the appropriations, they relate to supplementary estimates (B), which were the ones tabled in order to make the adjustments necessary as a result of the ruling that was made in the House of Commons on June 12. All of them, just generally, re-introduced three votes with the offending words removed: Agriculture vote 30b, and this bill we will perhaps get one day next week; Supply and Services vote 5b, and that bill we will get next week; and Transport vote 110b. It was pointed out also that there are three votes of Energy, Mines and Resources—vote 35b, 40b, and 45b.

Interim supply, in March, authorized money to be spent for these programs up until June 30—that is, tonight. Because of the fact that a vote cannot appear in an appropriation bill unless it is covered in estimates before the house, those votes were placed in the estimates in the exact amounts approved in the interim supply.

What we have here, in Bill C-77, relates to the Canada Oil Substitution Program, which was also the subject of supplementaries (B) relating to the interim supply. The program was introduced in the main estimates 1981-82, and provides for one-time grants to persons who will convert their equipment from oil to other fuels. The program was included in estimates mainly because it was considered to be urgently required.

The COSP program, the subject of this bill, will provide for payments out of the consolidated revenue fund for the program for the balance of 1981-82; so that is the distinction between what was already in supplementary estimates (B), which was interim supply, and what we have here, that portion of the main estimates not provided by supplementary estimates (B), 1981-82, covering interim supply. Of course, subsequent requirements will be voted annually in the estimates pursuant to these bills.

Turning to this bill, I would ask honourable senators to consider the bill in the context I have described, because that is the reason we are being asked to deal with this and two other bills tonight, whereas the other five bills we will deal with next week.

The short title is the Oil Substitution and Conservation Act. Applications for payment are then dealt with, together with certain restrictions. In clause 4 agreements are referred to that relate to the program.

I have very full notes on the whole program, but I think we have debated the program, and will probably be debating it again in this chamber. Therefore, unless I am asked to do so, I do not intend to get into any detailed explanation as to what the program is. I have been briefed adequately enough to be able to do so if honourable senators so desire.

I am offering this bill to honourable senators in the context offered earlier, and that is that this bill—like the other two that we expect to get this evening and that are now being debated in the other place, subject to a house order as to time—is tacked on as a corollary to the appropriation bill. The other five bills are similar corollaries, but they just do not involve the urgency that these three bills do.

The three bills I am referring to, of course, are this one, which is the Canada Oil Substitution Program, or COSP; the Home Insulation Program, or HIP; and the Canadian Home Insulation Program, or CHIP.

I should say, honourable senators, that I am sorry that we do not have the other two bills before us now. They are subject to a time agreement and a house order in the other place. I have been assured that we will certainly get one of them, and perhaps both of them, by about 9 o'clock, in time for royal assent at 9.45. After we have debated this bill, and if the Senate sees fit to pass it, I am going to suggest—and I wanted to talk to Senator Macdonald about this before, but I will say it now—that we adjourn to the call of the bell and until we get the other two bills. I will have even briefer comments to make about the other two bills, because they are of the same character, and it is simply a matter of describing the slightly different programs involved.

For those reasons, honourable senators, I move second reading of this bill.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, you will recall that this afternoon, when Senator Roblin spoke on the main appropriation bill, he also spoke on these bills, which were to be introduced here this evening, indicating that we on this side are prepared to give our agreement and have them pass through the three readings this evening, because of the fact that they have already been debated and studied at great length. It was, shall I say, due to technical difficulty, or negligence on the part of the government, that they were not dealt with in the proper way, and so the government had to bring in this bill to correct the procedure.

Senator Frith: To adapt the warning we get on television, in this case the warning is, "Do adjust your set."

Senator Macdonald: In any event, we are prepared to give three readings.

I did not study the bill when these items were in the estimates, but I thought one point rather strange. Clause 4 says:

4. Subject to any regulations made under this Act and in accordance with such terms and conditions, if any, as the Treasury Board may specify, the Minister may enter into an agreement with any person in Canada who operates a natural gas or electrical transmission or distribution facility to provide financial assistance by way of grants, loans or guarantees to enable such operator to extend his facilities to other persons so that those persons may be provided with a heating source of natural gas or electricity.

I find it passing strange that there would be no reference there to using coal instead of oil. Perhaps that would come under clause 5, where it takes in any source of energy other than oil, natural gas or electricity. I may say that this is a somewhat popular program. If my memory serves me correctly, I believe that a person can get up to $800 to convert from oil to some other source of energy. A goodly number of people are taking advantage of this, and I suspect that a good many applications are written in. The government must expect that a fair number will apply for it because I see that clause 8 provides:

8. (1) In respect of the period from July 1, 1981 to March 31, 1982, there is hereby appropriated for the purposes of this Act, two hundred and two million, eight hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars to be paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund from time to time as required.

(2) Additional sums required for the purposes of this Act shall be paid out of moneys appropriated by Parliament for the purpose.

In other words, the government feels that from now until next March, at least $202 million will be required to carry out the purposes of this act.

Having made these few remarks, honourable senators, I agree to second reading and third reading of this bill tonight.

● (2030)

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, my only purpose in rising—apart from killing time—is to ask some questions of the Deputy Leader of the Government.

I am afraid that I did not quite follow what he said in respect of supplementary estimates. Looking at the appropriation bill that was passed earlier this day, I take it that the item that was deleted from the estimates to which this bill originally applied is vote 45b, the Canada Oil Substitution Program, and that the amount earmarked for the current fiscal year under that program is $67,625,000. That figure does not jibe with the amount mentioned in clause 8 of Bill C-77, which refers to an amount of $202,875,000.

Hon. Jack Marshall: That is typical.

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Connolly: That payment can be made from July 1, 1981 to March 31, 1982. Would the deputy leader have any information which would reconcile those figures?

I have another question. Shall I ask it now?

Senator Frith: I believe I have an answer to the first question, and I hope I will to the second. However, to be honest with you, my difficulty at the moment is that the deputy house leader of the other place is waiting outside to see me. He might have some news of what is taking place in the House of Commons. I shall leave my papers here for the Minister of State for Economic Development so that he can try to answer that first question. I believe the answer is in the catch-up of the interim from the final, but I will have to give you the figures. You can pose the other question, and please take your time doing so, senator.

Senator Connolly: Shall I ask the minister the other question?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Yes, you can ask the question, but I must admit at the outset that I am not familiar with this set of notes and it may be difficult for me to find a precise answer. The deputy leader has just left the chamber for a brief discussion with the deputy house leader of the other place with respect to the timing of arrangements that has been worked out between the leaders of the parties in the House of Commons. He will be back in a few minutes with a report I believe you will be pleased to hear.

Senator Connolly: Shall I ask the other question now?

Clause 7 of Bill C-77, which is before us now, deals with the making of regulations by the Governor in Council. I wondered, first, whether those regulations are available now. Secondly, could we have some indication of at least the general character of the regulations?

I notice, for example, that in clause 7(b) regulations may be made "establishing the qualifications of persons to whom payments may be made under section 3," and clause 3 of the bill indicates the type of person who can make application for payment. I am particularly interested in the relationship between clause 7(b) and clause 3.

Perhaps the minister would rather wait until the deputy leader returns.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the deputy leader has familiarized himself with this bill and the related documents. I am sorry, but I have not done so. I cannot give you a precise answer with regard to that relationship.

Senator Marshall: Do you mean to say that you don't have an answer?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I could improvise, but in light of the precision that is being requested, I would rather not.

I believe that the deputy leader has just re-entered the chamber.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, it looks as though this is the beginning of an unusual evening.

The first question dealt with the difference between the amount in the schedule to the appropriation bill and an amount that is being asked for in clause 8 of Bill C-77. I believe the answer to that question lies in the fact that there were two legislative moves made with reference to these three programs. For the moment we are only talking about the subject matter of Bill C-77, which is the cost of a conversion program.

Two things were done. First, there was an amendment made to what was found in supplementary estimates (B) to catch up the technical requirements of the interim supply, since they had to be re-introduced into estimates because a vote cannot be the subject of an appropriation unless it is in the estimates. The bill that we are dealing with now is for the balance of the year and could not be put into the appropriation bill as part of the adjustments made through supplementary estimates (B).

I have not had a chance to do the actual arithmetic, but I believe that is the principle behind any discrepancy between the two amounts. Clause 8 of Bill C-77 deals with the period from July 1, 1981 to March 31, 1982. The amounts shown in supplementary estimates (B), dealt with for adjustment purposes and found under EMR, were for the interim supply.

The second question I did not hear.

● (2040)

Senator Connolly: My second question has to do with clause 7 of Bill C-77, which provides that the Governor in Council may make regulations. Actually, I have two questions. First of all, I am interested in whether the regulations are in being; whether the deputy leader has the regulations and whether he can give us an overview of them. I am particularly interested in clause 7(b).

However, if that information is not available—and sometimes regulations are not drafted at the time the bill comes before Parliament—then perhaps it can be given at another time.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I believe the clause containing the power to make regulations is a repetition of a clause that existed in previous legislation concerning this program, and the renewal is necessary in order to deal with the adjustments required by the ruling made in the other place. However, I am not sure of that, although that is my understanding.

Senator Connolly: In any event, you do not have the regulations now.

Senator Frith: No, I do not have those regulations—at least, not the regulations made pursuant to clause 7. There are some regulations in existence that were passed under the authority of a similar section, but I do not have any regulations that are drafted specifically under clause 7 of this bill. I do not think any such regulations exist.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the information I have is that we will have the second of the group of three bills within about 20 minutes, and I understand we should have the third bill shortly after that—I hope in time for royal assent at 9.45.

That leaves us with two possibilities: We can wait until we have both bills, which will mean, as you can figure out, a total of two calls of the bell. In other words, we would be called back to deal with both bills, and then we would recess to await the attendance of the Deputy Governor General. As opposed to that, we could simply deal with the bills as they come—that is, when they are ready and we receive them. I rather favour dealing with the bills as they come, because it might well be that the third bill would arrive while we were dealing with the second bill. Therefore, I suggest that the Senate adjourn during pleasure to resume at the call of the bell later this evening.

I invite comments from honourable senators on whether they agree with what I have said. I invite comments particularly, of course, from the members of the opposition, and I take this opportunity to thank them for their courteous and co-operative attitude, because it is certainly an occasion for rocking the boat, if rocking the boat is what they desire.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

CANADIAN HOME INSULATION PROGRAM BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-75, respecting a home insulation program for certain provinces in Canada.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave, I move second reading now.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: First, I would like to say a word about the Home Insulation Program to remind honourable senators of the basic principles of the program, with no intention of getting into any matters of a controversial nature. The next bill we expect to receive is called CHIP, and it is perhaps necessary to remind ourselves of the difference between the two programs. The HIP Program applies only to Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia. It was introduced by Appropriation Act No. 1, 1977 as a means of offsetting the substantial increase in the cost of electrical generation because of the high reliance of the provinces of Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia on imported, oil-fired thermal generation.

It was determined that the resulting expenditure burden on consumers would be greatly reduced by a policy aimed at greater efficiency in consumer use of petroleum energy in general, and specifically by a program which results in greater efficiency in space heating. HIP applies to units built and occupied prior to January 1, 1977 in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. Eligible units include principal residences, either rented or owned, and houses or apartment buildings of three stories or less. Mobile homes and hostels are also eligible units. A grant is provided for on either the cost of materials up to $350 or one-third of the total insulation cost of materials and labour to a maximum of $500.

As a further indication of federal assistance, particularly to Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia, the grant was made non-taxable. Eligible items under the program include insulation materials, weather stripping caulking and the insulation of storm windows and storm doors. Applicants go through a pre-application process to obtain approval for proposed work prior to having the work undertaken.

As of June 1, 1981 over 70 per cent of eligible units in Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia have participated in the program, with a resulting expenditure of almost $74 million. A recent re-evaluation of HIP in Nova Scotia indicated that 60 per cent of the participants experienced an average of 9 per cent decrease in their fuel consumption. This decrease varies significantly with work done. Of those insulating walls, for example, over 39 per cent experienced more than a 20 per cent decrease in fuel consumption, whereas of those installing storm doors and/or windows only 3 per cent enjoyed more than a 20 per cent decrease in fuel consumption. In Prince Edward Island the provincial government has calculated that the use of heating oil in that province has declined by 25 per cent since 1976, primarily due to the use of HIP as well as an increase in the use of wood energy sources and the installation of temperature set-back devices.

HIP was initially intended to end as of December 31, 1981. In view of the high participation rate in the program, the scheduled end date will be proceeding as planned. However, the government is examining the feasibility of extending after December 31, 1981 the Canadian Home Insulation Program,

[Senator Frith.]

CHIP. CHIP applies in the rest of the country and to those residents of Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia who would be eligible under CHIP and have not participated in HIP.

I would like to say a word about the linkage of this bill to the appropriation bill which, as far as we are concerned, is the main reason we are here tonight. It was first included in supplementary estimates (D), 1976-77. The program covered the provinces of Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia, and provided for assistance to owners of residences to upgrade the insulation in their residences to help offset the high cost of electricity for heating. Most electricity in those two provinces is produced by oil-fuelled generators. The item that we are asking for will provide for payments out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund for this program for the balance of 1981-82—that is, that portion of the main estimates not provided for in supplementary estimates (B), 1981-82, which covered interim supply for the three months, April 1 to June 30.

Finally, I would like to make a few comments on some aspects of this legislation. Although the program was introduced in 1977, I believe it is now under review. In fact, the program only applies to houses built prior to 1961, but the plan is to have both HIP and CHIP go forward to 1977, once the government is satisfied that the pre-1961 homes have been adequately dealt with. The review procedures which are planned are the evaluation of the impact on householders, construction companies, the distribution system, the delivery system and so on, what items should be included in rentals and so on, and then the unpleasant aspects of certain chemicals used under the program.

With regard to the problem of usage of these chemicals, three initiatives are underway. A national testing survey is being conducted. A board of review is being established to hear submissions from all persons concerned, including contractors, home owners and so on. Then the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has indicated that when those reviews are completed he will come forward with a more detailed plan than the general plan which he announced in an attempt to find a way to solve that problematic aspect of this program.

Honourable senators, in summary, I have outlined the general background, the linkage to the appropriation bill and, perhaps, anticipated the answers to certain questions with regard to the two programs. I believe that some of these comments will apply equally to the other bill and will perhaps save me causing the contagion of that yawning syndrome.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, perhaps I am not used to sitting in the evening in this place, because I am a bit confused. As I understand it, Bill C-75 applies to provinces other than the provinces of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. Am I right?

Senator Frith: Yes. Bill C-75 deals with the Canadian Home Insulation Program.

Senator Thériault: It is my impression that the deputy leader was not talking to this bill but to the bill dealing with the program in Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia. Clause 2 of the bill reads:

(2) No payment shall be made to a person under this Act unless

(a) the person applies for the payment during the period from September 1, 1977 to December 31, 1987; and

(b) the property in respect of which the payment is applied for is situated in Newfoundland, New Brunswick, Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, British Columbia, the Yukon Territory or the Northwest Territories.

In fact, this bill does not deal with the special legislation for Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, but with the other provinces.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I was speaking to both programs, but Senator Thériault is quite right: HIP applies only to Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island; and CHIP applies to the other provinces. I was hoping that the comments I made would apply to both bills. Perhaps I should have picked up the bill as it came out of the House of Commons and read it as I ran along the corridor. I was hoping that my comments could apply to both CHIP and HIP. Bill C-75, according to its provisions, as pointed out by Senator Thériault, is an act respecting a home insulation program for certain provinces in Canada.

Senator Thériault: Does HIP apply to all the provinces and CHIP to Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island.

Senator Frith: HIP applies to Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, and CHIP applies to Newfoundland, New Brunswick, Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, British Columbia, the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories.

Senator Thériault: What does HIP stand for?

Senator Frith: HIP is the original program. It stands for Home Insulation Program, and CHIP stands for Canadian Home Insulation Program.

Senator Thériault: This bill refers to CHIP.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I think everyone is totally confused as to the differences between HIP and CHIP, so perhaps we can now proceed with second reading.

I am glad that the deputy leader mentioned the bill which is yet to come to us, because immediately one would notice that this bill does not apply to Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. He has explained that.

Subclause 3(2) states:

No payment shall be made to a person under this Act unless

(a) the person applies for the payment during the period from September 1, 1977 to December 31, 1987;

I assume this program has been in effect since September 1, 1977; otherwise, this clause would be unnecessary.

This is a rather popular program. Clause 7 states that the Canadian Home Insulation Regulations shall be deemed to be in effect from July 1, 1981. Many people have insulated their homes in order to cut down on the cost of heating fuel, and this is particularly so in Nova Scotia. The cost of heating homes with oil has become so expensive that many people have made use of this program in order to cut down that expense. Insulation has been particularly effective in older homes.

You may wonder why, in a place like Cape Breton which has vast resources of coal, that it is not the most popular heating fuel. One reason, of course, is that it is cleaner and easier to burn oil than coal, and another is that coal has become so expensive that there is little difference between the cost of heating a home by coal as opposed to heating a home by oil.

There are a certain number of people who try to heat their homes by using wood as a fuel. Many years ago I stayed in a home where wood was the main source of heat, and I must say it is not an easy task especially when it is attempted by those who are not accustomed to heating their homes in that way.

If I remember correctly, a few years ago, a certain gentleman who worked for a radio station in Toronto went to live in the northern part of Cape Breton. He was going to go back to nature. Where he resided, an oil truck came around three times a week, but he was determined to use wood as his main heating fuel. He cut down a lot of wood, which he assumed would be his winter's supply. It lasted for three weeks, so he took off back to Toronto.

I think both bills have been adequately explained and, as I mentioned before, they have been studied. These bills will have the effect of regularizing the situation, and I think they should receive second and third reading without further delay.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

HOME INSULATION (N.S. AND P.E.I.) PROGRAM BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-76, respecting a home insulation program for certain maritime provinces in Canada.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), that this bill be read the second time now.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I only wish to say this is truly HIP. This bill applies only to the maritime provinces of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. I apologize to Senator Thériault and other senators if I confused them by giving them more detail than they wanted on HIP and CHIP. I think the remarks I made respecting Bill C-75 apply equally to Bill C-76 and, therefore, I move second reading of this bill.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I am not a resident of Nova Scotia or of Prince Edward Island. If I were, I would take objection to the titles of these bills. To me, this again reflects the thinking of bureaucrats in this city who draft bills. One program is called the Home Insulation Program and the other program is called the Canadian Home Insulation Program. I resent the fact that homes in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island are not called "Canadian homes". It seems to me that any so-called expert engaged in drafting titles of bills should be reminded that those maritime provinces are part of Canada.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, on behalf of the bureaucrats, I do not think they should be blamed. It is the use of these acronyms that has caused the problem. The title of Bill C-76 is "An Act respecting a home insulation program for certain Maritime provinces in Canada." I emphasize the words "in Canada."

I agree with Senator Thériault that it is unfortunate that we too often use acronyms like CHIP and HIP, and leave the impression that one is Canadian and one is not. I do not think the bureaucrats should be blamed for that.

• (2200)

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, why are there two bills, Bill C-75 and Bill C-76, when they seem to cover the same matter?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, it is a matter of chronological sequence that the original program applied only to the maritime provinces, and then it worked well there so they added it for the others. As I mentioned in my comments on both bills, the intention is to finish the maritime section at the end of the year and then have the whole program operate under the second bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Frith: With leave of the Senate, now.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Monday next, July 6, 1981, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable W. R. McIntyre, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Deputy Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy of his Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act respecting a home insulation program for certain provinces in Canada.

An Act respecting a home insulation program for certain Maritime provinces in Canada.

An Act respecting oil conservation and the substitution for oil of other energy sources.

An Act to amend the Department of Labour Act.

An Act to provide for the prohibition of certain international air services.

An Act to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act.

An Act to amend the Currency and Exchange Act.

An Act to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act and the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act in respect of the early retirement of air traffic controllers.

An Act respecting the relocation of government agencies.

Mr. Lloyd Francis, Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons, then addressed the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General as follows:

May it please Your Honour:

The Commons of Canada have voted certain supplies required to enable the Government to defray the expenses of the public service.

In the name of the Commons, I present to Your Honour the following bill:

An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March 1982.

To which bill I humbly request Your Honour's assent.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give Royal Assent to the said bill.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, July 6, 1981, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Monday, July 6, 1981

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

NEW SENATOR

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that the Clerk has received certificate from the Registrar General of Canada showing that Peter Alan Stollery, Esquire, has been summoned to the Senate.

NEW SENATOR INTRODUCED

The Hon. the Speaker having informed the Senate that there was a senator without, waiting to be introduced:

The following honourable senator was introduced; presented Her Majesty's writ of summons, which was read by the Clerk Assistant; took the legally prescribed oath, which was administered by the Clerk, and was seated:

Hon. Peter Alan Stollery, of Toronto, Ontario, introduced between Hon. Raymond J. Perrault, P.C. and Hon. Keith Davey.

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the honourable senator named above had made and subscribed the declaration of qualification required by the British North America Act, 1867, in the presence of the Clerk of the Senate, the Commissioner appointed to receive and witness the said declaration.

THE HONOURABLE NORMAN MCLEOD PATERSON

TRIBUTES ON RESIGNATION FROM SENATE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this evening I should like to pay tribute to a distinguished former colleague of ours, the Honourable Norman McLeod Paterson, who has resigned from the Senate.

Senator Paterson has always given his utmost to the Canadian people. As honourable senators may perhaps know, Senator Paterson, prior to coming to office, was a grain merchant and shipowner. He also held various offices, such as Chancellor of Lakehead University, and at one time he was President of the Victorian Order of Nurses and President of the Canadian Club. He served, of course, all of Ontario, but Senator Paterson's chosen Senate designation was Thunder Bay, an area that he served with great enthusiasm and integrity. Conscientiously, he made himself available to the citizens of his province and all other areas in this country, and was always certain to voice ably and effectively those needs brought to his attention.

On February 9, 1940, Senator Paterson was appointed to the Senate. His attendance set an excellent example for all of us. He was always available to vote on the issues that came before the chamber; he offered his expertise in grain sales and the shipping of grain, and those of us who enjoyed the privilege of working with him agree with the assessment of him in an article written about him—"fabulous in every respect."

Now well over ninety years of age, Senator Paterson knows the benefits of physical fitness. He was an active proponent of, and participant in, physical fitness long before it achieved its present wide popularity.

Although the duties of a senator are numerous, Senator Paterson found the time to participate in various other endeavours. His philanthropies were numerous and varied. He was generous in his efforts on behalf of sick children and assisted financially the Eastern Ontario Children's Hospital and other hospitals in Canada. He did a great deal to assist several universities, including Carleton University, and was active in improving relations among the ethnic and religious communities of Canada. He was very generous to the churches, both his own and those representing differing beliefs.

In 1975, the members of the Jewish community gathered to honour Senator Paterson, and high tribute was paid to him by the Chief Justice of Canada, the Right Honourable Bora Laskin.

Together with other honourable senators, it is a great pleasure and privilege for me to pay tribute to Senator Paterson for giving Canada more than four decades of great service in Parliament. We wish him the very best in his future years.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Paterson's contributions to the welfare of our country have been many, varied and significant. Certainly his entrepreneurial achievements have earned him a place among the great builders of this nation. The grain and shipping industries, in particular, have long benefited from his insight, vision and spirit of adventure.

His business acumen permitted him to amass an outstanding fortune, but his concern for the well-being of his fellow man moved him to distribute a significant part of that wealth in support of worthy humanitarian causes.

The Senate loses to retirement, after 41 years of great service, a noble human being, a man of wise counsel, a truly remarkable Canadian who did honour to our institution.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, as one of the more senior members of the Senate, in age and perhaps in years of service, it would be appropriate if I said something about Senator Paterson, who is certainly rich in years. He is about to mark his ninety-eighth birthday. That is indeed a venerable age.

Senator Paterson spent 41 years in this house. In the early days, when I first came here, he was an active member of what is now the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, which at that time was, and happily still is, under the chairmanship of Senator Paterson's almost lifelong roommate, Senator Hayden.

● (2010)

Senator Paterson's philanthropy has already been referred to. Certainly, the city of Ottawa is tremendously indebted to him for the help he has given Carleton University on numerous occasions. Indeed, a building at the university has been named in his honour. He has been most charitable also in many other eleemosynary areas—for example, in connection with hospitals and, as has been said, the handicapped.

I remember very well, when I first came here, his friendship with Senator Lambert. Senator Lambert used to talk about the tremendous work this man did in the field of inland shipping on the Great Lakes; and he has, of course, been active in that field, in the grain trade, and in many of the other trades plied on the Great Lakes.

In his earlier days, too, Senator Paterson made interesting speeches in the Senate on the wildlife of Canada. Perhaps some of the older senators—well, let me put that another way. Perhaps some of the more senior senators, such as Senator Hayden and Senator Flynn—

Senator Flynn: Me?

Senator Connolly: Oh, yes, you are. Such more senior senators will remember the speeches he used to make about the Canada geese, the efforts that were being made to preserve them and his participation in that movement.

Honourable senators will also recall that when Senator Paterson spoke about the lamprey problem in the Great Lakes he was most informative. There was another colleague in the Senate at that time—and Senator Paterson will remember him very well—Senator Tom Reid from British Columbia, who took a great interest in wildlife, his specialty being the salmon in the Fraser River. Those were days we do not see repeated here very often. These men took a great interest in some of the natural resources of this country, and all too seldom do we have occasion to consider them.

Senator Paterson, personally, was a most delightful companion. I remember, not too many years ago, when Lakehead University decided to confer upon him an honorary degree. The convocation was held, at about this time of year, on the lawn of Senator Paterson's home. It was one of the most delightfully informal functions I had ever attended, particularly because of the very homey speech Senator Paterson made about his early days at the Lakehead—Port Arthur and Fort William.

He was a great friend of C. D. Howe's and of another generation of senators, another generation of men and women in public life in the federal Parliament, of whom there are very few left. Senator Paterson occupies a particular niche in the esteem and affection of the members of this chamber.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, it may seem peculiar for such a newcomer to this chamber as myself to join in this commendation of Senator Paterson, but for many years I was a fishing companion of his son-in-law, Paul McFarlane. We used to go trout fishing in northern Quebec, and McFarlane used to tell me how keen his father-in-law was to get him out fishing, and how he always felt that he had a great responsibility towards this much older man. Paul McFarlane was my age, or two or three years younger—that is to say, he would be in his sixties now—and it was becoming more and more of a chore for him to supervise Senator Paterson's fishing interests.

Eight or ten years ago, Paul McFarlane died of a heart attack and his father-in-law continued fishing for several years after that. It was because of the interest I had in his son-in-law that I especially wished to meet and talk with him in this chamber.

I am sorry that I did not know him when he was in his seventies or even his early eighties—he was in his eighties when I first came to this chamber—but I am sure that everything Senator Connolly has so elegantly stated is correct. He is a man who has given the quality of leadership to the affairs of his country in business, politics and public life. He is a man whom we, as members of this chamber, ought to be proud to count among our associates.

I regret that he was not able to stay until he reached the age of 100 years. He might have had a portrait, as some other hundred-year-old senators have, in the corridors adjacent to this chamber. He is a great Canadian.

ANIMAL DISEASE AND PROTECTION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-70, to amend the Animal Disease and Protection Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), that this bill be read the second time later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT ASSOCIATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-71, to amend the International Development Association Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), that this bill be read the second time later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT (FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS) ASSISTANCE BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-74, to authorize financial assistance to be provided to certain international financial institutions.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), that this bill be read the second time later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I do not desire in the least to delay anything in this chamber, but I think it would be helpful if we could see these bills before we are asked to consider them. I know that time is running short. We are up against the same problem we have had here historically at the end of a session of putting legislation through in a rush. I am wondering how many of these bills we are going to be asked to consider before we even have a chance of seeing them.

● (2020)

Hon. Martial Asselin: We will be rubber-stamping as usual.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I understand the point raised by Senator Molson. I ought to have explained that the bills you are being asked to consider this evening are five in number, and they comprise the remainder of the eight bills that came about as a result of the ruling of the Speaker of the House of Commons.

Honourable senators will recall that Mr. Andre, a member of the opposition in the other place, objected to eight particular features in the estimates which he suggested ought to have been the subject of legislation rather than appearing in the estimates. He said that having them in the estimates was an attempt to have done by way of the estimates something that requires legislative action. The Speaker ruled that he was correct.

Last Tuesday we passed three of the eight bills. The bills you are being asked to consider tonight are the remaining five. In that sense they are all of the same character, being legislation suggested as necessary by the opposition, and that suggestion being accepted by the government. That is why they have come to us in this series.

Senator Molson: I can only say that while I am now satisfied with that explanation, I did feel we should have been given it.

Senator Frith: I agree.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I think the deputy leader might have added that the government is not pressing to have second reading of those bills tonight. The idea is simply to give the sponsors of the bills the opportunity of explaining them tonight. The debates can be adjourned until tomorrow.

Senator Frith: I agree with that as well. The intention is simply to have them launched on second reading tonight so that the sponsors can speak on them tonight. The debates can then be adjourned and the bills dealt with tomorrow and later in the week as necessary.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ATLANTIC REGION FREIGHT ASSISTANCE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-73, to amend the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), that this bill be read the second time later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.
Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-72, to amend the National Housing Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), that this bill be read the second time later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.
Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

POST OFFICE

DISRUPTION OF SERVICE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in connection with the strike of postal workers which, if I am not mistaken, is in its seventh day. I should like the Leader of the Government to tell us more particularly whether negotiations have resumed, whether there has been some progress and, if not, whether it is still the government's intention not to introduce back to work legislation.

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with respect to the postal dispute, I have nothing new to report. However, I shall endeavour to bring an updated report to the Senate tomorrow afternoon.

● (2030)

Senator Flynn: I think it is most important that the Canadian public know the government's definite stand on this problem which is becoming more serious every day. I think the Leader of the Government will admit that many people are losing a lot of money and are suffering many problems as a result of this situation.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the government's position has been stated. As I say, there has been no change in that situation during recent days. In my absence, Senator Frith made a statement to the Senate on the subject.

However, I agree with the Leader of the Opposition that this is a very important matter, and for that reason a statement will be presented to the Senate tomorrow.

Senator Flynn: It is almost a week since Senator Frith made that statement; that was on Tuesday last, the day the strike started.

Hon. Lowell Murray: By way of a supplementary question, when the Leader of the Government in the Senate speaks of the government's position, is he referring to the statements made by the Prime Minister to the effect that there will not be legislation on this matter? Will the minister say that the government has excluded the possibility of legislation on this matter?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the most recent statements regarding this important matter, indeed, this vexatious matter for many Canadians, were those made by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister and the President of the Treasury Board, Mr. Johnston. That is the most recent information which is available.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Does that mean that the government has made up its mind that it will not intervene in any way in this dispute at the present time?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, at the present time that is the position of the government.

Senator Roblin: Has no consideration been given to appointing an arbitrator who will deal with this matter expeditiously?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, a number of options are under consideration, but no announcement can be made at this time. Of course, the government cannot remain complacent in the face of the facts and is not remaining complacent.

An orderly postal service is of importance to all Canadians, those in business and those in private life, and the government is taking its responsibility very seriously.

Senator Roblin: The minister was good enough to say that he would mention this matter to the house tomorrow. Does that mean he will give us a statement as to what the government's position is, or does it simply mean that he will say he is unable to report further?

Senator Perrault: I can only hope to present to the Senate tomorrow the most recent body of information available at that time.

If there are developments in the next few hours—and we would all hope for constructive developments, of course—appropriate information will be brought to the Senate. The postal dispute is an important matter, one deserving a further statement with respect to the government's position, and that will be presented tomorrow.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: As a supplementary question, is the adjective "vexatious" the best one the Leader of the Government can find to describe the situation?

Senator Perrault: I know the honourable senator is a master "wordsmith," and he may think of other words to describe the present postal situation. In my view, the word "vexatious" is only one of the adjectives which could be applied to the present situation. Certainly, as well, it represents an inconvenience. I will rush to my thesaurus this evening to see whether I can find words which more adequately describe the situation. I know the honourable senator will do the same.

Senator Donahoe: Does the adjective "vexatious" not impute triviality?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Not at all.

Senator Perrault: I would suggest that the honourable senator look into the meaning of the word "vexatious." I am sure it has a far wider-reaching application than that.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, concerning the postal labour dispute does the government intend to take the same stand as it did with the CBC journalists and for many months let the situation deteriorate without any attempt at a settlement?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, in any labour dispute there are the rights and responsibilities of the workers and there are the rights and responsibilities of management, and in a matter such as the postal dispute in the public sector there is a clear and important responsibility to the people of Canada who are, after all, the ultimate employers—they pay the bills. The government must be responsible to them, as well, for any action it takes.

Hon. G. I. Smith: What action?

Senator Asselin: You just said you would take no action.

Senator Perrault: That was not said at all.

Senator Asselin: You just said that you would not intervene.

Senator Perrault: I did not state that the government would take no action. In recent months, few matters have occupied so much energy, attention and study as has the postal situation. I must suggest that, when the Conservatives formed the government in 1979—

Senator Murray: They got an agreement.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Perrault: They don't want to talk about that. It was rather evident that they had many difficulties in resolving all of the conflicts, the disagreements and the differences of opinion involved in the operations of the Post Office. The official opposition has agreed that moving towards crown corporation status for the Post Office is a constructive move. But answers have not been found easily, either by this government or the preceding government.

Honourable senators, the postal dispute is not regarded as a trivial one by this government. It is hoped that a good, fair and just settlement can be achieved as quickly as possible—

Senator Smith: Good for whom?

Senator Perrault:—bearing in mind that the federal government has a clear responsibility, as I said earlier, to ensure that settlements are reasonable and fair, both to the taxpayer and to the worker.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Once again, when he feels cornered or when he is caught unprepared, Senator Perrault blames the Official Opposition. It will be the fault of the Official Opposition if there is no settlement. When we ask whether the government plans to accept its responsibilities and he replies that the government does not intend to introduce legislation, does he mean that the government does not plan on introducing back to work legislation this week? If such is the case, can Parliament adjourn without introducing legislation to settle the postal dispute?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Of course, the honourable senator is aware, because of his experience in cabinet, that we are not going to anticipate this evening decisions which may or may not be taken in cabinet over the next few days. The results of confidential cabinet proceedings are not shared on an ad hoc basis with the members of the Senate or of the House of Commons. Announcements and decisions, if any, will be made in due time.

The dispute is a difficult one. Perhaps the honourable senator is suggesting that the demands of the postal workers be met in their entirety and that the government concede on every point.

Senator Smith: Nobody said that.

Senator Perrault: If that is the approach suggested by the Conservatives, of course, it will also be studied.

All across the country today many wage settlements are taking place at twice the level of two years ago. That is also of concern to those involved in the fight against inflation and rising costs in our society. It is also of concern to those involved in maintaining the competitive position of this country.

Is the honourable senator suggesting that the report of the arbitrator be accepted in its entirety and in some unquestioning fashion by the government? It would be interesting to have the honourable senator's ideas.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Is it not true that the minister spoke too soon? Is it not true that the government can pass legislation to bring the postal workers back to work in case of an emergency? Is it not true that the minister went too far in saying that there would be no legislation? The minister should have replied that if the dispute cannot be settled except by legislation, the government will take its responsibilities and introduce such legislation. Is that not a decision that the government could make?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, down through the years the process of free collective bargaining has helped to achieve a remarkable standard of living for Canadians. I remind honourable senators that Parliament gave the postal workers the right to strike some time ago—as I recall, with the support of the members of the Conservative Party and those of the New Democratic Party. Should Parliament, then, intervene as soon as a labour dispute ensues, to, in effect, remove that right?

Senator Murray: You did it after two days the last time.

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator may wish to make a speech, and that, of course, is his right, but I am on my feet at the present time.

Senator Smith: Oh, so you are.

Senator Perrault: None extraordinary circumstances exist, is the best solution to be found by using the power of Parliament to order workers back to their jobs? This government would far rather achieve a negotiated settlement with the workers than use the power of Parliament to legislate those workers back to work. It is hoped that justice, reason and common sense will prevail.

Senator Smith: I don't know what you know about that.

● (2040)

Senator Perrault: I ask honourable senators how a unilateral declaration by the government today that we intend to legislate the workers back would prompt them to come to the bargaining table and sit down in a reasonable fashion to negotiate a settlement? Would they come if they were threatened with what they would regard as punitive action by Parliament?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, may I ask a supplementary question of my honourable friend? Would he inquire whether negotiations are now actively proceeding between the government and the Post Office? Are they meeting at the present time? Have they met today?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that information will be provided tomorrow in the Senate—

Senator Asselin: You don't know.

Senator Perrault: —and will be shared with honourable senators.

Senator Asselin: You don't know.

Senator Roblin: I have the impression that the government has been rather dilatory in approaching the bargaining table.

Senator Donahoe: It has been a hot day!

Senator Roblin: I find it hard to reconcile the minister's concern about this collective bargaining process if he is not actively working at it.

Senator Donahoe: He doesn't know.

Senator Olson: That is a wrong assessment.

Senator Perrault: I had hoped that the national interest would encourage the official opposition in Parliament to be more constructive in their attitude toward a dispute which affects the entire country.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Donahoe: We are for the people.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators with experience in government know the onerous responsibilities that rest upon governments in a situation of this kind.

Senator Smith: We wish they would take them.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators are aware of the fact that restraint is necessary at this time, but the government accepts its responsibilities to assure that the postal services are not permanently disrupted.

Senator Roblin: Why are you not meeting with them now in that case?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Because they won't meet.

Senator Roblin: They won't dance?

Senator Frith: They won't meet. It takes two to tango. They are invited.

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, is it not a fact that the government has repeatedly, through the President of the Treasury Board, requested Mr. Parrot and his associates to sit down with them over the past few days, and that they have refused, repeatedly, to sit down with them?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, there have been no negotiations for approximately 10 days now.

An Hon. Senator: Terrible!

Senator Perrault: That is the situation which presently exists.

Senator Flynn: Why didn't you say so?

Senator Perrault: There is no back-to-work legislation currently under consideration.

Senator Asselin: You mean for this week?

Senator Perrault: The Treasury Board and the government are concerned about the situation, as are the members of the official opposition and other political parties in this country. The Prime Minister said in the House of Commons this afternoon that he wants both groups to sit down at the bargaining table. In the view of the government, the biblical admonition to sit down and reason together has great merit. The government is proposing that.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Perrault: I say to the Honourable Senator Flynn and his deputy that we would like those meetings to resume but no overtures have been received from—

Senator Smith: Nor have any been made by the government.

Senator Donahoe: Do we have to wait for that?

Senator Perrault: —the workers' side and there has been no positive response as yet to the statement of the Prime Minister this afternoon. That is the situation as of this moment.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, perhaps I may change the perspective for a moment. In view of the fact that the government is not planning legislation to force the postal employees back to work, what are the plans for adjournment.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that is a matter very much in the hands of the official opposition.

Senator Flynn: Wait a minute.

Senator Asselin: Not again. Not again.

Senator Perrault: This has always been the case because of our reverence for democracy. As far as the postal situation is concerned, I hope to provide honourable senators tomorrow afternoon with updated information.

Senator Flynn: What bills does the government require passage of before adjournment?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, a number of bills have been introduced this evening.

Senator Flynn: All of them? Do you want them all passed?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, we are confident of the co-operation of the Leader of the Opposition and his followers in this chamber, and—

Senator Asselin: Rubber-stamp again.

Senator Perrault: —we would be pleased to confer with the Leader of the Opposition tomorrow to discuss the details of his inquiry.

Senator Smith: Why not tonight?

Hon. Daniel Riley: Honourable senators, I have listened with great interest to what has been said this evening, particularly the questions of the opposition, and I agree wholeheartedly with them. I was in town on Friday and I received a hand-delivered letter from the President of the Treasury Board—I do not think it was marked "Personal and Confidential"—outlining exactly what is happening between the CUPW and the Treasury Board with respect to their negotiations, and the fact that there were no negotiations going on now. What I cannot understand is why these letters were delivered by hand to us in the Liberal Party and not delivered to members of the opposition so that they could be kept up-to-date.

Senator Flynn: Shame!

Senator Asselin: Shame!

Senator Riley: I do not think I am being—Senator Murray: Vexatious?

Senator Riley: —anti-government or anything like that, but every day the President of the Treasury Board or his negotiators should make it known to all honourable senators, and even to Senator Molson who sits in—

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Especially Senator Molson!

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Don't go too far!

Senator Riley: —desolate isolation down there—we should be kept advised of everything that is going on day-by-day. I do not wish to be critical of the Leader of the Government in the Senate, but I wonder why he says that he will provide a report tomorrow. All honourable senators should know what is going on from day-to-day in respect to the postal strike because it is a very critical matter.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I provided a report about the situation as it stands today. I made it very clear that there have been no negotiations for 10 days. I said the Prime Minister expressed the view this afternoon that both groups should sit down at the bargaining table, but there have been no overtures from the side of the workers. I do not know what else honourable senators expect me to report to the chamber other than the facts, and those are the facts.

Senator Roblin: How about that letter?

Senator Perrault: Perhaps, in fact, information was sent to certain members of the opposition parties. I have no knowledge of the extent of the mailing by the President of the Treasury Board.

Senator Asselin: No, no.

Senator Roblin: No.

Senator Perrault: These are the facts as they exist this evening. Hopefully, there will be further developments tomorrow and that information will be brought to the Senate.

Senator Roblin: Those are the facts you haven't got this evening.

Senator Perrault: Quite frankly, I do not know what other information can be provided in the circumstances. Of course, I would like to report a dramatic breakthrough and settlement, and a record number of letters churning through the Post Office, but that is not the situation.

Senator Asselin: There would be no legislation.

Senator Riley: Honourable senators, I have not received my old age pension cheque this month. I say that with my tongue in my cheek.

Senator Flynn: You haven't?

Senator Riley: I am sure the same is true of other senators.

In a critical situation like this, all honourable senators should be made aware of negotiations on an hourly basis, if those negotiations can be divulged. There are certain times when negotiations cannot be divulged, but the letter I received on Friday outlined everything that had gone on. It said there was a deadlock and the government negotiators could not persuade the CUPW to meet with them and outline certain items. That letter that was written by the President of the Treasury Board should be made available to every member of this Senate.

Senator Dohahoe: Right.

Senator Roblin: Don't try and brush it off.

TRANSPORT

NEWFOUNDLAND—LOSS OF ARCTIC EXPLORER—NEED FOR INCREASED SEARCH AND RESCUE CAPABILITY

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government concerning the unfortunate sinking of Arctic Explorer. In view of the fact that this is one of a number of incidents that have happened over the past few years, and in view of the fact that it is very obvious that most of the incidents take place off the coast of Newfoundland, when is the government going to realize the need for the deployment of more capable aircraft in the Newfoundland area so that reaction to these incidents can be much quicker with the resultant saving of more lives than were saved in this recent incident?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, may I provide for the Senate at this time a report respecting Arctic Explorer that has been made available to me.

● (2050)

With regard to the loss of the 165-foot vessel off the north coast of Newfoundland, which departed St. Anthony July 3 at 0530 hours Newfoundland daylight saving time, Arctic Explorer was reported overdue by the owner, Carino Shipping of Halifax, after the vessel missed three communications schedules. The overdue report was received by Search and Rescue Emergency Centre, St. John's, and passed to Rescue Coordination Centre on July 4 at 1016 hours Newfoundland daylight saving time, 28 hours and 46 minutes after the vessel sailed from St. Anthony.

The estimated time of sinking was July 3 at 0815 hours Newfoundland time. The first tasking for the search on July 4 occurred at 1030 hours and an all-ships broadcast was issued by St. Anthony, Comfort Cove and Cartwright Coast Guard radio stations at 1031 hours on July 4.

At 1125 hours Gadus Atlantic was tasked. At 1300 hours two DND rescue helicopters were tasked.

Senator Marshall: How long did it take the helicopters?

Senator Perrault: At 1313 hours—that is, at 1.13 p.m.—CCG Grenfell was tasked. Other search units involved included two DND Buffalo aircraft, one DND Aurora aircraft, CCG Bartlett and CCG Skidegate. The initial search area was from St. Anthony north up the Labrador coast. M/V Arctic Explorer apparently assumed a list and sank within 15 minutes. At this time the reason for the list is not known.

Honourable senators, may I observe, as someone who is familiar with ocean conditions off the west coast, that there are very few emergency rescue units of any kind which can move to save vessels that go down very quickly. I am sure that Senator Marshall is aware of the extremely difficult problems involved in covering substantial areas of ocean in time to effect rescues; and ocean survival times are so short that the task involved in saving human life is extremely difficult.

The vessel was Canadian registered, owned by Carino Shipping, and was on charter to Geophysical Services Inc., which is not a federal government department or agency, for seismic survey work. The vessel was 165 feet long, was built in 1974, and at the time of the disaster it had 32 persons on board. Scientific survey equipment was carried and most of the persons on board were scientific personnel.

DND fixed-wing aircraft sighted two life-rafts south and east of St. Anthony at 0925 hours on July 5. A DND Labrador helicopter investigated the life-rafts and at 1011 hours—11 minutes after 10 in the morning—located 19 survivors in the second raft. Twelve survivors were airlifted to hospital in St. Anthony, and the remaining seven were taken aboard CCG Grenfell.

The weather in the area at the time was: visibility, 15 miles; temperature, 11°C; wind, 040 degrees at 14 knots.

Eight bodies have been located and recovered to this time. On July 6, in the morning, a ninth body was recovered approximately 35 miles east-south-east of St. Anthony.

A preliminary inquiry is underway. Two casualty investigators will interview the survivors on their return to St. John's. Upon receipt of the results of that inquiry it will be decided whether a formal investigation is in order.

Honourable senators, that is all the information I have with respect to the disaster.

Senator Marshall: In the inquiry mentioned by the Leader of the Government, could special note be taken of the fact, regarding the three communications reports received, that there was no communication from the vessel itself? There must be a good reason for that. That is probably one reason why Search and Rescue could not react in the proper time. Will that aspect be included in the inquiry?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it is a reasonable proposal, that the matter of communications be studied by any commission of inquiry.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary. Would the Leader of the Government also undertake, when making his inquiries, to find out how long it took for the fixed-wing aircraft to get from Greenwood to the area of the search, and how long it would have taken fixed-wing aircraft to fly from Gander?

[Senator Perrault.]

I realize, as the Leader of the Government has said, that it is impossible for any sort of rescue operation to arrive in time to take people off a sinking ship. One's life span in cold water, such as in that area, is very limited; so the amount of time taken by a search and rescue plane to arrive is very important for the people involved. It has been suggested many times—not only by politicians but also by people active in that line of work—that fixed-wing aircraft stationed in Gander could very well save a number of lives. I would like to have that information.

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator's comments will most certainly be drawn to the attention of the Minister of Transport and other officials associated with this inquiry. The questions asked by the honourable senator, as well as those posed by Senator Marshall, will be communicated to the appropriate sources and, if possible, preliminary information will be provided.

THE SENATE

APPOINTMENT OF NEW MEMBERS

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government which stems from the summoning to the Senate of our new colleague, Senator Stollery, who was so overwhelmed that he could not stand it for more than five minutes.

May I remind the Leader of the Government that on June 10, in reply to a question by Senator Murray, he said:

—the appointment of outstanding Canadians to this chamber is a priority item, but there are a number of other priority items before Parliament at this time which should be given immediate attention.

Has there been a change in priorities and is the appointment of Senator Stollery in line with the statement made by the Leader of the Government on June 10?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Stollery will at some point make his maiden speech in this chamber, and at that time honourable senators in the opposition will be able to judge whether or not the senator will make a constructive contribution to this place. I am certain that he will; but if honourable senators in the opposition profess to be cynical this evening, I assure them that their concerns will be dispelled very soon. Senator Stollery was an able, effective member in the other place.

Senator Flynn: No, no. I am asking if there has been a change in the priorities of the Prime Minister, because only three weeks ago you said there were priorities other than the appointment of distinguished Canadians to the Senate.

Senator Perrault: The Honourable Senator Flynn may well wish to write a letter to the Right Honourable the Prime Minister and put that question to him personally.

Hon. G. I. Smith: He is asking you.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: You're the one who said it.

Senator Perrault: The government has demonstrated in the past a remarkable ability to manage a number of priorities simultaneously.

Senator Flynn: May I ask the Leader of the Government if the next list of appointments, when we return in the fall, will include Senator Jim Coutts?

FISHERIES

SQUID—ISSUANCE OF LICENCES TO JAPANESE

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question dealing with the granting of licences by the Canadian government to Japan to harvest 17,000 metric tonnes of squid at the expense of Newfoundland fishermen.

We fought for 10 years to have a 200-mile limit to keep foreigners out of our waters. What is the purpose of, and justification for, allowing foreign countries to fish the very stocks that we are trying to preserve for our own fishermen, which will cause so many man-hours of unemployment for Newfoundland fishermen?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that question will be taken as notice.

SHIPPING

CANADIAN MERCHANT MARINE SERVICE

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to respond to a question raised by Senator Donahoe concerning expansion of the Canadian Merchant Marine.

The Minister of Transport and his officials have initiated a round of consultations with industry, including shipping companies, shippers and other interested groups. Those consultations have shown that industry has not, as yet, been able to reach agreement within itself on this issue. Nevertheless, officials are evaluating the various measures that have been suggested to promote the development of a deep-sea fleet.

It is difficult to say at this time when this effort will be completed, but the government is watching international developments closely to ensure that Canada's interests are safeguarded, and that Canada is able to capitalize on any significant opportunities that may arise.

AVIATION SAFETY—COMMISSION OF INQUIRY—REFERENCE OF REPORT TO DEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Honourable Senator Roblin asked a question on June 17 concerning the terms of reference for the Advisory Committee on the Dubin report. The senator requested a copy of the Dubin report.

With respect to the committee membership, the minister wished to have a committee which could advise him on the practicalities of implementing Mr. Dubin's recommendations and to avoid a small scale repeat of the commission of inquiry. Therefore, he sought as members people with practical knowledge of various aspects of civil aviation who were not actively involved in the hearings. Mr. McLeish was included as one of the several members of this committee because he is the minister's principal adviser on civil aeronautics matters and will have to take responsibility for implementing the Dubin recommendations affecting the air administration, in accordance with the minister's direction.

The minister has met with the group representing the aviation community and undertook to meet with them again if his proposed action differs substantially from the Dubin recommendations.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I ask a supplementary question with respect to Mr. Justice Dubin's report and the advisory committee? Does the minister not realize that there is a widespread feeling that some of these appointees are people who have a conflict of interest as between the Dubin report and themselves? Does he not also feel that it would be the better part of discretion to make sure that no such impression remained in the public mind, and that a better choice should be made of people who were not perceived to have a conflict of interest?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, those recommendations will certainly be taken into consideration.

I have other material with respect to the terms of reference for the advisory committee, including some information about the role of the committee, the proposed committee membership, the timing of the committee and the functioning of the committee. If honourable senators would like to have this placed on the record of today's proceedings, I would be very pleased to propose that. Is that agreeable to honourable senators?

Hon. G. I. Smith: I would like to know what excuse there is for this cover-up.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): There is no cover-up.

Senator Perrault: I can certainly read this.

1. Role of the committee: To advise the Minister of Transport regarding action to be taken on the implementation of recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry on Aviation Safety.

The committee will consider departmental and other comments and proposed action on the several phase reports of the Commission of Inquiry, and provide its advice on these matters directly to the minister.

2. Committee membership: The committee will normally consist of two senior officials of Transport Canada augmented by four specialists from outside the federal government as invited by the minister.

Additional members from inside or outside the federal government may be appointed from time to time if required by the specialized nature of the Commission of Inquiry's recommendations.

The committee will be chaired by Mr. T. J. Wilkins, Senior Assistant Deputy Minister, Transport Canada. Other committee members will be:

Mr. W. M. McLeish, Administrator, Canadian Air Transport Administration.

Mr. John R. Baldwin, retired President of Air Canada and Deputy Minister of Transport Canada.

Mr. Bernard M. Deschênes, Q.C., Legal Member, Aircraft Accident Review Board.

Mr. Almer L. Michaud, retired President of West Coast Air Services and Air B.C.

Mr. W. Reid, retired Chief Pilot, Air Canada.

3. Timing of the committee: The committee will be convened as soon as possible after each phase report is made public.

The committee will meet as required thereafter.

4. Functioning: Meetings of the committee will be held in Ottawa, or elsewhere at the discretion of the Chairman. Secretariat and support services will be provided by Policy Advice Coordination, Transport Canada.

That is all the information available at the present time.

Senator Roblin: Does my honourable friend not recognize that it is because of the dissatisfaction of the general public and others with respect to the performance of the officials of the Department of Transport that the Dubin Commission was set up in the first place? That is a fact. Now we are asked to accept the proposition that having appointed Mr. Justice Dubin to look into something because of dissatisfaction with departmental officials, we must refer Mr. Justice Dubin's findings back to the officials of the same department which caused the problem in the first place. That seems to me to be a position that ought to be re-examined as not being in the public interest.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I suppose it is a judgmental matter, but I cannot agree with the views expressed by Senator Roblin. These people, in their own right, are honourable people—

Senator Roblin: Of course they are.

Senator Perrault:—and very able people, who do not have a conflict of interest. Take Mr. Reid, for example, the retired chief pilot of Air Canada. Is Mr. Reid supposed to be in a conflict of interest situation, or Mr. Michaud, the retired president of West Coast Air Services and Air B.C.? Is he in a conflict of interest situation? Of course not.

Senator Roblin: He is not a departmental official.

Senator Perrault: Well, take the administrator of the Canadian Air Transport Administration. These people are not in a conflict of interest position. In any case, the honourable senator's recommendations will be brought to the attention of the appropriate sources.

ENERGY

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD—DECISION RE APPLICATION OF TRANS MOUNTAIN PIPE LINE CO. LTD.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on June 9 Senator Donahoe asked me if I had appealed to the Prime Minister to override the National Energy Board decision authorizing construction by the Trans Mountain Pipe Line Co. Ltd. of a proposed line that would be part of the system transmitting Alaskan crude oil to refineries in northern U.S. states. This was asked in the context of remarks made by myself in 1979 to the effect that the Trans Mountain proposal would be ecologically and environmentally dangerous to western Canada.

I indicated at that time that I had not had an opportunity to study the supporting documentation and took the question as notice. The following information may be found useful in this connection.

Trans Mountain is proposing to build a 718 mile pipeline from a new oil port at Low Point on the Strait of Juan de Fuca along its current right-of-way in British Columbia to Edmonton where it would connect with the Interprovincial Pipeline system. This line would be used to carry up to 500 MB/D of primarily Alaskan crude to U.S. Northern Tier refiners.

The NEB hearings on this application were held in two parts with its initial report being issued in January, 1980. In this report the board concluded that the pipeline was financially and technically feasible and that the overall socio-economic benefits would be favourable.

As a result of the first round of hearings, the board indicated that it would have been prepared to recommend approval of construction of the line had it not been for the lack of evidence concerning the environmental impact on Canada of the proposed new oil port at Low Point.

The board's second report issued June 3, 1981 deals with this aspect of the proposal. It concluded that the port would not expose the Canadian environment to an unacceptable increase in the risk of oil spill damage. Furthermore, it indicated that with the hook-up of the north Puget Sound refineries the risk of spill damage in the inner waters of the sound would decrease.

The NEB indicated that it would be prepared to issue a certificate of public convenience and necessity to Trans Mountain, thereby allowing construction of the pipeline to proceed upon successful completion of U.S. regulatory processes. It also required Trans Mountain to meet a number of conditions before it commences construction of the line, including the filing of evidence demonstrating that the port and pipeline facilities will "... be used to supply in whole or in part the crude oil requirements of the refineries at Ferndale, Anacortes and Cherry Point in the State of Washington".

As in all such cases, this NEB recommendation must be approved by the Governor-in-Council. As well, in light of the considerable interest of other departments in this subject, their views on the NEB decision are being canvassed and will be included in the submission to cabinet.

NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AND GOVERNMENT OF ALBERTA

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have one final fairly short reply.

On June 11 the Honourable Senator Roblin asked if the Imperial Oil Co. Ltd. had asked the federal government for funds—and he used the words “an additional gift”—over and above the $40 million it was—again to quote his word—“given” last year. The senator also asked if there was any possibility of recouping that $40 million should the project proceed at the end of June.

In November of 1980, the federal government offered Esso Resources a loan, not a gift—and I am surprised that Senator Roblin would use that word “gift”—of $40 million to keep its Cold Lake project in a state of readiness while awaiting final approval by the province of Alberta.

This was done as the project sponsor had spent in excess of $120 million to advance this heavy oil project and the federal government did not wish to risk losing the skilled team of over 500 professional managers and engineers who had been assembled.

I am pleased to note that a spokesperson for Jack Armstrong, President of Imperial Oil, has announced that its subsidiary, Esso Resources, has dropped threats to immediately abandon its Cold Lake project as the company has been encouraged by the significant progress being made in the pricing negotiations between Ottawa and Alberta.

● (2110)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I certainly hope their optimism is well placed. However, I rise to ask my honourable friend whether he would be kind enough to provide me with the terms and conditions of the loan to which he refers.

Senator Perrault: The question will be taken as notice.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

CANADA-FRANCE RELATIONS—ALLEGED STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF JUSTICE

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, last May, on the 26th, to be exact, I directed a question to the Leader of the Government concerning the statement made by the Minister of Justice with respect to the relations between Canada and France.

The Minister of Justice had said in Montreal prior to that date that he hoped the French government would mind its own business and refrain from putting its nose in Canadian affairs. The Leader of the Government replied that he would inquire, that he would give me an answer later, and that he would tell me whether this was a ministerial statement made by the Minister of Justice. I have not had a reply yet. Could he make an effort and try to give me that reply?

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, an inquiry has gone forward. I can report that there appears to be no tape recording or transcript of the remarks alleged to have been made by the minister. I understand that it was a personal statement, and there is no transcript. A transcript was sought, but there is none.

EXCISE TAX ACT

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, June 30, 1981, the debate on the motion of Senator Barrow for the second reading of Bill C-57, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I wish to begin by asking the indulgence of the Senate in allowing me to extend a word of personal welcome to our new colleague, Senator Stollery, although, as the Leader of the Opposition pointed out earlier, our new colleague found it necessary to flee the chamber rather early in our proceedings this evening.

I have had the pleasure of serving with him on the Special Joint Committee on Official Languages. I am happy that his parliamentary experience and his interest in national unity will be of service to this chamber and will continue to be of service to the country. I wish him an experience that is happy and satisfying in every way.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: If I may, I would like to remind honourable senators that many of us, on the day we were sworn in, had friends in the gallery waiting for us to return outside so that they could shake our hands.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Oh, certainly, we all know that.

Senator Guay: I should like to say to the honourable senator who mentioned that Senator Stollery was here for only a few moments that he was here for quite a while, and he subsequently went out to meet his friends, which I would have done—and have done—in my time.

Hon. G. I. Smith: The honourable senator can make his own excuses when he comes back.

Senator Flynn: Mind your own business.

Senator Murray: I accept la mise au point de la part de notre collègue, le sénateur Guay.

Senator Guay: You probably did the same thing when you were sworn in.

Senator Murray: I rather think not, but I do not wish to detract at all from the moment. My comments were not intended in any way to lessen the congratulations and good wishes that I wanted to offer to our new colleague.

In any case, I cannot resist observing that there remain 11 vacancies in this chamber, and that if the Right Honourable the Prime Minister wants to fill those vacancies in the way he filled this one—by going to the other place for nominees—that will create 11 by-elections, which will be quite an interesting event at this particular time in our history.

To come to the bill that is before us, I wish that it were not necessary to make the speech that I have to make, which is by way of a protest of the fact that Bill C-57 is going through—as will Bill C-48, no doubt, with the support of the government majority, and as will the draft Energy Security Bill of Mr. Lalonde, each of these measures dealing with various pieces of the National Energy Program—without the Senate's having had the opportunity to study the National Energy Program as a whole. It would not be necessary for me to make this protest if the government would submit the National Energy Program to the kind of scrutiny that I believe it can be given by a Senate committee.

Bill C-57 proposes two new energy-related taxes that are contained in the Lalonde-MacEachen budget. Bill C-48, the so-called Canada Oil and Gas Act which will come to us eventually, deals with what are called the Canada Lands. I expect that it will appear before us substantially unchanged, notwithstanding the protests of the aboriginal peoples, the protests of the Catholic hierarchy, and the protests of the opposition parties.

This is a government which, on the admission of the Minister of State for Economic Development himself, is not really prepared to listen to recommendations for any serious changes in that bill. The draft Energy Security Act which Mr. Lalonde brought in the other day provides for the Petroleum Incentives Program, which the government would argue is the balance or the counterweight to the tax measures that are contained in the other bills.

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce can, and I am sure will, deal with each bill on its merits. However, dealing with each of those bills separately does not add up to a coherent, rational study of the National Energy Program as a whole, and it is nonsense to suggest that it does.

There has been and still is a great deal of controversy with regard to the effect of the National Energy Program upon exploration and development. There has been considerable controversy about Mr. Lalonde's supply and demand projections, which are really at the core of the National Energy Program. The government's calculations are disputed by the industry, by the producing provinces, by many experts, and most recently by the C. D. Howe Institute in a study entitled,

[Senator Murray.]

"Canada's Energy Policy Debate." I quote a short paragraph from page 40 of that study:

On balance, the NEP appears to increase the vulnerability of Canadians to supply disruptions, particularly in the mid-1980s, when vulnerability will increase anyway. But the question of whether Canadians face greater risks of shortages and gasoline rationing by then as a direct result of the NEP must be raised. This possibility, which is clearly seen by Canadians in the oil and gas industry and elsewhere, is a source of major frustration because energy policy is viewed as an instrument that, if it had not made choices that endanger supply, could have fueled a boom that would make Canada a net oil exporter. While this point, expressed by western Canadians and the oil industry, may be self-serving, it is not necessarily incorrect. A major factor in this dispute is the way the NEP uses oil prices to achieve its goals.

Where are those issues to be addressed? Quite frankly and with great respect, I do not believe that the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, in the course of its study of Bill C-57, has had or will have an opportunity to address those issues in the context of the overall National Energy Program.

The bill that is before us is complicated enough, as are the bills that are to come. The time that the committee has is already too short. The government wants Bill C-57 passed before we rise for the summer. I suggest that the committee will not have a chance to address those larger issues.

There is a great deal of controversy about the effect of the National Energy Program on our economy and on confidence in our economy. We have had it recently, on the word of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, that one of his advisers told him before the policy was introduced that the National Energy Program would strengthen the Canadian dollar. Well, some of us would like to meet that adviser. In any case, if the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources believed the advice, he is a great deal more gullible than we would have thought.

Energy, which is one of Canada's greatest assets, is weakening the Canadian dollar instead of strengthening it. The reason is that energy policy has been mismanaged by this government to the dismay and astonishment of the international community. Due to an energy policy that is weakening the Canadian dollar instead of strengthening it, we have to prop up the Canadian dollar with higher interest rates than are otherwise warranted. Just last week there was an announcement that the government had arranged an additional $1 billion U.S. as some kind of stand-by credit to add to its reserves to fight any run on the Canadian dollar. To me, it seems rather humiliating for a country with our potential, particularly an energy-rich country, to be fearing a run on the Canadian dollar. Yet that is the situation to which the government's policies have led us.

Not too long ago there was a headline in the Financial Post entitled "OECD puts Canada in the dock." The article, which was from Paris, pointed out that not only the United States but the European countries as well are protesting in the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, the OECD, energy policies on the part of the Government of Canada which they regard as breaching agreements and commitments that Canada has made to the international community, policies which they regard as being illiberal, discriminatory and narrowly nationalistic.

In April some of us who are members of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs went to Washington to continue our consideration of trade relations with the United States. It is well known that in the earlier reports of that committee members of the committee were well disposed to a free-trade arrangement with the United States.

Hon. Peter Bosa: If I may say so, I think the honourable senator is jumping to conclusions. The honourable members of that committee were only studying the issue. It would be jumping to conclusions to say that they were disposed to going into free trade.

Senator Murray: I was speaking of the earlier reports of that committee put out several years ago. I think it would be hard to draw any other conclusion or inference from the earlier reports of that committee than that a majority of that committee is well disposed, or was well disposed, to some kind of free-trade arrangement with the United States. But I will let Senator Bosa draw his own conclusions from those reports, just as I have done.

The meetings we held in Washington were private. I am not at liberty to quote what anybody in particular said. However, we did meet with businessmen, officials of the present United States administration and of the previous administration, with academics, congressmen, senators and their staffs. Everywhere we turned it is a fact that we had flung at us a Canadian national energy policy that those people regard as illiberal, discriminatory, confiscatory and the product of a narrow, inward-looking nationalism.

Well, I do not expect that our standing committee, studying pieces of this policy—whether it is Bill C-57, Bill C-48 or, eventually, the draft bill Mr. Lalonde brought in a few days ago—will be able to address the larger issues. I do not expect that any of our committees—given the terms of reference, given the complicated nature of those bills and given the time constraints our committees have been operating under—will be able to address those larger issues.

We are told that the national energy policy will provide the inspiration for the government's long-awaited industrial strategy. Some time ago there was an article in Executive magazine entitled, "Time to cut and run?" The following statement appeared:

Following the NEP, Industry Minister Herb Gray is presenting a blueprint of how industry should be structured in the next decade: which firms will be given the government's blessing, and the loans and special concessions that go with it, and which will be left to the tender mercies of what remains of a free market.

It is perfectly all right for the Minister of State for Economic Development and his publicists and apologists to be out filling the media with stories of how "Olson is fighting a lonely battle in cabinet against the forces of inward-looking, discriminatory, narrow nationalism". That may be fine for the minister's political epitaph, but it is not much help to the Canadian economy.

There has been a good deal of controversy about what the policy objectives of the National Energy Program are. Ostensibly, they are to achieve security of supply, to increase the extent of Canadian ownership and to bring in a new pricing and revenue regime. But what is the order of priority of these objectives? Can these objectives be reconciled one with the other? There is authoritative suggestion on the basis of the policy that they cannot really be reconciled in the way that the government pretends.

Again I quote from the final paragraph of the C. D. Howe Institute study Canada's Energy Policy Debate. I think our colleague Senator Balfour put part of this on the record the other night, but it is brief and worth repeating:

Another longer-range aspect of the NEP must also be addressed. The NEP implicitly takes the view that Canada can afford to trade self-sufficiency for restructured distribution.

If I could dictate italics to Hansard, which I cannot, I would put that sentence in italics: "The NEP implicitly takes the view that Canada can afford to trade self-sufficiency for restructured distribution." It goes on:

This policy represents a timely departure from the past in its emphasis on reducing oil demand. It is unlikely that there will be any going back on these fundamentals. But the policy takes risks. If the attractiveness of competing activity in the United States has been underestimated,—

If I may interject here, I would say that all of the evidence we have had since the national energy policy was introduced indicates that it has indeed been underestimated, and dangerously so, judging by the extent of the movement of exploration and drilling from Canada to the United States. But to return to the quotation:

If the attractiveness of competing activity in the United States has been underestimated, if reduction in oil demand has been overestimated,—

And let me interject here to say that the only thing that will save the government's projections on oil demand is that those projections were based on an average annual rate of economic growth of somewhere in the order of 3 per cent, 3.2 per cent, and the only thing that will save the government's oil demand projections is if our rate of economic growth turns out to be considerably less than 3.2 per cent, as, of course, is quite apt to be the case under the present government, which chalked up zero rate of economic growth last year. But let me once again return to the quotation:

—if reduction in oil demand has been overestimated, if the oil sands projects are delayed much longer, and if the response to frontier options is weak, Canadians may pay lower prices and own more of their industry by mid-decade, but they should also be aware that part of the price may be lineups at the gas pumps.

● (2130)

That quotation comes from a publication of the C. D. Howe Institute called Canada's Energy Policy Debate, and it can be found at page 50.

Honourable senators, I continue to hope that a committee of the Senate will be permitted to address these larger issues, and others presented by the national energy policy, in an organized and coherent way. The Senate will be aware that I moved a motion on December 11 to have the national energy policy referred to a committee of the Senate for that purpose, and that the Deputy Leader of the Government at that time gave a very positive reply, indicating that the government favours such a study.

Since then the government has been backing away from the position enunciated by the deputy leader, and now we are faced with a position recently articulated by the deputy leader to the effect that somehow, if we take the various pieces of the energy policy found in Bill C-57 and Bill C-48, the draft bill introduced by Mr. Lalonde a few days ago and so on, it will lead to a study of the national energy policy as a whole.

The Deputy Leader of the Government has been around here too long not to realize that such a proposition is nonsense. He knows the time constraints of the Senate committees and how complicated these bills are. The honourable senator knows perfectly well that attacking the national energy policy by dealing with it piecemeal is totally inadequate and that we will not have an opportunity to call witnesses from the industry, the producing provinces and the federal government to perform the kind of study and make the kind of recommendations which should be made on this policy.

I cannot understand why the government is so reluctant to refer its entire energy policy to a committee of the Senate. It is obvious to me that the government is committed to the policy. Unfortunately, it will brook no change.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): That is not true, there have been many changes.

Senator Murray: The government does not lack resources. The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources is an empire which is growing faster than any other department or agency of the federal government.

Senator Frith: How can you say it will brook no change when there have been many changes?

Senator Smith: Baloney.

Senator Murray: The government does not even lack defenders in the Senate and never will, so long as Senator Frith is with us.

Senator Frith: True.

Senator Murray: I believe that the government's energy policy is an ideal area of study for a Senate committee and that such a study would take only a couple of months of hard work. Such a committee could call witnesses from the federal government, the producing provinces, the industry and other interested experts, after which it would arrive at its findings and make recommendations. Incidentally, it would also be useful in terms of the relevance of this chamber to vital, current issues. I am concerned—as, I am sure, are many other senators and many other Canadians—about the impact of the National Energy Program on the government's stated goal of energy self-sufficiency and the impact of the program on our international standing and federal-provincial relations in terms of national unity.

I continue to insist that the formulation of such a committee would provide an opportunity to clear the air on some of the related matters to the National Energy Program by allowing it to spend a couple of months next fall performing a balanced and thorough study on energy policy. I would like to voice my protest that this bill is being sent to committee and that it is being suggested by the government that the committee study will somehow serve as a substitute for a rational and coherent examination of the national energy policy.

This bill, in its entirety—and I refer here to the energy-related taxes and the other provisions—gives effect, in part, to the MacEachen budget presented last October which has already proven to be outrageously wrong in its forecasts, ineffective and, in fact, counter-productive in attacking the serious economic problems of the country. That budget is a failure. Canada had zero economic growth last year, one of the worst growth rates in the western world. Inflation is running at approximately 12.3 per cent. In economic growth performance standings among the 24 OECD countries for last year, Canada ranked twentieth. Our standard of living, which was the third highest in the world just 10 or 11 years ago, has fallen to twelfth place. Productivity in the past two years has declined, and our unemployment rate for last year was equalled only by that of Britain among the seven leading OECD nations.

The budget is a failure and the economic policies of the Minister of Finance have proven to be a failure. Therefore, the Senate will not be surprised if I indicate that I intend to vote against this bill.

Hon. Ann Elizabeth Bell: Honourable senators, in taking part in the debate on second reading of Bill C-57, I would like to congratulate Senator Barrow for the succinct way in which he initiated the debate last week. Many of the amendments in the bill before us are of a technical nature and I believe they are in context with the two acts which they seek to amend. However, in two major and important respects the bill extends far beyond the previous scope of the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act. In these respects, the bill incorporates two completely new provisions for taxation of natural resources and the revenues derived from them.

Quite apart from the issue of constitutional legality, which arises under jurisdiction and resource ownership provisions of the British North America Act—sections 109 and 125—the bill and the administrative directives flowing from it indicate clearly that it is intended that these measures commence and take effect before they have received approval by Parliament.

It is unconstitutional to levy taxes without Parliament's approval. This concept has been the cornerstone of our parliamentary system going back more than 300 years. However, executive practice has led to a convention whereby an existing tax may be varied and adjusted by the executive and subsequently sanctioned by Parliament on a retroactive basis. Such practice is appropriate where the measures are amendments consistent with the existing legislation. They must be non-discriminatory on a broad basis. In such circumstances the method is appropriate in an administrative sense, and I have no quarrel with it.

However, it is important to distinguish between an administrative practice in implementing changes of degree and a completely new form of taxation directed towards a particular industry and, in this instance, a particular region of Canada. What I object to in all this is that too easily the practice can override the principles on which it is based. The executive has no authority whatsoever to levy a new, different, never-before imposed tax.

Bill C-57 includes two completely new taxes which can be found in Part II and Part IV of the bill. Part II deals with the excise tax on natural gas and gas liquids and is comprised of clauses 43 to 47. Part IV, which is comprised of clauses 78 to 117, impose a petroleum and gas revenue tax. In fact, the title on the first page of the bill makes it clear. It reads:

An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas.

Such a thing has never been done before in connection with these two acts. The convention of executive authority has been carried beyond the extremes of propriety here and, perhaps, beyond the limits of legality.

● (2140)

The second point of principle which must be examined relates to jurisdiction and ownership of the resources being taxed. Section 109 of the British North America Act states that all lands, mines, minerals and royalties belonging to the named provinces shall belong to the provinces. Section 125 of the B.N.A. Act states:

No Lands or Property belonging to Canada or any Province shall be liable to Taxation.

Since clauses 78 to 117 dealing with the petroleum and gas revenue tax, which impose a levy of eight per cent on net operating revenue related to the production of oil and gas, and have the attributes of a royalty, whether so-called or not, are in contravention of section 109 of the B.N.A. Act, they should not be included in Bill C-57.

Clauses 43 to 47 dealing with the natural gas and gas liquids tax, seek to levy a 30-cents-per-1,000-cubic-foot tax on provincially-owned property and resources. They are in contravention of sections 125 and 109 of the B.N.A. Act, and should not be included in Bill C-57. The 30-cents-per-1,000-cubic-foot tax has been levied for domestic purposes. For instance, sales in British Columbia have been levied since November 1, 1980 and, although the tax has been collected, the payments are being held in trust. Although Bill C-57 was properly introduced in Parliament, as provided for in sections 53 and 54 of the B.N.A. Act, on January 26, 1981, the natural gas and gas liquids tax of 30 cents per 1,000 cubic feet had already been levied. The eight-per-cent petroleum and gas revenue tax came into effect on January 1, 1981.

Where was the authority of the federal government to levy this tax, or for the provincial governments to collect it?

Surely, the introduction of a bill is only a recommendation to Parliament. If you, honourable senators, recommend to your cousin, George, that he invest in gold bricks, he does not have to accept your advice; it is his money. If the government recommends a tax to Parliament, Parliament does not have to accept the advice; it is the taxpayers' money.

The purpose of the proposed natural gas and gas liquids tax set out in clause 25.11 states:

The purpose of this Part is to provide legislative authority for the imposition of a natural gas and gas liquids tax as an essential and integral element of the national oil and gas policy as expounded in the National Energy Program.

I am unable to find a stated purpose for the petroleum gas revenue tax but, presumably, that has a similar purpose. A policy such as the National Energy Program, cannot be a proper basis on which a new tax is imposed by the convention of levying by executive authority.

However it may be defended, the government cannot claim that the National Energy Program has broad and general support, particularly with respect to the attainment of its purported and very worthwhile objectives of self-sufficiency, conservation and so on.

Responsible members of this chamber have stated, in no uncertain terms, the serious consequences of the National Energy Program. I place my reliance on the views of Senator Manning, for one, who has had long and highly respected experience in the development of the petroleum industry, and on the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. In its preliminary report to the Senate, tabled on May 19 and developed by the deputy chairman, Senator Barrow, on May 26, the committee felt that a full review of the effect of the National Energy Program tax was of paramount importance. The committee concluded that, since the petroleum gas revenue tax and the natural gas and gas liquids tax are only part of the National Energy Program, all such matters as Bill C-48, income tax amendments, and federal-provincial negotiations must be taken into account before recommendations can be made. Surely this is what some honourable senators have been advocating for months. Senator Murray has very clearly explained why it is important.

When Senator Murray introduced his motion to refer the National Energy Program to a Senate committee, on January 22, in this chamber, I stated:

I feel we are allowing to slide past us an opportunity to provide an excellent service to our country. I feel strongly that it is the Senate, and only the Senate, that can put together a body of specialized knowledge, make a reasonable assessment of it, and render an informed judgment . . . I feel rather strongly that we cannot do it on a piecemeal basis.

Here in this chamber, and probably only in this chamber, can we bring the policies and the needs and understanding of resource development of our regions together and give them an assessment that is free from partisan political distortions.

Apart from the National Energy Program aspects, the increase of taxes on an automatic basis without reference to Parliament, and the ability of the Governor in Council to adjust and alter formulae by regulation, caused the committee grave concern. The report stated that, without reference to Parliament, control of tax is lost.

If the bill is referred to committee, it is hoped that amendments will be proposed, and I would hope that the committee would look at clause 33(1) dealing with artificial limbs, which was mentioned in the report. I feel this must be inadvertent discrimination and the time to amend it is now and not wait until the bill comes back for further amendment at some later date. As it is now, it looks as though artificial limbs and specially constructed appliances made to order for a person having a crippled or deformed foot or ankle would be tax exempt. However, it does not appear to cover a made-to-order brace or device for spine, hip, et cetera.

I would further hope that the committee would recommend an amendment so that the sale of reproductions of works of art would be tax exempt. I think they should clearly be exempt from excise tax when they are signed, limited edition prints.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT

Hon. Ann Elizabeth Bell: Honourable senators, in view of the time constraint, since we are nearing the end of this session of Parliament, I move, in amendment:

That this bill be not read the second time but that it be amended as follows: That clauses 43 to 47 of Part II and clauses 78 to 117 of Part IV, and those clauses of Part V relating thereto, be deleted.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): It is my understanding that Senator Bell has moved an amendment, and I believe the Chair should put the motion.

Senator Bell: Mr. Speaker, will you ask for a seconder for my motion?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): There are many seconders.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): On a point of order, I do not know whether an amendment is in order on second reading. At the present time, we are debating the principle of the bill.

This is something His Honour the Speaker may want to look into, but I do not remember an amendment being moved at second reading.

[Senator Bell.]

Senator Flynn: An amendment certainly can be moved.

● (2150)

Senator Frith: I am telling you I do not remember one. I do not think it is in order.

Hon. G. I. Smith: The next thing we will be hearing is that we must not make a speech.

Senator Frith: I am simply making a point of order with respect to an amendment on second reading. That is really not extraordinary.

Senator Bell: Honourable senators, the amendment I am moving is strictly on two points of principle. If we refer this bill to committee without removing those two parts, the committee, at a later stage, cannot remove something that is a matter of principle. Perhaps I am wrong, but that is my reason for moving the amendment now before the bill is referred to committee and while we are debating its principle.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to support the right of the honourable senator to move this amendment. Perhaps the wording needs to be examined. It is quite clear that on second reading a number of amendments can be moved, and one is called a reasoned amendment, which I am sure is familiar to honourable senators. A description can be found at page 226 of the fifth edition of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms.

What Senator Bell has tried to do is to express her objection to certain principles of taxation, among other things, which were the substance of her speech, and, in endeavouring to give expression to this view on the question of principle, she has proposed that we delete certain clauses from the bill. It may be that that wording needs to be improved in order for the amendment to fall within the category of reasoned amendments, but perhaps it is satisfactory the way it is. It is obvious she has presented to us what is termed a reasoned amendment which is properly moved on second reading. In those circumstances, there is no reason why this house cannot consider it.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the authority quoted by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition starts at page 225 and is headed "Amendments At Second Reading". Paragraph 740 states:

There are three types of amendments that may be proposed at the second reading stage of a bill. These are:

1. the six months' hoist;—

Which this one is not.

2. the reasoned amendment;—

Which this may be.

3. the referral of the subject matter to a committee.

Therefore, in my respectful submission, the only category that it can fall into is the second type, the reasoned amendment.

Paragraph 744 states:

It is also competent for a Member, who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move what is known as a "reasoned amendment". This amendment leaves out all the words in the main question after the word "That" to add other words. A reasoned amendment is in the form of a motion and may fall into one of several categories:—

Paragraph 744 goes on to list the various categories. I think the fault is more than can be remedied by some change in wording. In my respectful submission it is not a reasoned amendment, and it is in none of the three categories of motion that can be moved on second reading.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, may I ask the deputy leader how rule 58 applies in this case?

Senator Smith: That is an unfair question. He can't answer it.

Senator Frith: I assume rule 58 would apply if any clause had been carried, but no clause has been carried. Rule 58 reads:

At any time before a bill is passed a senator may move for the reconsideration of any clause thereof already carried.

No clause has been already carried.

Senator Flynn: We are dealing with a bill that proposes several changes in taxation laws, and, as has been pointed out by Senator Bell, it really enters a new field with the tax on oil resources and gas. If you do not object to some of these taxes but you do object to others, how would you deal with it? It is a question of principle because you are in favour of some and against others. It is obvious to me that an amendment would delete a number of clauses because they refer to certain taxes which we are opposed to. Therefore, that would call for a reasoned amendment. Whether you hide behind any decision that has been made in the past or not, you certainly would not want to frustrate the expression of the free will of the Senate once more.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I could take objection to a number of things said by Senator Flynn—the frustration, and so on—but we can have a ruling on it. It is a point of order. It is perfectly clear to the Leader of the Opposition that it is a reasoned amendment. It is perfectly clear to me that it is not because it does not fall within the description in the first part of paragraph 744 of Beauchesne. I will be content with His Honour's ruling.

Senator Flynn: Which rule are you relying upon in this point of order?

Senator Frith: Rule 1.

Senator Flynn: Rule 1!

The Hon. the Speaker: Would honourable senators agree, due to the late hour and because I have a decision by former Speaker Lamoureux to review, that I give my ruling tomorrow?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Flynn: I would suggest, as a practical way of dealing with this matter, His Honour having taken under advisement the question as to the irregularity of the amendment, that if the sponsor of the bill wishes to close the debate we could have a deferred vote on both the amendment and the main motion tomorrow.

Senator Frith: I think that is a very good suggestion.

Senator Flynn: It is late for a vote.

Hon. A. Irvine Barrow: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I should like to draw the attention of honourable senators to the fact that if the Honourable Senator Barrow speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Senator Barrow: Honourable senators, first, I want to thank—

Senator Frith: I did not hear what the sponsor of the bill said. Did he say he had nothing to add at this stage?

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: If he wants to elaborate on the amendment or clarify some situation, fine, but if he makes a final speech, even though we have agreed on a deferred vote, I do not think this is the correct way to proceed. I think other senators should have an opportunity to speak between now and the termination of the debate.

The Hon. the Speaker: There can be a debate on the amendment proposed by Senator Bell, but on the remainder Senator Barrow's speech will close the debate. Otherwise, I do not understand the meaning of the rule.

Senator Flynn: I withdraw my suggestion.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, notwithstanding the amendment, the intention was not at any time to cut off debate. The Leader of the Opposition and I thought that the debate on second reading would conclude this evening, and we would have a vote on second reading. As far as we knew, anyone who wanted to speak on second reading would be able to do so, and we would have a vote this evening. All that Senator Flynn is suggesting is that we defer the vote on both the amendment and the main motion until tomorrow evening. Let us debate everything. We are not closing any debate. If any honourable senator wishes to speak on the amendment or on the main motion, he or she may do so.

Senator Flynn: Tomorrow afternoon?

Senator Frith: Yes, and I do not mind if we wait until Friday to do it. I am simply saying we were not trying to cut off debate. If anybody wants to debate either on the amendment or the main motion, he or she may can do so. We were simply suggesting that we defer the vote on both of them until tomorrow. If you do not want to do that, we can keep going. We have all week; we have all month.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: All year.

Senator Flynn: I am withdrawing my suggestion because perhaps honourable senators would like to speak on the amendment. Since His Honour has taken the validity or irregularity of the amendment under advisement, I suppose it would be rather futile to continue the debate on the amendment. So we might as well adjourn the debate until tomorrow.

• (2200)

On motion of Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

ANIMAL DISEASE AND PROTECTION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay moved the second reading of Bill C-70, to amend the Animal Disease and Protection Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I am certainly pleased to move the adoption of Bill C-70, on second reading, and to tell you that I shall be very brief.

[English]

Canada has been well served by its livestock producers. They have developed an industry that is second to none in efficiency, productivity and high quality of animals. That is most evident from the availability of the tasty meats that we see each time we enter a supermarket, and it is also evident from the ready demand for our livestock for export to other countries. Whether it is an individual producer looking for a good breeding animal to upgrade his herd or a developing country looking for stock to develop a national industry, Canada is one of the first countries to which they look.

A major reason for that international reputation is the high health standards that are imposed in connection with Canadian livestock—health standards that are enforced willingly, I should add, with the full co-operation of farmers, breed associations and all provincial governments.

One of the best tools that we have for maintaining a high level of animal hygiene is the authority under the Animal Disease and Protection Act to test livestock for infectious or contagious disease and, if necessary, order the diseased animals destroyed.

When a government undertakes to exercise such authority, it is, of course, incumbent upon it to provide compensation, and those levels of compensation have been amended from time to time to relate to price changes in the marketplace.

There are, however, two situations which producers face from time to time that are not covered under the present act and which could deprive them of the compensation to which they are due. One is a situation where an animal is inspected by a veterinarian and found infected, but dies before it can be destroyed. The other is where an animal is injured while being tested and must be destroyed. In both cases the producer is clearly operating within the intent of the act. Generally, the act at present provides that the diseased animal must be slaughtered in an abattoir. This amendment would authorize payment to owners whose animals died, for example, en route to an abattoir or while under quarantine.

It is a short bill, and I am sure that honourable senators will see the justice of ensuring that producers benefit from the compensation they would have received had their animals completed the normal test and slaughter procedure.

[Senator Flynn.]

Hon. Cyril B. Sherwood: Honourable senators, I find myself in agreement with Senator Guay's remarks in connection with this amending bill, and I should like to add a few words to what he has said.

Certainly, we in Canada enjoy a high standard of animal health, which pays dividends for livestock producers and, indeed, all Canadians, in view of our strong export sales. With regard to the eradication of animal diseases, as Senator Guay has pointed out, it becomes necessary on occasion to destroy livestock.

This amendment will provide the authority to compensate livestock owners for stock that has to be destroyed in the interests of disease eradication. The amendment makes possible compensation which rightly should be paid and, therefore, I recommend favourable consideration of this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Guay moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT ASSOCIATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Maurice Riel moved the second reading of Bill C-71, to amend the International Development Association Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I have the honour to introduce to the Senate a bill to amend the International Development Association Act, authorizing the issue of $164,600,000 to the International Development Association, more commonly known as IDA, as partial settlement of Canada's commitment in respect to the sixth replenishment of the resources of the Association.

As you are aware, support of IDA is one of the major ways in which Canada promotes development in the Third World. Being an agency of the World Bank responsible for granting preferential loans, the International Development Association has come to be known as one of the most effective multilateral instruments for international development. Indeed, since its inception in 1960, this agency has provided over $20 billion US for carrying out projects, technical studies and medical research. Before the success of IDA in gathering funds the world over and using them to help less developed countries, Canada had assigned to it an important place in its general assistance program, as had all other major donor countries. It is of the utmost importance for Canada and other countries to continue to support the efforts of IDA if the economic development of underprivileged countries is to be enhanced.

While there are 121 member countries in IDA, the major recipients of loans awarded by this organization are the neediest of the underdeveloped countries, that is those few whose per capita income is less than $625 US in 1978 dollars. IDA can contribute efficiently to the development of these countries for two reasons: First, it can call on the enormous experience of the personnel of the World Bank, and, second, thanks to its substantial resources, it can develop and implement projects of a scope that no other preferential loan organization could match.

The resources of IDA come mostly from the OECD member countries which over the years have provided approximately 35 per cent of total donations. The loans granted by the World Bank from such funds for the implementation of projects are usually interest free; repayment is over a 50-year period and may become due only 10 years after the loan is granted. Since the bank depletes the resources of IDA by granting such loans, it must regularly replenish the funds of the association. The total amount needed to replenish these funds, as well as the proportional contributions of individual countries are determined by way of international negotiations; afterwards, the respective governments of the member countries are asked to approve the amounts negotiated.

This is the sixth replenishment of the resources of IDA since it was set up. In recent years, the IDA fund has been replenished every three years. The sixth replenishment was negotiated in 1979 and should be effected from mid-1980 to mid-1983, the overall amount being U.S. $12 billion. During these negotiations, Canada has decided to set the amount of its contribution at 4.3 per cent of the overall replenishment, or $Can601.8 million. In all previous replenishments, Canada's total contribution was slightly over U.S. $1 billion, or 5.3 per cent of IDA resources.

The current amendment to the International Development Association Act amendment now before us would authorize issuing the second instalment of Canada's commitment in respect of the sixth replenishment of the IDA resources. Last year, Canada made a first instalment of $177.1 million to IDA. These monies are issued as non-interest bearing demand notes that are cashed by IDA, usually over a ten-year period, as projects are brought on stream. IDA has no immediate need for Canada's contribution. However, we are required to unconditionally commit these funds by issuing non-interest bearing demand notes, in order for them to be in a position to sign loan agreements with recipient nations.

Normally, Canada's payment would be made on July 1st. However, the United States has been late in ratifying this sixth replenishment. In order to allow IDA to continue with its loan program, Canada and a number of other contributing nations have made their first instalment in respect of the sixth replenishment before releasing their second instalment. The American administration expects Congress to approve its contribution next fall, at which time the other contributing nations should be making their second instalments.

As long as the United States has not obtained legislative approval of its commitment to IDA, Canada will be under no obligation to make her second instalment, for which appropriation is hereby requested.

I urge the Senate to approve the amendment, in order to allow Canada to continue her support to that important multilateral aid agency.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I think it is somewhat late this evening to consider this matter. In view of its great importance, dealing as it does with the whole question of international aid and international development, I feel we should perhaps take a little more than two minutes' time to examine the bill. With leave, I would adjourn the debate until tomorrow.

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion by Senator Asselin, debate adjourned.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT (FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS) ASSISTANCE BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Stanley Haidasz moved the second reading of Bill C-74, to authorize financial assistance to be provided to certain international financial institutions.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to introduce, on second reading, Bill C-74, an act entitled the International Development (Financial Institutions) Assistance Act, the purpose of which is to authorize various payments to international development institutions. These organizations are often referred to as international financial institutions or, in some cases, regional development banks.

As was earlier today clarified by the deputy leader, this legislation was occasioned by a ruling in the House of Commons on June 2, 1981, following a point of order concerning the procedural acceptability of certain items contained in the main estimates for 1981-82.

We all know the Canadian government's massive commitment to aid for needy people in developing countries. This help is ably carried out by CIDA, the Canadian International Development Agency, of the Department of External Affairs. CIDA's total aid for this fiscal year amounts to just over $1 billion.

Bill C-74 initially represents a contribution of $137 million in Canadian investments and advances to some financial institutions for international development. This amounts to 89 per cent of the CIDA budget for international institutions alone. This particular contribution is in the nature of advances, and thus is repayable after a specified period of time. Also, these items involve non-interest-bearing, non-negotiable demand notes to be encashed at a later date.

On reading Bill C-74, honourable senators will note that it consists of five clauses. Clause 2 of the bill provides authority to make two types of payments out of the consolidated revenue fund. These are, first, payments in cash of amounts not exceeding $4 million. In fact, the intention is to make only one such payment in the fiscal year 1981-82, to the United Nations Common Fund for Commodities. This tranche of $4 million would be the first of three equal payments for the period 1981-82 to 1983-84. The purpose is to support the United Nations Common Fund so-called second window, which will finance measures other than stocking in the field of commodities. The vast majority of benefits from the operation of the fund's second window will flow to developing countries.

The second type of payment to be authorized under this act involves the issuance in accordance with terms and conditions approved by the Governor in Council of non-interest-bearing, non-negotiable demand notes to international financial institutions. The form of these demand notes would be determined by the Minister of Finance in line with the Financial Administration Act. It is a long-standing practice to make payments to the regional development banks by way of demand notes, since they do not require all of the cash at the time of payment. Rather, the cash is needed over a period of up to 10 years, as the banks make project commitments and actual expenditures are incurred in developing countries. It is with this in mind that encashment schedules for these notes are drawn up and agreed to between the international financial institutions and Canada.

• (2220)

As you will note, paragraph two of this legislation envisages, in fiscal year 1981-82, the issuance of non-negotiable demand notes not exceeding in the aggregate $121,200,000. This consists of the following components, which I will put into context by describing salient aspects of the operations of these institutions.

The first component consists of an amount of $3.5 million for the Caribbean Development Bank's Special Development Fund. This is the last of three tranches to fulfill a Canadian commitment of $10.5 million for the period 1979-80 to 1981-82.

The Caribbean Development Bank administers a number of concessional funds collectively known as special fund resources. During the period 1981-85, the least developed countries of the region are expected to receive 63 per cent of total special fund resources. Under the special fund resources umbrella Canada contributes to the single largest, most concessional fund—the Special Development Fund, 70 per cent of which is targeted for use in the least developed countries. In 1980-81 Canada will contribute $3.5 million to the Special Development Fund within the framework of the US $26 million special fund resources lending program. While it is difficult to accurately forecast sectoral shares for special fund resources lending, agriculture and social infrastructure are expected to continue as major areas of concentration.

The second component is a payment of $30 million to the African Development Fund. This is the third and last instalment totalling $85 million over the period 1979-80 to 1981-82.

The African Development Fund was established on November 29, 1972 by the African Development Bank and the non-African state participants. The fund is the concessional arm of the bank and assists it in making an increasingly effective contribution to the economic and social development of the African countries. It is the major regional concessional lending institution serving the African countries. Lending resources of the fund derive from direct contributions of 22 non-African states. The lending program of the fund is expected to be $US325 million in 1981, to reach a cumulative total of about $US1,374 million by December 31, 1981. Agriculture will account for the largest share of the 1981 fund lending, which is about 45 per cent, followed by transport, about 25 per cent.

The third component is a payment of $56.7 million to the Asian Development Fund. This is the third of four instalments which total $193.4 million for 1979-80 to 1982-83.

The Asian Development Fund was established in April, 1973 to serve as the concessional arm of the Asian Development Bank, and to foster economic growth and co-operation in the Asian region, both collectively and individually. The fund is now the major regional concessional lending institution serving the countries of Asia and the South Pacific, in particular the poorest countries of the region where a large part of the world's population lives. Lending resources of the fund derive from direct contributions of other countries. The lending program of the fund is expected to be $US570 million in 1981, to reach a cumulative total of $US3 billion by December 31, 1981.

The fourth component consists of a payment of $17 million to the fund for special operations of the Inter-American Development Bank. This is the third of four payments towards a commitment for $US58.1 million over the years 1979-80 to 1982-83.

The fifth component consists of an amount of $14 million for the International Fund for Agricultural Development, as the first of three instalments totalling $42 million.

Clause 3 of the bill deals with the matter of the previously issued non-interest-bearing, non-negotiable demand notes referred to earlier. The issuance of these notes in previous years would be ratified and confirmed by this act.

Clause 4 provides authority for Canada's initial subscription for shares in the African Development Bank. Our share in the African Development Bank will be 3.2 per cent of the expanded capital stock. This legislation provides for the purchase of 4,200 paid-in shares over five years, as well as 12,600 callable shares. These shares are valued in aggregate at 168 million Units of Account, or approximately $Can240 million. Of that amount, only 25 per cent will be paid in—that is, approximately $60 million over five years. We will be utilizing the usual method for payments to the African Development Bank.

Clause 5, the last clause, of this legislation conveys authority to issue to the bank this year non-negotiable demand notes, equivalent in aggregate to 8,400,000 Units of Account, which equals approximately $12 million in Canadian dollars.

For the information of honourable senators, I would like to add that in the fiscal year 1981-82, a sum of $31.3 million will be paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund for the encashment of notes previously issued. This will include the $19.3 million referred to earlier, as well as the encashment of notes issued to the African Development Bank. Authority for these payments exists under section 45 of the Financial Administration Act.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Macquarrie, debate adjourned.

ATLANTIC REGION FREIGHT ASSISTANCE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Ernest G. Côtteau moved the second reading of Bill C-73, to amend the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act.

He said: Honourable senators, among the items which were ruled out of order by the Speaker of the House of Commons on June 12, 1981, was a portion of vote 110 of the Canadian Transportation Commission. The relevant part of the vote provides that section 6(2) of the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act, commonly referred to by the abbreviation ARFAA, shall not apply in the case of subsidies paid to truckers under that act.

The Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act and another act, the Maritime Freight Rates Act, provide for a transportation subsidy program in the Atlantic provinces and in the Gaspé peninsula. The subsidies were paid originally only to railways and were extended in 1969 to truckers. When they were extended to truckers the objective was to treat the two competing modes equitably so that the same level of subsidy was extended to both. It was also thought that some savings could be made in the amount of railway subsidy.

In order to control the total level of expenditures, section 6(2) of the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act stipulated that the total trucking subsidy could not exceed the amount saved by reducing the railway subsidy. Section 6(2) is, accordingly, known as the "ceiling."

However, savings on the railway subsidy were not as great as expected and the trucking industry grew dramatically from 450 eligible carriers in 1969 to 3,800 carriers in 1980. To preserve the objective of equitable treatment, it became the practice, beginning in the year 1971-72, to remove the ceiling by means of an item in the estimates, as senators well know, thus permitting the trucking subsidy to be paid in full. The trucking subsidy is expected to be about $43 million in 1981-82. If the ceiling were in force, only $14 million could legally be paid.

The purpose of Bill C-73, therefore, is to remove the ceiling by proper statutory means rather than through the estimates.

It should be noted that the entire subsidy program is under review and that more substantive changes may be made in due course. But it would seem unfair to truckers, who had no doubt made investments in the expectation of a continued subsidy, to terminate that subsidy abruptly without any notice or consultation.

Honourable senators, I recommend the second reading of Bill C-73.

On motion of Senator Smith, debate adjourned.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Paul Lucier moved the second reading of Bill C-72, to amend the National Housing Act.

He said: Honourable senators, there are two clauses in Bill C-72. Both of them have to do with the National Housing Act and the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I should like to explain them briefly.

Clause 1 repeals paragraph 34.14(2)(a) of the National Housing Act. That paragraph has to do with the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program, popularly known as RRAP. As the National Housing Act now stands, it places a limit of $100 million on funds which the corporation may borrow from the government for investment in the RRAP. The act has never been amended for the purposes of increasing that limit, even though rehabilitation costs have risen many times over the years and the amount of the permissible loan has been increased. The program has been very popular. The number of people participating in it has also increased. For all of those reasons, CMHC, in order to continue administering the program on the government's behalf, has been obliged to increase its borrowings.

As honourable senators are aware, this has been accomplished over the years by votes in the estimates. By means of that method the authorized limit of borrowing was increased from $100 million to $170 million. The vote in the 1981-82 estimates would have increased the limit by a further $59.8 million, making a total of $230.5 million. That method of authorizing high limits on Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation's borrowings, however, was declared irregular, thus necessitating the bill we now have before us, which amends the National Housing Act in such a way as to authorize the CMHC to borrow up to $230.5 million, the amount it now requires to continue administering the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program.

Clause 2 of Bill C-72 repeals paragraph 40(5)(a) of the National Housing Act. In this case, the paragraph being repealed has to do with the production of low rental housing and the acquisition of development of land for housing purposes under federal-provincial agreements. This section has in the past been used principally to fund the federal share of the capital costs of public housing projects. In more recent years, however, it has also been used to support the rural and native programs which make housing available for rental or ownership to people in rural and remote areas. It is also used to service lands held by the federal-provincial partnership, in order to facilitate their sale.

For all of those purposes, CMHC over the years has obtained, through votes in the estimates, increases in the original $150 million in borrowing permitted under the act. Because this section is of a more long-standing nature than the one pertaining to the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program there has been a more sizeable increase. The limit has been raised from $150 million to almost $1.4 billion. A further increase of $112.5 million was sought in the 1981-82 estimates. That would have made a total of over $1.5 billion. Those seem like sizeable amounts to a guy with an overdraft of $62 in his own account.

In summary, honourable senators, so far as CMHC is concerned, this bill would allow the corporation, under proper and acceptable procedures, to have access to the funds it requires to deliver federal housing programs on a scale and at a cost which it had not envisaged when this legislation was enacted.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.
The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Report of the Working Group on the Solicitor General's Study of Conditional Release, dated March 1981.

QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

POST OFFICE

DISRUPTION OF SERVICE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to know if the Leader of the Government is able to report on the postal strike situation, as he promised to do last night.

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have some information concerning the postal strike. As promised yesterday, I will now make a brief report to the Senate. First of all, may I give the background of the dispute?

The Canadian Union of Postal Workers withdrew from negotiations last Friday and have refused to meet with government representatives or negotiate with the government since, in spite of numerous direct and indirect appeals, including one made at 10 o'clock on Monday evening last. At meetings held with the union following the conciliation board report, the union did not state its bargaining position. Although since negotiations have broken off, they have made it clear that the entire report of the chairman of the conciliation board must be accepted by the government in order for negotiations to commence on their other demands, as recommended by the union representative on the conciliation board. The total cost of those demands would exceed CUPW 1980 payroll costs by 28 per cent. It is presumed this is a negotiating position, but the union has neither publicly, nor in direct contact with our representatives, modified this stance.

While Treasury Board would prefer that the issue of paid maternity leave be settled in another forum, they agreed to negotiate on the basis of the chairman's recommendations on paid maternity benefits, although further details would be required before a viable scheme could be worked out. The union was made aware of this position.

● (1405)

Aside from maternity benefits, Treasury Board has made substantial concessions on rates of pay, health and safety, closed circuit TV, vacation leave, overtime provisions, including meal allowance, boot and glove allowance, conditions of employment for part-time employees, and other issues.

The government fully accepts Mr. Jasmin's recommendations on health and safety, but Treasury Board feels it is essential to add some words to the collective agreement to make it clear that employees cannot refuse to work under conditions which are ordinary circumstances of their work.

On the issue of closed circuit TV, Treasury Board has, with the approval of the Postmaster General, offered a moratorium on the installation of any new systems until the new Canada Post Corporation has been created, and has had an opportunity to study the matter. Treasury Board feels that Mr. Jasmin's recommendation, has been fully met, but the union has apparently rejected Treasury Board's position.

Substantive areas where Treasury Board does not accept Mr. Jasmin's report are those recommendations relating to improved designated paid holiday and vacation leave. These cannot be justified in the view of the Treasury Board. They have recently agreed to a paid lunch break for these workers and it is felt that giving them further time off cannot be justified. To accept the shift and weekend premium recommendations would be to improve a benefit which is already beyond the norm outside the Public Service.

Treasury Board has accepted much of the Jasmin report and believe that in the position adopted on maternity leave, health and safety and wage recommendations, they have dealt with the major issues of substance and principle.

The typical CUPW member already makes approximately $22,200 annually in salary, overtime and shift differential. Treasury Board's offer would raise this to approximately $25,000 a year. Treasury Board believes this to be extremely generous.

To give them all that Mr. Jasmin recommends, without considering the additional items drawn from the union representative's report, would represent a breakthrough settlement on numerous points and would be in conflict with the well-established policy of not leading the private sector.

● (1410)

At this time, when all governments and all employers are desperately concerned about breakthrough settlements, we feel that we have gone far enough with CUPW, one of the few unions in Canada which has been more than compensated for inflation for many years and whose members are already paid substantially more than comparable workers in the public and private sectors.

May I say additionally that on Friday the Prime Minister stated:

We have taken the clear position that there is no intention to settle this strike by legislation. It will, and should be, settled by the bargaining process.

Yesterday, in the other place, the Prime Minister said that the CUPW leaders have put themselves in a difficult position for the government to satisfy them. Mr. Parrot has made it clear that if legislated back to work he would disobey the order. Since it appears that Mr. Parrot does not want to return to the bargaining table, the government may, of course, have to develop new concepts on how the negotiations may be advanced. A number of approaches are being considered.

Certainly, unless exceptional circumstances prevail, no government wishes to legislate workers back to the job. Significantly, perhaps, the union leader, Mr. Parrot, has stated that he would rather go to jail than obey the law.

Attempts, both direct and indirect, to get union representatives to come to the bargaining table have been consistently met with refusals by CUPW's leadership. However, honourable senators, I am absolutely certain that once all parties are seated at the bargaining table, the President of the Treasury Board, through his officials and negotiators, will successfully conclude the bargaining process. At least, every effort will be made to bring the process to a successful conclusion.

Discussions have not yet been completed with the letter carriers respecting the delivery of pension cheques, family allowance cheques, old age security cheques, and Canada Pension Plan cheques. At this time it appears that the letter carriers will deliver the cheques, yet assurance of this must be received in writing. This has not yet happened. If for some reason the letter carriers decide not to participate, then the socio-economic cheques will be made available at distribution stations throughout Canada. These distribution centres will be readily accessible to the total population.

Problems respecting the non-receipt of June cheques, or any other problems that may arise, should immediately be brought to the attention of the Honourable Jean-Jacques Blais, the Minister of Supply and Services.

But back to the dispute itself, honourable senators, there is one additional important consideration. Mr. Parrot has stated repeatedly that the government must accept the Jasmin recommendations in total as a minimum basis for resuming negotiations. He has said that by not accepting the recommendations of the chairman of the conciliation board Treasury Board is departing from well-established past practice. This, of course, is not so.

Unlike the arbitration process, neither the employer nor the bargaining agent is under any obligation to accept or reject a conciliation board report. This right was exercised by the employer in 1980 when it refused the majority report in its dispute with the clerks on the issue of reducing the work week. In the same year, the employer refused the majority report in its dispute with its translators on the issue of rates of pay, maternity leave and vacation. On both occasions the settlements, which were negotiated following the strikes, did not include the majority of the conciliation board recommendations on these issues.

In 1978, the CUPW itself rejected the majority recommendations of the conciliation board. As a result, the CUPW began a strike which was terminated by the Postal Services Continuation Act, Bill C-8.

Mr. Parrot's statements on this matter are clearly attempts to force the government to accept elements of the Jasmin recommendations, when Treasury Board believes there are very good grounds for not accepting them. The level of benefits already obtaining for CUPW is in the forefront when compared to the level of benefits in the private sector. Even then, Mr. Parrot continues to emphasize that these are only the minimum conditions.

I want to emphasize again, honourable senators, that I regret to report that negotiations have not been resumed in the past 24 hours. However, I repeat, the government is prepared to resume negotiations at any time and will continue efforts to that end. The negotiating team is ready, waiting to meet with union representatives. It has the government's full mandate and confidence, and again we extend to Mr. Parrot and the CUPW an invitation to enter into negotiations immediately.

• (1415)

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, in view of the fact that the Leader of the Government reiterates that it is not the intention of the government to legislate the postal employees back to work, despite the fact that negotiations have been interrupted, would he confirm that therefore it is not that situation that prevents Parliament adjourning for the summer?

Senator Perrault: Well, honourable senators, I can only say that the legislative schedule which has been established by the government for the remainder of the session does not include any compulsory back-to-work legislation.

Hon. Lowell Murray: May I ask a supplementary question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate relative to the statement he has made about the issues in the postal strike? He may have covered this in his statement, and I may have missed it.

Is it the position of the government that it rejects the conciliation board's recommendation with regard to maternity leave, but that it has an alternative offer on that subject that it will be prepared to place on the table if negotiations resume?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, there is a number of matters the government would like to discuss with CUPW when negotiations resume, and the government is flexible on a number of recommendations in the Jasmin report. It seeks, however, an opportunity to meet on a rational, constructive basis with CUPW representatives, and I say, as soon as possible. The government is not inflexible with respect to all of these recommendations.

[Senator Perrault.]

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might be permitted to ask a supplementary question with reference to a particular portion of the leader's statement. As I followed him, fairly early in the statement he said something to the general effect that the total cost of the CUPW demands would be 28 per cent more than something, and I confess I did not catch what it was that was exceeded by 28 per cent. In any event, I wonder if the figure is available in dollars, to show the equivalent of the 28 per cent.

Senator Perrault: Well, honourable senators, I will go through these documents again in order to determine that. Here it is. This was a statement, in its original form, issued by the President of the Treasury Board, Mr. Johnston. I will quote those words again.

The total cost of those demands would exceed the CUPW 1980 payroll costs by 28 per cent.

That is, if the requests of the union are met. Mr. Johnston then went on to say:

We presume this is a negotiating position but the Union has neither publicly, nor in direct contact with our representatives, modified this stance.

Then, of course, there is again the response of the leader of the union, who states:

—the Government must accept the Jasmin recommendations in total as a minimum basis for resuming negotiations.

He said that by not accepting the recommendations of the chairman of the conciliation board, we were departing from well-established past practices.

Union representatives, at least to this time, have adamantly refused to meet again unless a commitment is given that all of the Jasmin recommendations, at a minimum, are accepted by the government. This is a prior condition for getting together to meet.

● (1420)

I want to clarify a point where there might have been some misunderstanding when I was giving my statement. To give CUPW workers all that Mr. Jasmin recommends, without considering the additional items drawn from the union representative's report, would, in the view of the President of the Treasury Board, represent a break-through settlement on numerous points and would be in conflict with our well-established policy of not leading the private sector.

Senator Smith: I certainly thank the honourable gentleman for his explanation. May I just repeat the second part of my question, now that I understand what the 28 per cent refers to? What does that 28 per cent amount to in dollars?

Senator Perrault: The typical CUPW member already makes approximately $22,200 annually in salary, overtime and shift differential. That is the take-home pay. The offer would raise that to approximately $25,000.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): I think Senator Smith wants gross figures.

Senator Smith: What I am trying to find out, honourable senators, has to do with the total payroll. You see, the 1980 payroll of CUPW must have been so many millions of dollars. I presume that for one who knows what that payroll was it would be a simple mathematical calculation to see what 28 per cent of it is. Some of us—at least, speaking for myself—do not have that 1980 payroll figure and we would probably have some trouble in trying to find it.

Senator Perrault: Do you want the gross amount paid out? I do not have that figure available today. I shall bring that, and additional figures, to the Senate tomorrow.

POSSIBLE MEDIATION OF DISPUTE

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, if, as I understand it, the two parties are not talking to each other, either directly or indirectly, is the government considering the use of the good offices of any kind of mediating presence to explore, on the one hand, how implacable the union position is that the Jasmin report would have to be a floor for any negotiations, and, on the other hand, whether some of the alternative proposals that the government has in mind might provide a basis for negotiation so far as the unions are concerned? It seems to me that this is the kind of inquiry that could be made by some mediator or go-between, without necessarily committing either party to the dispute.

Is it a fact that the parties are not talking to each other, either directly or indirectly, and is there a possibility of any go-between or any third party being brought into the process at this stage? I ask the question because I think we would want to feel in Parliament that, before we were called upon to take any action, all avenues had been explored and exhausted.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I want to thank the honourable senator for his suggestion. In any labour dispute of this kind alternative ideas are considered, as they are in this particular case. Certainly, every effort is being made to encourage the union to sit down with Treasury Board representatives and resume negotiations.

Yes, alternatives are being considered, but no final decisions have been taken.

DELIVERY OF INCOME TAX REFUNDS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I should like to direct to the Leader of the Government a supplementary question on this subject. The Leader of the Government mentioned that various departments responsible for such payments as Old Age Security, Family Allowance and Unemployment Insurance were arranging to get out their cheques, but one department he did not mention is the Department of National Revenue, and, as honourable senators know, at this time of the year many people are expecting refunds from that department.

Can the Leader of the Government advise us as to what that department is doing to assure those who are entitled to refunds that their cheques will be put in their hands so that they will not have to resort to loan sharks, who charge up to 60 per cent interest?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): That question will be taken as notice.

REQUESTS FOR ANSWERS

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I wonder if, before too many more months pass, someone on the government side could arrange to answer questions of mine which go back to some days before Hallowe'en. On these hot days, I feel that we should catch up on what we have neglected since the fall.

● (1425)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Perhaps the honourable senator would state the specific questions.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): May I assume that the honourable senator is referring to the list that we received last week, or the week before, while the Leader of the Government was away?

Senator Macquarrie: Yes. And out of the generosity of my heart I ask the honourable senator not to bother finding out about the Irish moss, because I am finding out about that elsewhere.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): He has a better source.

Hon. Peter Bosa: I would also ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to inquire on my behalf about Question No. 36, which has been on the Order Paper since October 16.

EXCISE TAX ACT EXCISE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—MOTION FOR SECOND READING—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—SPEAKER'S RULING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Barrow for second reading of Bill C-57, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, yesterday, as reported at page 2700 of Debates of the Senate, Senator Bell proposed the following motion in amendment during the debate on the second reading of Bill C-57:

[Senator Marshall.]

That this bill be not read the second time but that it be amended as follows: That clauses 43 to 47 of Part II and clauses 78 to 117 of Part IV, and those clauses of Part V relating thereto, be deleted.

A discussion arose as to the procedural acceptability of the motion in amendment and the Chair was subsequently asked to rule on the question. I suggested that it would be more prudent if I could check the authorities and reserve my ruling until today. I am now ready to give my decision.

The fifth edition of Beauchesne, citation 740, states:

There are three types of amendments that may be proposed at the second reading stage of a bill. These are:

1. the six months' hoist;
2. the reasoned amendment;
3. the referral of the subject matter to a committee.

Clearly, Senator Bell's motion in amendment is neither a six months' hoist nor is it an amendment which seeks to refer the subject matter to a committee. What it may resemble, as suggested by Senator Roblin, is a reasoned amendment.

On the subject of "Reasoned Amendment," the nineteenth edition of Erskine May states, at page 499:

It is also competent for a Member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move what is known as a "reasoned amendment." This amendment is to leave out all the words in the main question after the word "that" and to add other words; . . . A reasoned amendment is placed on the paper in the form of a motion and may fall into one of several categories.

(1) It may be declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy or provisions of the bill.

(2) It may express opinions as to any circumstances connected with the introduction or prosecution of the bill, or otherwise opposed to its progress.

(3) It may seek further information in relation to the bill by committees, commissioners, the production of papers or other evidence.

● (1430)

May also lists certain rules governing the content of reasoned amendments. One such rule is:

The amendment must not be concerned in detail with the provisions of the bill upon which it is moved, nor anticipate amendments thereto which may be moved in committee;

In the opinion of the Chair, the motion in amendment does not fall within the category of "Reasoned Amendment". It does not place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of Bill C-57. It is not declaratory of a principle adverse to, or differing from the principles of the bill. By seeking to delete certain clauses, it concerns itself with the provisions of the bill and is clearly anticipating amendments which may be moved in committee or on third reading.

Finally, I should like to refer to the ruling of May 8, 1946, by Speaker King, as found at pages 188-89 of the Debates of the Senate of that date. A motion in amendment was proposed to the second reading of a bill which sought to delete words of certain sections of the bill and add another subsection. The Speaker ruled the amendment out of order and cited as his authority the same paragraphs of May as I quoted earlier.

For these reasons, I declare the motion in amendment irreceivable.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Your Honour, we will not appeal this ruling, but I may say I find it strange that there is no way to deal with the problem raised by Senator Bell, which is that when a bill contains at least two principles we cannot decide on one in a way different from what we would have decided on the other.

With respect, Your Honour, I think the reference to the authority is not reasoned. In my opinion, Beauchesne is entirely out of date, and it does not follow that we should be bound by an unreasoned decision. There must be reasons given for the decision. Your Honour has quoted authorities, but there is no reason behind the decisions that Your Honour has spoken of. It seems to me that we should be able to find a way to deal with that situation.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, speaking to the intervention of Senator Flynn on the point as to whether there is a way, I believe there is a way. I believe there could be a properly worded reasoned amendment which would raise the principles Senator Bell wants raised.

The reason for the decision in Beauchesne as I understand it, is because, on second reading, the question before the house is not the bill, but whether the bill should be read a second time, and, therefore, it is quite clear that a reasoned amendment can be made by simply saying, "This bill shall not be read a second time, for the following reasons . . ." That is the only difference.

Senator Flynn: In any event, we shall see. I do not want to defeat the bill.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, the adjournment is in my name. There has been considerable confusion—at least, in my mind, and, as I think Hansard will indicate, in the Senate—as to whether the adjournment was of the debate on the amendment or on the main motion. At that particular time, an amendment had been proposed but had been objected to on a point of order. As I say, I am not sure whether I adjourned the debate on the main motion or on the motion in amendment.

I therefore wish at this time, with the consent of the Senate, to defer to the mover of the amendment, Senator Bell.

Hon. Ann Elizabeth Bell: I should like to thank Senator Grosart for his courtesy. I should also like to thank His Honour the Speaker for his ruling and his helpful guidance, and my colleagues for their helpful guidance.

I feel very strongly that Part I and Part III of this bill are quite in order. However, in my opinion, the principles contained in Part II and Part IV create a dangerous precedent. In light of my views, perhaps I could offer a more acceptably worded amendment along the lines suggested by Senator Frith.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, just to keep the record perfectly straight, technically, Senator Bell is not entitled to speak again on this matter. However, I believe that she has a proper, reasoned amendment, and that we should give her leave to speak on the matter again. The debate was not adjourned in her name and, therefore, under rule 28, she is not to speak more than once. However, I think we should give leave since, technically, she has to have leave to speak again. It is out of order for her to speak again on the same question.

Senator Grosart: On the point of order, as far as I understood it, leave was given immediately because I hesitated and no voice was raised, and Senator Bell began to speak.

I would also point out that she is not speaking a second time; she is still speaking for the first time on the motion.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

FURTHER MOTION IN AMENDMENT NEGATIVED

Hon. Ann Elizabeth Bell: Thank you for your courtesy, honourable senators. I do not particularly want to proceed in this way, but I must follow the rules.

Since I have no quarrel with Parts I and III of the bill, perhaps I may move a more acceptably worded amendment.

I move:

That Bill C-57, an Act to Amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas, be not read a second time as this House is opposed to the principle of a bill that includes

(1) new tax provisions that are beyond the scope of the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act;

(2) provisions that state that such taxes will commence and take effect on specified dates without the consent of Parliament having first been obtained;

(3) new tax provisions relating to substances (petroleum, natural gas and related hydrocarbons) that are held to be the exclusive property of the provinces and to revenues that are subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces; and

(4) the question of provincial ownership and jurisdiction that is at present before the Supreme Court of Canada.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Does Your Honour rule that the amendment is in order?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is there any comment on the part of other senators?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): My only comment, for what it is worth, is that I think it is in order.

Senator Flynn: May I say a few words on the amendment?

The Hon. the Speaker: You asked me if I would declare the amendment in order?

Senator Flynn: Yes.

The Hon. the Speaker: I do.

Senator Flynn: It seems to me that, if this amendment is in order, we will be in the position, as I mentioned yesterday when we discussed the previous amendment, of being asked to deal with an amendment which may have the effect of defeating the bill. We will not only defeat the taxes which Senator Bell has asked the Senate to oppose, but also the other provisions of the bill that do not meet any opposition. This is absolutely silly. I suggest that the only way we can deal properly with the problem raised by Senator Bell is to deal with the amendment she moved in the first place. If the government's position is that we will have to vote against the whole bill to defeat the provisions which we oppose, we will do it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt Senator Bell's motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion in amendment please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion in amendment please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

Senator Barrow: Honourable senators, it has been an interesting afternoon.

● (1500)

First, I want to thank Senators Balfour, Manning, Charbonneau, Smith, Dood, and Bell for their participation in the debate, and particularly Senator Murray for his rather wide-ranging comments on the National Energy Program.

As has been pointed out by all those who have spoken, this is an important tax bill and one which has raised many questions. The parts of the bill which seemed to gather most of the comments refer to the change in the method of taxation on alcoholic beverages and the sharing of tax revenues on oil and gas. If I may be permitted to do so, I would like to refer to some of the items which were mentioned by my colleagues in this house.

Both Senator Balfour and Senator Doody gave some statistics relating to drilling activity in the western provinces and the effect of the National Energy Program on such activity.

There is no question but that a number of rigs have left or will leave when their contracts expire, but many of these undoubtedly will return to Canada when the rate of exploration resumes, and that depends not just on the federal government but on the reconciliation of the federal government's position with that of the provinces—not an easy thing to do, as has been evidenced by the many meetings between officials, at which, according to the press last Tuesday, the sharing of billions of dollars in tax revenue is at stake for the good of all Canadians.

Senator Manning asked why only one category of natural resource was singled out for, as he put it, discrimination by the tax proposed under this legislation. May I point out that there are no other natural resources that have experienced such an unprecedented increase in economic rents over such a short period of time. The price of oil has increased from less than $2 a barrel in the early seventies to approximately $70 per barrel now. The price of gas has also moved up in proportion to that of oil. The economic impact of these increases is being felt all over the world. All countries in the world have had to take special emergency measures to cope with this situation, and Canada is no exception. As the National Energy Program outlines in detail, absence of any governmental intervention in this industry could endanger the survival of the nation itself. Huge windfall gains occurring to the industry from these increases have not been shared equitably by all Canadians. The taxes proposed in this bill were designed to serve that goal.

The economic rents being earned by other resources are not excessive. As a result the government did not deem it necessary to impose any special taxes on them.

The taxes imposed in this bill are designed to deal with a sector that is experiencing abnormal economic gains. The other resources are subject to the normal federal taxes applicable to industries in general.

Senator Charbonneau referred to the sales tax on newspapers and advertising supplements and to a brief presented by some weekly newspapers, and suggested that this sales tax now looms as a threat against the editors of weeklies. As a matter of fact, what they did request was that the percentage of advertising content described in the original bill as 75 per cent be increased to 80 per cent, and the bill now gives effect to that amendment.

Senator Smith referred to the fact that Bill C-57 came to us at the last moment. However, may I remind honourable senators that on February 18 the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce was authorized to undertake a pre-study of the bill. The rather lengthy preliminary report of the committee was made to the Senate on May 19. Senator Smith referred also to the indexing of tax on alcoholic beverages.

I know it is not necessary, but I should point out that ad valorem levies are proportional to sale prices: as the price increases, so also does the tax, as it is a percentage of the price. Specific levies, on the other hand, are expressed as so much per unit of quantity. To illustrate, the excise duty on beer is 54 cents per gallon.

These duties are imposed in specific form so that the amount of the tax is the same per quantity of product consumed. In the case of alcohol, the tax is the same per gallon of wines. It does not vary by the value/price of wine. Cheap wines attract the same tax as expensive wines. The basic rationale for this system is that the tax is on consumption of alcohol. All that should matter is the quantity of alcohol consumed and not its value of the price paid by the consumer.

The tax will continue to be specific even after the indexing adjustment. The indexing adjustment does not alter the basic character of these levies. It does not make them ad valorem levies, which are higher for more expensive drinks even if they contain the same amount of alcohol. The purpose of indexing adjustment is simply to ensure that the real value of these levies does not get eroded over time by inflation. When Parliament sets these rates, there is a presumption that the real impact of these levies will not be altered in a haphazard manner by inflation. Indexing does not take power away from Parliament; it simply ensures that parliamentary decisions remain fully in force until further amended.

Lack of indexing adjustment has also had the effect of eroding the federal share in total revenue. Provincial revenues, through liquor mark-ups, have been rising automatically as prices of the products have risen. Federal levies, on the other hand, have remained constant. For example, the federal share in total tobacco and alcohol taxation has fallen from 53 per cent in 1967-68 to 40 per cent in 1978-79. Provincial revenues increased from $509 million to $2,071 million over this period, an increase of $1,562 million, while the federal revenues increased from $814 million to $1,402 million, an increase of $588 million, or approximately one-third.

Honourable senators, I move second reading of Bill C-57 and recommend that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): In due course!

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Barrow, seconded by the Honourable Senator Graham, that this bill be read the second time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Flynn: No.

Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order.

Since we have voted on the previous amendment moved by Senator Bell, which was in fact a negating of the whole bill, unless some members of the Senate would like to record a different vote, I suggest that the recorded vote on the amendment be deemed to be the same as on second reading of this bill, but in the reverse order, of course.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: So the motion is carried and the vote is in the reverse order of the vote on the motion in amendment.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. A. Irvine Barrow moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT ASSOCIATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Monday, July 6, 1981, the debate on the motion of Senator Riel for the second reading of Bill C-71, to amend the International Development Association Act.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I would like first of all to thank the mover of this bill, Senator Riel, who explained the bill so clearly and concisely.

As I said last night, this bill could provide us with an opportunity to discuss our overall foreign policy with regard specifically to our aid to Third World countries, but since there will be an economic summit in July during which the industrialized countries will decide on a greater involvement in helping developing nations, I will not spend time discussing this aspect of our foreign policy. However I am hopeful that when we reconvene after the summer recess we will be able to debate the results of the economic summit. It might be easier then to consider the position of the Canadian government with regard to this very important issue of foreign aid.

The bill now before us asks us to increase substantially the amount of financial assistance given by Canada to the international agency called the International Development Association. Originally, we provided about $US37,830,000 under the original act, chapter I-21 of the Revised Statutes. Today, we are asked to increase this amount to $164,600,000.

By doing that, the government obviously wants to demonstrate its special interest in the agency called the World Bank. As mentioned by the sponsor of this bill, the World Bank deals mostly with multilateral assistance, and over 100 countries, I believe, contribute to it.

When I was responsible for the Canadian International Development Agency, naturally on many occasions I had very important discussions with those responsible for the World Bank and the International Development Association. When I met these people, I wanted to know how Canada could benefit indirectly from its investment in the World Bank. I am not suggesting that it should be Canada's policy, when providing assistance to Third World countries, that indirectly we must derive a benefit on the short or the long term, but I thought that, when Canada invested in the World Bank and its agency, the International Development Association, it should draw indirectly a certain dividend from this investment. I had asked my officials to try and find out how we could obtain a return on our investments in this international bank. I found out that Canada recovered only one fifth of the amount it invested in the World Bank, while Japan obtained 20 times its investment by getting contracts with Japanese firms or engineering consultant offices. I then decided to get Canadians more involved in the programs launched by the World Bank and the International Development Association. I asked a group of public servants to travel throughout Canada and to meet either with companies which would be interested in investing in Third World countries or with engineering consultant firms and offices dealing with international development. We had developed a program which allowed any Canadian company interested in international development projects through the World Bank, to go on location to study the projects and make tenders. If the company did not succeed in obtaining the contract, the Canadian government reimbursed in full the administrative, research and travel expenses incurred for bidding on these projects. I was extremely surprised to learn that this program helped several Canadian companies to be more aggressive in bidding for programs and plans developed by the World Bank. Even now, I wish that Canadians would be less timid when bidding on the multilateral programs of the international agency which we are now discussing, namely the International Development Association.

Clearly, in the area of Third World international development, Canada has not reached the goals set by the United Nations, which requested from every industrialized nation investments in Third World countries equal at least to one per cent of its gross national product. But as was mentioned last night, we now invest .430 per cent of our GNP, after reaching, when I was responsible for the Canadian Development Agency, a high of .5 per cent of the GNP, which was roughly the equivalent of about $1.2 billion in Canadian currency invested in the Third World.

Of course I am not opposing the legislation. I simply wanted to point out the difficulties we sometimes face in obtaining from the World Bank certain major contracts that could be of interest to Canadians in the area of international development. As I said at the outset, when we come back here in September or October, after the economic summit conference, I hope we will have an opportunity here in this house, as they will in the other place, to have a debate on Canada's external policy. The matter should not necessarily be left to the Commons alone, where there was already a two-day debate on this. You would be amazed how Canadians now are interested in this area of Canadian policy.

Formerly, the saying was that external affairs were for the higher up, the more educated, who had a better grasp of problems. But now, because the Third World has been publicized, because not only the Canadian government but also non-government organizations are interested in getting involved in Third World countries, the people do understand better our policy in that area. When, as a Minister of State, I was responsible for the Canadian International Development Agency, I made it my duty to help non-government organizations because I had an opportunity, when visiting developing countries, to see with my own eyes the work and the assistance extended by non-government organizations to these peoples in need.

It is my hope that my successors at the Canadian International Development Agency are still well inclined towards the NGO's; those non-government organizations became involved not in huge or outstanding projects but, because of their devotion and compassion, they did help small communities overcome their hardships.

Therefore, I want to tell the government leader and the deputy leader that I hope when we come back following the summer recess and the economic summit conference, that we will have an opportunity to hold a major debate on Canada's external policy, right here in the Senate.

This being said, I agree with the sponsor of the bill. I support this legislation, and see no point or purpose in referring it to a committee.

● (1520)

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I wonder if I might be permitted a short intervention on what we shall do with the rest of these bills, in the spirit of Senator Molson's remarks yesterday. The sponsors of any of this group of bills may move third reading now, if they are not opposed. However, there is no urgency with respect to third reading, which can be given just as easily tomorrow. However, if everyone has had his or her say, we might as well give them third reading today.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Perhaps the third reading should be postponed in light of the fact that we shall have royal assent tomorrow. Perhaps those who do not wish to speak now will have an inspiration overnight.

Senator Frith: It is exactly against that eventuality that I want to make it clear that if any honourable senator has a premonition of inspiration, I am quite happy to have third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Maurice Riel moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT (FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS) ASSISTANCE BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Haidasz for second reading of Bill C-74, to authorize financial assistance to be provided to certain international financial institutions.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I am proud to be following, in the Speaker's roster, my long-time friend, Senator Asselin, a distinguished and universally respected internationalist whom I have known since 1958 and admired for many years. I am impressed with the importance of this bill which was introduced by Senator Haidasz last night. I am grateful to him for his remarks and his explanation.

I am grateful also to my whip, Senator Macdonald, for moving the adjournment of the debate on my behalf. I was momentarily absent from the chamber late last night, but Senator Macdonald with his fidelity, vigour and virility was here, and I appreciate his moving the adjournment for me.

Senator Macdonald: Any time.

Senator Macquarrie: Thank you. I know that I can count on Senator Macdonald.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Especially if thanks like that follow.

Senator Macquarrie: I have never pretended that I would be here 100 per cent of the time every sitting, but I do the best I can. I have been moved from my office, I am moving from my apartment and I am trying my best to relocate back in my home province so, feeling a bit disoriented, I took 10 minutes off last night to find myself, which was when this bill found its way through the legislative mill.

I was impressed by Senator Haidasz's presentation and somewhat overwhelmed, being a poor boy from Prince Edward Island, after hearing some of the expressions. What does an impecunious philosopher like myself know about "tranche" or "second window." I do not even know what came through the first window, but I take it that these are phrases with which big businessmen are familiar. I would be about as much at home in the board room of big business in this country as I would be at the devotional sessions of the Dalai Lama of Tibet. Of course, I would never be asked to either, nor would I be very productive in such situations.

However, even with my lack of acumen and perception in that field, I am impressed by the significance of what was done last night and what will be furthered today. The fact that we have these eight bills is very significant. Anyone who has studied parliamentary process knows that the fundamental sovereignty, if I may use that word, and it is a bit tricky in a monarchy, of the people's representatives is in the area of voting funds and generally in taxation. Indeed, many years ago, about the only jurisdiction the ancestors of our parliamentary system had was over the raising of funds.

That is why it is significant that in the other place there was a very important issue raised—albeit rather belatedly—about the propriety of certain measures and that is why we have these eight bills in particular sequence. I think it is important that someone, through the Speaker of the other place, finally reasserted control, thereby underlining the fundamental role of the parliamentary group, especially, but not exclusively, the elected parliamentary group. The control of the public purse is the first and, surely, the abiding value of this whole system which we cherish.

There are other things in connection with the nature of these bills which are of significance. The former Secretary of State for External Affairs was a very strong and competent minister and, in her short tenure, made a tremendous impression on the international stage. I know that she had some anxieties about something which is reflected here today.

● (1530)

Senator Asselin, in his most excellent speech, spoke to a bill introduced in the other place, not by the Secretary of State for External Affairs but by the Minister of State (Finance). In other words, it was a Finance bill. Bill C-74 is an External Affairs bill. The Honourable Flora MacDonald endeavoured, in her short tenure, to get some of the economic agencies under the aegis of the Department of External Affairs which, in fact, is where they belong.

This is an important Canadian outreach as a "developed country," if I may use that expression. We are one of the prosperous; one of the seven. Therefore, all of these measures, through these important institutions we are talking about today, are a significant outreach of our performance in the foreign field; our contribution to a better world. It should be the Secretary of State for External Affairs who has not only the ultimate but the ongoing responsibility.

I am sorry that nothing was said about that last night, although I have reason to believe that the present Secretary of State for External Affairs shares the views of Miss MacDonald on the advisability of co-ordinating and regulating that process; to use the jargon, "to get it coming through the second window at the same time." We must take note of that.

Like my colleague, Senator Asselin, I do not propose to engage in a substantial discussion of external aid or foreign policy. Such little popularity as I have among my colleagues would be badly shattered if, on such a warm day, I were to attempt such a thing.

I must admit that I am always a little embarrassed when replying to the sponsor of a bill because that infers that I am the anti-sponsor for the Conservative Party. All my life I have tried not to add to the troubles of my party by being their spokesman. They have troubles enough of their own. While, by assignment—being a willing soldier, I do what I am told—I speak for the party from time to time, I may enfold the odd comment on my own for which the party, God help it, should not be responsible at any time.

I was impressed by the magnitude of this measure which, in terms of its space in Hansard in either house, occupies a miniscule space. Last night, when Senator Haidasz mentioned that this amounts to 89 per cent of the CIDA budget for international institutions alone, that means that this little bill, this small measure, is a very important one.

All of us know that, while Canada has problems, enormous difficulties, which are not being resolved or ameliorated, even a benevolent person like myself can wax reasonably despondent, if not eloquent, about our problems. More than that, we know there is no possibility that we could nurture and nourish a prosperity of our own, independent of the world about us, where the complexity of human problems and the enormity of economic deprivation increases alarmingly day after day.

Lincoln said that no nation can live half slave and half free. We cannot deny the Barbara Wards and the Willy Brandts of this world who say that this globe of ours cannot go on indefinitely with masses and masses of people living on the rugged and ragged threshold of poverty and want; and a few countries—the few that are going to be in this city this month—living in affluence. We are so affluent that one of the "smart" things we do is pollute our environment because we manufacture so much, we develop so many things we do not need.

I walked down Elgin Street past a drycleaning establishment. As a special bargain it offers to narrow your necktie for $7.50. My God! If the size of our ties is so important to us, I wonder if we can possibly save the Third World. That, honourable senators, is affluence. We have it; we might throw it away and suffer ourselves. Unless we diminish at least a bit of it, we will find a world that cannot, will not and should not tolerate such gnawing and awful inequalities.

In 1959, when my party was in power—we so seldom are, so much the worse for the country, but we cannot quarrel with democracy—I attended the United Nations to hear the President of the General Assembly closing the session by saying that every General Assembly has a name, and he named some of them. He said that that one was the "African Assembly" because, in that year, so many countries of Africa became independent. When I was a boy—and there are a few here who are older than I am, but not many look much older—I remember looking at a map of Africa. The great areas coloured red were British; the areas coloured green were French; and some other areas were Spanish, but there were no areas, except for two little exceptions, that were African. Those areas were known as Liberia and Abyssinia. The rest of the continent belonged to some other nation.

In our lifetimes, that has changed. It is good to see profound social advancement in one's own lifetime. For this reason, I was delighted that our government and our country are making some special arrangements and are taking a special interest in the great human problems of the tremendous, massive, challenging, dynamic and, to us, different continent of Africa.

I notice the items which Senator Haidasz mentioned last night and which appear in this bill.

Of course, I was heartened by the reference to the Caribbean Development Bank's Special Development Fund. I have always thought that the Caribbean is an area of special challenge to us and of special opportunity. I have discussed in this chamber the reasons why I think we should be able to do more for those people and why we must do more. I should like to think that, in this area, the interest of Canadians might be the difference between a successful economy and a prosperous equality for many of these people and something far less desirable.

I used to be very proud that CIDA did not go around with a litmus paper to test the ideology of countries. I, as a scholar, admired Woodrow Wilson. What disturbed me about him was that he was constantly talking about the countries that were good and the countries that were bad. "We must get the Latin Americans to choose good governments, and we must have nothing to do with those who are not good." But Canada used to be devoid of that self-righteousness. That is why I was not overly enthusiastic about the move by the present minister, Mr. MacGuigan, in cutting Cuba out. I ask: Where do we go next? We do not totally approve of Cuba. Do we totally approve of Chile? Do we turn our backs on South Africa? Are there any countries in Europe—perhaps in the east—that do things that we do not think are totally commendable? Are there other regimes in Latin America which, while they may not be left wing, might be somewhat flippant about human rights? Then you start bringing out the litmus paper and test this one and that one. You may end up with very, very few friends. I used to think it was a wholesome Canadian attitude that we are interested in trying to help the lot of people and not in going around putting the imprimatur of approval on ideologies. We will see how helpful we will be in all of this.

There are many aspects of such measures, honourable senators, which one could question and about which one could be uncertain. I have always believed in a strong international relations program. As I get older I get more realistic and I see more of the flaws. I hope I am not so far gone that I have such a mote that I cannot see anything beyond that. Far from it, I hope.

There are problems. Some of our programs are not as successful as we would like; some of our programs are not as successful as we would hope. But that would be a very poor excuse for cutting them off. Perhaps in the long run it is not just a matter of big business expertise and technology, although we are told it is in our best interests to help these countries because some day we will get trade and it is a bit sissy and mundane to talk about international charity. I am not sure that we are smart in moving away from that earlier view.

I was at a breakfast meeting the other day with the President of CIDA and the Parliamentarians for World Order, of which I am now a member since they no longer devote themselves to that nonsense of world federalism. I was impressed by that man. I think he has tremendous insight, immense efficiency and great capacity. He told a very interesting story. I hope I am not transgressing by relating this, but it happened to be about a very dear friend of mine, King Gordon, whom I heard in Charlottetown almost 45 years ago when he spoke at a church. At that time he was considered a communist. Perhaps he was—I do not know. He had a reaction against the heavy religion of his father who was a prominent clergyman.

King Gordon was talking to the President of CIDA not long ago, and he said he had rejected the Christian concepts as a young person. He said he rationalized his whole international activity in other ways, in more sophisticated and perhaps quasi-technical ways. He was a very distinguished international civil servant. He said, "Now at my age"—and he is an old man although he does not look or act it—"I still believe in all of these things. I now base them on the very simple concepts of faith, hope and charity which was what I rejected years ago."

Although they sound very impressive, and they are in bankers' terms of millions of dollars, I think that in the long run we are for these measures because we believe in a better world, and because we believe that our country with all its faults is, among the members of the international community, a great country.

While we must avoid self-righteousness—and we are accused of that in our speeches but I do not think in our actions—Canadian participation in the world since 1945—it was lousy before that under Mackenzie King—and in later days led us to believe in things, and we have put our actions where our beliefs led us. I am sure I speak for my party when I say we are in support of this bill. We hope that someone has learned the salutary lesson of not having these things done in defiance of parliamentary supremacy. We wish rapid progress for this bill and, like Senator Asselin, we will find opportunities, whether we are going to be here all summer or not—and I hope those were joking words by Senator Frith—to discuss foreign affairs and external aid in a broader capacity.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Stanley Haidasz moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

EXCISE TAX ACT EXCISE ACT

DIVISION ON MOTION FOR SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, before we move to the next item on the Order Paper, I would like to make a brief statement respecting the vote on the motion for the second reading of Bill C-57, to reconcile it with Rule 49.

I am recommending that the Minutes read as follows:

The Senate resumed the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Barrow, seconded by the Honourable Senator Graham, for the second reading of the Bill C-57, intituled: "An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas".

After debate,

It was—

Ordered, That the question be deemed to have been resolved in the affirmative by a division of yeas 45 and nays 22.

Honourable senators, is that agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

ATLANTIC REGION FREIGHT ASSISTANCE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Côtteau, for the second reading of Bill C-73, to amend the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I rise with some trepidation to deal with this bill after having listened to the eloquence of my two colleagues, Senator Macquarrie and Senator Asselin. I fear that I cannot equal the philosophical and eloquent content or standard which they set.

Senator Frith: Or even the impecuniosity.

Senator Smith: You may well be right. In fact, you might be hard put to find anything of praise that I might equal. However, I would venture that perhaps there may be some areas in which I might not fall too far behind them. In any event, I wish to express to both of them my very warm congratulations for not only the eloquent but also the useful thoughts which they placed before us in such an interesting way.

Turning to this bill, I suppose one of them might very well make the same kind of philosophical concept out of it but, essentially, it deals very much with a bread and butter issue, namely, the payment of subsidies for the transportation of goods in the Atlantic region.

Last evening we heard Senator Côtteau explain very clearly and thoroughly the reason for this bill. Of course, it falls into the same class as those mentioned by others, and, particularly, by Senator Macquarrie, which are before us in order to remedy a trespass upon the rights of Parliament and the traditions of parliamentary procedure, and, indeed, the rights of people, which has been perpetrated by this government in recent years and which was caught by the Speaker of the House of Commons upon the objection there raised by a member of the party to which I have the honour to belong.

● (1550)

Senator Côtteau mentioned two pieces of legislation—the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act and the Maritime Freight Rates Act. That legislation, particularly the Maritime Freight Rates Act, came only after many years of struggle in the maritime provinces, as they then were, to claim the right which was promised as an inducement to enter Confederation, namely, appropriate assistance in moving goods manufactured in that part of the country into the central part of Canada.

As time went on, after the Maritime Freight Rates Act in 1927, modes of transportation changed and it became apparent that it was not appropriate to supply this kind of transportation assistance only to rail transportation, but that it should be widened to include road transportation—transportation by truck.

Senator Côtteau mentioned last night the principle which led to the trespass upon the rules of procedure in the other place, and that one of the provisions of these pieces of legislation was that if one were going to give assistance to truckers, then one could go only so far in providing that assistance, as there could be a saving in assistance given to railway transport.

It soon became apparent that this was a principle that could not equitably or reasonably be enforced, and the government of the day—this was some years ago—decided to overcome the difficulty simply by using a device in the estimates to revive. That device came a cropper just a few days ago in the other house, hence we are faced with this piece of legislation.

I recommend the bill most warmly to the house. I hope that the bill will be passed. I say that, not with any passing interest but in the realization that this is part of the life blood of that part of the country from which I come.

One statement in Senator Côtteau's speech last night made me shudder, namely, his closing comment, which appears at page 2705 of Hansard for July 6. He said:

It should be noted that the entire subsidy program is under review and that more substantive changes may be made in due course.

That comment makes me shudder, because every time I have heard of a financial assistance program being under review, such a review has not resulted in doing any good to anyone who had previously benefited from the program. Therefore, I hope—and I know that Senator Côtteau will be of the same mind—that if such a review is ever undertaken, it will not be carried out with the object of seeing how much of the program can be discontinued to the disadvantage of the residents of the Atlantic provinces.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Ernest G. Côtteau moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Lucier for the second reading of Bill C-72, to amend the National Housing Act.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I believe this is the last of the eight bills we had to deal with in view of the ruling of Her Honour the Speaker in the other place. Like the others, this bill was discussed when the estimates were being considered and when it was before the other place. As was mentioned by the sponsor, the bill contains two clauses.

The first deals with what is called the residential rehabilitation program. I should mention at this time that when I speak of the effect of that program, I am speaking only of what I have known and heard in one part of the country. My remarks might not apply to the larger centres. The bill increases the appropriation for this purpose from $100 million to $230.5 million.

It should be stressed that this is not all new money. The original act authorized $100 million. That figure was raised to $170 million by various votes contained in earlier estimates; and the vote for the 1981-82 estimates would have increased the limit by $59.8 million. That, in effect, is the new money which is authorized under this bill.

The program is a good one. It enables people to repair or renovate their homes when necessary. The program has been particularly advantageous to those who own their own homes but who have a fairly low income and find it almost impossible to undertake any necessary repairs, renovations or maintenance without assistance. That has been particularly true, not only of people on low incomes but also of those who receive the Old Age Pension and the supplement. Such people are able to pay for the necessities of life, but there is little left to enable them to repair their property, particularly these days when the cost of such repairs is extremely high.

I am concerned, however, as to whether the $59.8 million increase provided under this bill is sufficient to carry out the program at the present time. Personally, I do not think it is, but since we cannot increase the figure, we shall have to accept it. However, I am of the opinion that more consideration should be given to raising the amount available for that program.

The second clause of the bill deals with what might be called low rental housing. That too is a good program and a necessary one. Rental is based on the income of those who occupy such houses. My only objection is that not nearly enough low income housing is being built. It might be said that the money is not available, but personally I consider this to be one of the better programs and I would like to see the low rental housing program developed.

It would be helpful in two ways. First, it would be helpful to those who occupy such homes and everyone in Canada should be able to have a decent home, one which he or she can afford. Secondly, such a program would be helpful to the economy. I believe it is generally understood that the construction industry provides an impetus to the economy, and such a program would provide great economic impetus at a time when it is needed. It would provide more employment. Therefore, I would like to see the government embark upon a major program in connection with low rental housing.

● (1600)

I notice that the minister in the other place mentioned the fact that nowadays the act does not apply to all of the provinces because this was a partnership agreement between the federal and provincial governments. I do not know just what provinces have opted out, or what the situation is at the present time; but this section of the act is applied to supporting rural and native housing programs and the servicing of land held by the federal and provincial partnership. This, too, is a very worthy objective.

It should be remembered that when the act speaks of $1,504,500,000, that is not new money. The original act mentioned $150 million. That was again increased over the years by these votes in the estimates to about $1.4 billion. The 1981-82 estimates provided for another $112.5 million. This is what would be the new money. This also, I think, is a very worthy program, and one which deserves support.

I suppose we should state that a great deal has been accomplished, but much, much more needs to be done. For some of these low rental places there are long waiting lists. I know of people who have had their names on the lists for over two years, and in each community they cannot build them all at once; they have to spread them out. The result is that there area a great many people looking for low income housing or senior citizen housing who cannot obtain it at the present time.

With these few remarks, I will say again that we, on this side, support the bill and, once more, see no need to send it to a committee for further study.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I want to add a few comments on this bill.

In addition to supporting the words of my colleague, Senator Macdonald, I would like to say that I think the RRAP program is probably one of the best ever produced by the government. It started back in 1974 and has literally changed small communities which were very poor. One of its objectives was to give loans of up to $10,000 to people with an income of $6,000 or less, with a forgiveness factor of $3,750, depending on their actual income.

The reason I speak of this is that it surprises me that we are now introducing three other bills—Bills C-77, C-76 and C-75—which, in my view, are not needed. This is just another example of government bureaucracy building up pyramids of new staff and sending people across the country creating confusion in the minds of the people to whom the programs are directed.

In the other place I supported the RRAP program for many years. Just listen to what it does. It says, in this information sheet:

Priority will be given to repair of the housing structure and upgrading the insulation to increase thermal efficiency and to improving the plumbing, electrical and heating systems. In addition, non-profit corporations may obtain funds under this program for conversion of existing properties. The nature and quality of repair work should ensure a further useful life of the property of about 15 years. To assist in improving the appearance of neighbourhoods, some work to enhance the external appearance of the dwelling unit and its immediate surroundings is eligible.

This covers everything, and it covers everything for people who cannot afford to repair their houses in order to provide that extra 15 years' life. Now the government comes out with a home insulation program and says, "If you will spend $350 we will give it back to you." But where are these people going to get the $350? The bank manager is not going to give it to them, because they are on welfare.

Then the government comes along with the HIP program for two provinces, and yet another program, the CHIP program, and finally a third one, the CUSP program. All of these things, however, were already covered under the RRAP program. All the government had to do was enlarge and expand it and put all the money into the one place for the good of the people who cannot afford to conserve energy or change from one type of energy to another.

As I indicated before, a person with a $6,000 income or less, can borrow $10,000 and have $3,750 forgiven. For each additional $1,000 of income they lose $750; so that people with an income of up to $11,000 can take advantage of the program.

I read in the paper the other day that the government is going to discontinue 50 laws that are obsolete; but before they repeal them they will have another 150 programs in place. This is exemplified by this introducing of new programs at the whim of someone in the bureaucracy, with the object of wasting money and confusing the people when there is already in place the best program ever introduced in Canada. I refer, of course, to the RRAP program.

I may not have explained myself properly, but I say the government should review the intent of this, and the minister should look at it, rather than having deputy ministers, and so forth, saying, "Let's find something else to do to give somebody a better job and confuse people."

I get letters upon letters upon letters saying, "How can I get in on this program? Somebody came around and hired students, but they don't know what the program is all about."

These persons go and confuse the people, who do not know what they are getting. They turn them down. What happens is that one person gets into the program who is in the same financial position as his neighbour, but the person next door does not, because of inadequacy and inefficiency. Only confusion results from the web, the jungle, of bureaucracy that is inflicted on the people of Canada.

I agree wholeheartedly with the RRAP program, into which the government should put many more millions of dollars, and save more homes, because, for example, in Newfoundland there are people who own their own homes but cannot afford to repair them, and this is giving them the opportunity to do so. Let us therefore not overwhelm them with new programs which are no good to them. What is the good of insulating a home if it has a leaky roof? That is the thing you have to do before you institute such a program, or it is of no benefit.

I point these things out to support my suggestion that there should be a review, and I can say that many people in CMHC agree with the approach I am taking.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

[Senator Marshall.]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Paul Lucier moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

EL SALVADOR

POLITICAL, MILITARY AND SOCIAL SITUATION—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Macquarrie calling the attention of the Senate to

(1) the increasingly dangerous political, military and social situation in El Salvador;

(2) the compelling hazards of third party interventions and the possibility of the escalation of hostile actions within El Salvador;

(3) the further compelling importance of the resolution of the conflict by means of a political settlement rather than through recourse to sustained and bloody armed conflict; and

(4) the value of Canadian encouragement and support of the efforts of those individuals and groups seeking mediation of the conflict in El Salvador.—
(Honourable Senator Murray).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I ask Senator Murray to yield the floor to me temporarily so that I may furnish some material that is intended to be in answer to certain questions put by Senator Macquarrie at the end of my earlier intervention on this matter.

● (1610)

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, the Deputy Leader of the Government indicated to me earlier that he would like my consent to do so, and I am happy to give it on the understanding that I will then move the adjournment of the debate again.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the first question was whether there would be value in further developing the Canadian presence in Central America. That question arose out of the emphasis that I had placed on the already important role that Canada plays in its sphere of influence, if it can be called that, in the Caribbean, and the suggestion that perhaps other countries with a stronger presence in Central America would be better advised to bring their influence to bear on the El Salvador question ahead of Canada.

The material I developed in answer to that question is really an amplification of what I said in my intervention. On that question I will ask if the question can be taken as read. Senator Macquarrie will then have a chance to look at that and perhaps say something further when he closes the debate on the inquiry. For that matter, some other senator may want to comment on it as well.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that the answer be taken as read?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Canada's undertakings abroad are, of necessity, tempered by the resources available in terms of personnel and materiel. Those resources we do have are understandably concentrated in priority areas vital to our foreign policy interests. While Canada's concerns at developments in El Salvador, particularly in terms of the high level of violence and the continuing disregard for human life, were clearly stated by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on June 16, 1981 in his statement in the House of Commons, it remains true that our direct links with El Salvador have not historically been as great as those with other areas such as the Commonwealth Caribbean.

In my statement on June 18, I referred to Canada's commitment to bringing about an intensification of ties with the states of the Commonwealth Caribbean, an area in which we have been actively involved for generations. It is an area with which we have significant commercial ties dating back to the days when salt cod and pitch pine were exchanged for rum and molasses. People-to-people links are strong and large Caribbean communities exist in most major Canadian cities. Over 400,000 Canadians visit the Commonwealth Caribbean each year and we have a close development cooperation relationship with the states of the region. Since the inception of its program in the area in 1959, CIDA has disbursed some $300 million, and the area is the highest per capita recipient of Canadian assistance. Political links with the states of the region are good and we share such intangibles as common language, institutional structures, loyalty to the Commonwealth and similar traditions of democracy. Accordingly, in 1980 the national government confirmed, as official policy, that the Commonwealth Caribbean is and will continue to be a region of major interest to Canada.

However, despite these considerations the national government does share Senator MacQuarrie's concern for those unfortunate Salvadorans forced to flee their country on account of the violence, and Canadian officials remain active in working to alleviate their suffering. At present, resources committed to immigration matters at our embassy in Mexico are considered sufficient to deal with the problem of persons fleeing El Salvador. Immigration officials from the embassy in Mexico visit Honduras and other states of the area on a regular basis to interview candidates and report on conditions there. Canada is in close contact with the United Nations High Commission for Refugees (UNHCR) which is working with refugees in the area, and the national government is currently considering a special contribution to the UNHCR in response to an appeal for financial assistance for work with Salvadorans. At present, the UNHCR is of the view that a special refugee resettlement program is not needed for Salvadorans, believing that local resettlement with eventual repatriation when conditions permit is the most realistic approach to the problem.

Canada also continues to support the humanitarian efforts of the International Committee of the Red Cross in El Salvador and consideration is being given to a second special contribution to this organization. As I noted in my statement of June 18, Canada announced in February, 1981 a contribution of $250,000 to the ICRC in favour of El Salvador.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, Senator Macquarrie's remaining questions had to do with the Organization of American States. On the occasion of my earlier intervention Senator Macquarrie and I both felt that we would like to see a larger participation of Canada in the OAS, and his second question then had to do with whether the monitoring of elections by the Organization of American States was a practical objective.

In answer to that I say that President Duarte is on record as favouring the monitoring of elections for a Constituent Assembly in 1982 by the OAS. The OAS has not, however, received an official request from El Salvador to undertake this role. Both the Secretary General and the majority of permanent representatives of the OAS appear to believe that the OAS is uniquely suited to carry out a role of this nature and would likely provide overwhelming support to carry out a monitoring role if requested by both the government of El Salvador and the opposition FDR. Were the FDR not to lend its support, however, it would not be possible to predict the result.

Senator Macquarrie's next question was whether it would be useful for Canada to become a full member of the OAS. Incidentally, the answers to all these questions consist of material I obtained from the department when I undertook to answer the questions. The answer is that Canada has maintained a Permanent Observer Mission to the Organization of American States since 1972 and has participated as a full and active member in a number of important inter-American organizations including the Inter-American Development Bank, the Pan-American Health Organization and the Inter-American Institute for Cooperation on Agriculture. However, the national government is not actively pursuing, at the present time, any change in its current status as a permanent observer within the OAS itself, and believes that it would be more effective for Canada to concentrate its efforts and scarce resources on developing our relations with the individual countries of Latin America.

Senator Macquarrie's final question had to do with whether the countries of Latin America did not expect Canada to become a full member of the OAS, if Canada is genuinely interested in furthering its relations with the area.

The answer is that the subject is still occasionally raised by some of the smaller countries of Latin America, but not by the larger ones. The national government believes that the countries of Latin America attach similar value and importance to improving relations on a bilateral basis—and that is “bilateral” as used in the answer to the previous question.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, against the possibility that some honourable senator may wish to deal with this subject some time before this session is prorogued, I should like to move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Murray, debate adjourned.

GOVERNMENT POLICY—MOTION TO REFER SUBJECT MATTER OF INQUIRY TO BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Murray, seconded by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.:

That the subject-matter of the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Argue, P.C., which appeared on the Orders of the Day on November 20, 1980, be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Stand.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, on a point of order, can the Deputy Leader of the Government tell us whether, if he does not intend to proceed with this matter, we can expect him to allow it to come to a vote at some early stage?

Senator Frith: At some stage, honourable senators, yes.

Senator Murray: At some early stage? Before the prorogation of this session?

Senator Frith: No, that is not my intention, honourable senators.

Order stands.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

CUSTOMS TARIFF IRISH FREE STATE TRADE AGREEMENT ACT, 1932 UNION OF SOUTH AFRICA TRADE AGREEMENT ACT, 1932 UNITED KINGDOM TRADE AGREEMENT ACT, 1937

BILL TO AMEND AND TO REPEAL—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. A. Irvine Barrow, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, presented the following report:

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to which was referred the Bill C-50, intituled: "An Act to amend the Customs Tariff and to repeal the Irish Free State Trade Agreement Act, 1932, the Union of South Africa Trade Agreement Act, 1932 and the United Kingdom Trade Agreement Act, 1937", has, in obedience to the order of reference of Thursday, May 21, 1981, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

A. I. BARROW,
Deputy Chairman

He said: Honourable senators, with leave, I should like to make some comments in connection with the committee's examination of this bill.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Barrow: Honourable senators, in its consideration of Bill C-50 the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce came to the conclusion that the bill in itself was deficient in three areas:

1. It proposed to amend tariff item No. 47810-1, to impose tariff duty on materials for use in dental reconstructive surgery;
2. Evacuated blood collection tubes used by public hospitals, the Canadian Red Cross and accredited private laboratories would become subject to a 15.7 per cent duty; and
3. It was proposed that public hospitals would no longer be able to import products free of duty unless they were able to find specific exemption in the customs tariff.

The committee objected to the foregoing because:

1. In the first case, the purpose of the bill was to protect the sole Canadian manufacturer of dental materials, Johnson & Johnson. Johnson & Johnson manufactures dispersalloy and amalgam used in filling teeth. Estimates as to the cost of reintroducing duties on materials for use in dental reconstruction surgery differ; however, the additional cost will have to be borne either by the dentists or their patients, and no matter which figures are more accurate the committee found the aggregate annual cost to dentists or their patients to be unacceptably high in relation to the small number of jobs intended to be protected by the proposed amendment;

2. With respect to evacuated blood collection tubes the committee has heard evidence to the effect that Becton Dickinson, the sole Canadian manufacturer, has obtained a substantially larger share of the Canadian market since the announcement of the proposed tariff protection, at the expense of Terumo Medical Corporation and another competitor who import their products. Terumo has indicated that it intended to establish manufacturing operations in Montreal, but is in danger of losing its distribution based in Canada, in which case it would not be able to proceed to establish such facilities. Faced with an anticipated monopoly situation, and the discouragement of the establishment of a second Canadian manufacturer in operation in Canada, the committee was of the view that tariff exemptions should continue to apply until such time as Terumo were able to commence its Canadian operations;

3. The public hospitals in Canada are under great pressure to reduce costs and improve efficiency. To be subject to increased customs duties would oblige them to reduce the level or quality of their services, or both.

[Senator Barrow.]

The conclusion of the Tariff Board report, which was cited in favour of the amendment, was to the effect that while the relative costs to public hospitals of the amendment might be insignificant, the total cost was not. The committee felt that this conclusion was sufficient to justify the maintenance of a tariff exemption for all items imported by public hospitals.

The foregoing conclusions were communicated to the minister, who then appeared before the committee. Subsequent to appearing before the committee the minister has given certain undertakings. These were addressed to the Honourable Salter A. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, in a letter, as follows:

Dental Materials

Upon completion of the review of the dental supply industry, which is currently being conducted by officials of the Departments of Finance, and Industry, Trade and Commerce, I will introduce amendments to the Customs Tariff to provide duty-free entry for those dental supplies for which demand in Canada is judged to be too small to support production in this country. If the review should indicate that the tariffs currently applicable to dental amalgam and other dental materials of a kind manufactured in Canada are higher than would be absolutely necessary to maintain production in Canada, the legislative amendments referred to above will provide, as well, for lower rates of duty on these products.

I expect to be in a position to propose such amendments at the time of the next Budget. Your Committee would, of course, have an opportunity to review them when the relevant Bill is before Parliament.

With regard to blood collection tubes, provided Terumo were to give the minister an undertaking to proceed as quickly as possible with a processing of its FIRA application, and subject to FIRA approval to the construction of manufacturing facilities in Canada, the minister undertakes to seek the authority to pass an order in council immediately after passage of Bill C-50, providing remission relief to Terumo with respect to the specified quantity of tubes based on Terumo's market share as at October 28, 1980, for a one-year period.

● (1410)

Remission of duty would cease immediately if FIRA were to refuse Terumo's application.

The minister also undertakes to seek the authority to renew the remission order for a further period of one year if Terumo has by then complied with the FIRA requirements and has otherwise proceeded on schedule to implement its plans to establish a manufacturing base in Canada, and provided that Terumo supply financial information to justify the need for a continued remission.

I refer again to the letter. It reads:

Goods Used by Hospitals

I remain of the view that it is unnecessary to add public hospitals to the list of institutions eligible for the benefits of tariff item 69605-1 because there are a large number of other tariff items which accord duty-free entry to goods of a kind used by hospitals. It is my belief that these other items, taken together, provide hospitals with duty-free entry privileges at least equivalent to those that will be accorded to universities and other organizations named in item 69605-1, and without the administrative problems that would be associated with adding hospitals to the list of beneficiaries of item 69605-1.

Nevertheless, if it should develop that the amendments contained in Bill C-50 result in the collection of significant amounts of customs duty on hospital equipment and supplies which are not available and are not likely to become available from Canadian production, I will take measures to provide for the duty-free entry of such goods on a case-by-case basis, either by means of remission orders under the Financial Administration Act or amendments to the Customs Tariff . . .

Yours sincerely,

Pierre Bussi res

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Barrow, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading later this day.

Motion agreed to.

EXCISE TAX ACT EXCISE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. A. Irvine Barrow, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, presented the following report:

Wednesday, July 8, 1981

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to which was referred the Bill C-57, intituled: "An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas," has, in obedience to the order of reference of Tuesday, July 7, 1981, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

A. I. BARROW

Deputy Chairman

He said: Honourable senators, I should like to make some comments in connection with this bill, and I would ask leave of the Senate to do so.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Barrow: Honourable senators, on January 26, 1981, Bill C-57, intituled: "An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas," was introduced in the House of Commons.

On May 19, 1981, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce tabled a preliminary report on the subject matter of the bill.

On June 22, 1981, the bill was passed by the House of Commons. On June 23, 1981, the bill was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Subsequent to the tabling of the preliminary report on the subject matter of the bill and prior to the reference of the bill to the committee, the committee had heard representations from Dome Petroleum Limited and Canadiana Garden Products Inc.

Canadiana Garden Products is a Canadian-owned manufacturer of garden equipment. One of its series of products, Rototillers, also known as cultivators, has heretofore been exempt from federal sales tax.

Subclause 30(3) of the bill proposes to amend Part IV of Schedule III to the Excise Tax Act by adding the following:

● (1415)

30. Agricultural machinery and parts therefor.

31. . . . farm implements and farm equipment; spraying and dusting machines and attachments therefor; parts of all the foregoing; all the foregoing when for use on the farm for farm purposes only.

Items enumerated in Part IV of Schedule III are exempt from federal sales tax.

The issue is whether Rototillers should be considered to fall under paragraph 30 as agricultural machinery and therefore be unconditionally exempt from sales tax or whether they should be considered to fall under paragraph 31, which would exempt them from federal sales tax only if they are for use on the farm for farm purposes only.

Canadiana Garden Products indicated that they had received conflicting verbal opinions from the officials of the Department of National Revenue as to whether Rototillers are exempt from federal sales tax or not. Several other Canadian manufacturers had been advised that Rototillers were exempt.

The department has finally concluded that Rototillers are farm implements or equipment. Therefore, they maintain that they are subject to sales tax if sold for other than commercial agricultural purposes. This is open to challenge, and the taxpayer may be able to have the Tariff Board declare otherwise.

In the meantime, there remains the problem that Canadian manufacturers who were misinformed have not collected tax which they should have since January 1, 1981.

The committee took up this question with the officials of the Department of Finance. As a result, the following letter, signed by the Honourable Pierre Bussi res on behalf of the Honourable Allan MacEachen, was received. This letter was addressed to the Honourable Senator Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. The letter is dated July 7, 1981.

Dear Senator Hayden:

I refer to discussions between my officials and your Committee with respect to the potential impact of the Bill C-57 proposals affecting roto-tillers. As I understand the issue, roto-tillers manufactured in Canada for sale to householders, and to other persons who are not commercial producers of farm products, became subject to federal sales tax on January 1, 1981. However, a few domestic manufacturers of these goods were subsequently advised by Revenue Canada officials, in error, that exemption continued to be available for their products. Consequently, those firms did not make a provision for the tax in the price charged to their customers until that erroneous information was corrected.

Your committee's concern is that the persons who were misinformed not be assessed retroactively for the tax that should have been included in the sale price of their goods.

I am sympathetic to your members' views that taxpayers who were misinformed should not be penalized. In that regard, I understand that the Honourable William Rompkey, Minister of Revenue, has decided to propose a remission of the tax otherwise payable on sales made by those taxpayers until the erroneous advice was corrected. The purpose of this letter is to advise you that I will support such a remission when Mr. Rompkey makes it.

Yours sincerely,

Pierre Bussi res

● (1420)

With respect to the National Energy Program, I would like to make the following remarks on behalf of the committee. First, I shall deal with marginal wells. The Canadian Petroleum Association recommended that marginal or stripper wells be exempted from the petroleum and gas revenue tax as any level of tax can only result in abandonment of such wells. I would like to read a part from our report made on May 19 in which we gave this conclusion:

In the view of the Committee, these wells should continue in production as their contribution on a collective basis is significant to Canada. Our tax and royalty systems should not be so onerous as to force the abandonment of marginal wells. If such proves to be the case, relief should be afforded these wells.

The committee is still of this view.

I would also like to refer to the Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline, dated March 1981, which report is entitled Enhanced Oil Recovery in Canada. On page 2 of that report it is stated:

Enhanced oil recovery is a high-risk venture which requires a favourable business climate and adequate producer revenues to realize its potential. The present federal-provincial deadlock over resources creates uncertainty and impedes EOR development.

Evidence placed before the Committee has led members to conclude that the risks associated with enhanced recovery are comparable with those in oil sands development, particularly in the early years when costs are high and the success of recovery schemes is in question.

The weight of evidence strongly suggests that further action is warranted at this time to encourage EOR development. The Committee believes that a re-examination of the costs and economic factors will support this view. Your Committee therefore recommends:

—The reference price for incremental oil produced from approved EOR projects be the same as the oil sands reference price having regard to quality differential.

or

—Incremental oil produced from approved EOR projects be exempt from the proposed Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax until capital costs are recovered.

—The tertiary supplement, used to achieve the EOR reference price, be paid through a method which allows producers an earlier return on investment. This presumably would be the fixed proportion method.

Injection materials represent a substantial portion of operating cost in enhanced oil recovery. Your Committee endorses the removal of the excise tax on natural gas and natural gas liquids injected into reservoirs in pressure maintenance and miscible flood schemes, and further recommends:

That natural gas and natural gas liquids used in approved enhanced recovery projects be exempt from the proposed Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax.

With respect to very heavy oil below 15° to 16° API where primary and secondary production is low:

Consideration should be given to applying the EOR reference price to the entire production.

● (1425)

It is recommended that serious consideration be given to the foregoing conclusions of this report.

The following was the general conclusion of the committee in its preliminary report on the National Energy Program:

The PGRT and the Excise tax on natural gas and natural gas liquids implement only part of the National Energy Program. Other aspects of the NEP are reflected in Bill C-48, in amendments to the Income Tax Act introduced by Bill C-54 and will be reflected in other legislation yet to be introduced.

Furthermore, other factors such as negotiations between the federal government and the energy producing provinces will have an important impact on the matters raised before the Committee. The Committee concludes that until all such matters are taken into account, it is not able to make any recommendation or comment, other than indicated above, with respect to the submissions made by the Canadian Petroleum Association, Mobil Oil Canada, Ltd., Gulf Canada Resources Inc. and the Independent Petroleum Association of Canada.

It is recommended that, once all such matters have come before the Senate, the National Energy Program be referred to a committee.

In view of the undertaking from the minister that I referred to earlier, the committee has referred the bill without amendment.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we are following a somewhat irregular procedure this afternoon because, as a rule, when we have a report from a committee respecting a bill to which no amendment is proposed, customarily the matter is not debated, but proceeds to third reading with no intermediate stage.

However, in connection with this particular report, I am grateful that the deputy chairman of the committee has seen fit to make an oral statement with respect to the proceedings of the committee on Bill C-57. The reason such an oral statement is necessary, I believe, is because, while it is our usual custom to submit a written report that all may read, on this occasion it has not proved practical to do so, for the simple reason that we hope we are approaching an adjournment of the Senate and the time span which would be required to secure translation in both official languages of the country would make it impractical to submit a report in written form. Therefore, today, we do not have the advantage of a written commentary, but we do have the advantage of the very constructive statement that has been made by the deputy chairman of the committee.

However, I should like to say something in connection with this matter because I hope that some of the points I make may find their way into the written report and reflect, to some degree, for the information of the chamber, the discussion that went on in committee this morning. It is true that we have had a pretty extensive pre-study of this bill, and for that I am grateful. Even so, in my opinion, we really had to compress our business unduly this morning to try to review this bill in the some three or four hours that were available to us when it was finally committed to us.

As a result of the pressure of time, some points I had in mind I was unable to develop in the committee, although I had the opportunity to mention that I intended to speak on them this afternoon. While they are not matters of first-class importance, they are worthy of consideration.

The first point has to do with clause 43 of the bill which prescribes the time period allotted for the tax collector to collect the 8 per cent PGRT and turn the money over to the crown. The time allotted is 30 days. Anyone who has been in business, particularly in western Canada, will realize that 30 days is a pretty short period, and a 90-day period might be better; otherwise, a good number of tax collectors will be financing the government for a period of time because they may not have collected the money within the 30 days. With interest at 22 per cent, that represents an exaction on the part of the public from these people who probably do not think much about collecting the tax in any case. I think that clause could have been looked at.

The next point I was concerned about was the provisions in the bill for the taxing of natural gas liquids. It seemed to me that, if we wanted to maximize the impact of the off-oil policy, which I am sure we all want to do, the possibility of using natural gas liquids for fuel in motor vehicles, trucks, tractors and whatnot is rather attractive. It might have been well to exempt that particular source of energy from the 8 per cent PGRT if it were used for that purpose. It seems to me that that would help the off-oil program along its way.

● (1430)

Another aspect of the off-oil program, which I found disappointing in the bill, was its provision for the manufacture of alcohol. If you examine clause 76 of the bill you will see that the restriction on the manufacture of alcohol for transportation fuel purposes is very much hedged in. In fact, it says that you can only be allowed to do this if it is solely for experimental and developmental purposes. I suggest that is far too narrow a restriction. In my own province of Manitoba, at Minnedosa, there is a plant now making alcohol out of cereal products of one kind or another for use in gasohol—a mixture of alcohol and gasoline. They are in business. I suggest we should encourage this off-oil activity.

In the United States, everybody knows that hundreds of thousands of gallons of alcohol are being manufactured and used as a substitute for gasoline, particularly in the agricultural sector of that great country. Surely that is what we want to do here. It seems to me it would have been helpful to have asked the minister to change his rules on the manufacture of alcohol so that, instead of limiting it to experimental and development purposes in small amounts, we should have made some provision for substantial manufacture because gasohol can be used at the present time without any change in the motors of the vehicles concerned if you do not use too rich a mixture. Obviously, it is a big factor in the off-oil program. I regret that the bill does not make provision for that particular point.

What I particularly want to draw attention to is the PGRT of 8 per cent that is being imposed in the nature of a royalty on the whole of the oil-producing industry of this country. I am not going to discuss the advisability of the particular tax in general, and I do not intend to mention the fact that its constitutionality is in some doubt, but I particularly want to zero in on the effect of this tax on the self-sufficiency program that the government is promoting. I am sure we all agree with the general thrust of the policy towards self-sufficiency, and I think we all want to see that succeed.

I took advantage of the pre-study sessions of the committee in respect of Bill C-57 to bring to their attention the fact that in southern Saskatchewan hundreds of oil wells have closed down. The reason for this is the imposition of the 8 per cent PGRT and that is the straw that breaks the camel's back. Due to that 8 per cent on these marginal wells—stripper wells, small wells—which were mentioned by the deputy chairman of the committee in his report, oil is being left in the ground. I am sure no sensible person thinks that is a good idea at the present time, when we are trying to maximize our domestic oil production and the possibilities for self-sufficiency. I hasten to say that this matter was raised in the pre-study of the bill by the committee, and that the committee made, I think, a very fair comment on that point. I would like to repeat it, because I think it reinforces the need to have it included in our present committee report.

In the view of the Committee, these wells should continue in production as their contribution on a collective basis is significant to Canada. Our tax and royalty systems should not be so onerous as to force the abandonment of marginal wells. If such proves to be the case, relief should be afforded these wells.

It is my belief that the committee, in its full study of the bill, has accepted that conclusion and re-endorses that finding. It seems to me significant that this particular fact should be placed on public record. Not only is this situation backstopped by information from oil companies themselves—Pan-Canadian Petroleum, alone, has closed down 4 million barrels worth of oil production on an annual basis in their part of Saskatchewan, and Husky Oil has done similarly, although I do not know the number of wells—but also the Premier of Saskatchewan has stated that, in his opinion, over a three-year period some 40 billion barrels of oil will be lost to that province in which the incidence—

Some Hon. Senators: Millions.

Senator Roblin: Thank you very much; I appreciate that correction. At times one gets so lost in these figures. I thank my honourable friends opposite, and I am flattered to know that they are listening that closely. Hopefully, they will continue to do so, in the event I make some other factual errors, and I would like to be corrected as soon as possible.

A large amount of oil—let us put it that way—will be left in the ground partly because of the incidence of this 8 per cent tax. It seems to me that we ought to take care to see that this situation is corrected.

There is another even more important aspect of the incidence of the 8 per cent tax on Canadian self-sufficiency which has recently come to notice. I would like particularly to thank my colleague, Senator Balfour, for bringing this matter to my attention, because he was a member of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline which made a very important third report in March. I have to confess that I did not appreciate the significance of some of the findings they made until it was brought to our attention by Senator Balfour. I had the opportunity of asking the committee to look at it this morning. As the deputy chairman has reported to the house, I think the committee has been seized of the essence of the matter, namely, that the incidence of the 8 per cent PGRT on what is called enhanced oil recovery may be very significant in connection with oil self-sufficiency.

[Senator Roblin.]

In connection with the enhanced oil recovery system, I think I can fairly describe it to honourable senators as not the primary production system—that is involved in the marginal wells; not the secondary production system—there you have water floods and things like that; but the tertiary or enhanced production system which gets oil out of the ground that is left behind by the primary and secondary extraction procedures.

How significant is that? It is rather significant because, according to the information contained in the report of the committee, we find that the potential for enhanced oil recovery is 4 billion barrels—I think I have the right letter, “b”, this time—and when you consider that the Canadian established conventional reserves are 6 billion barrels, you have some idea of what enhanced recovery may mean to this question of self-sufficiency in Canada.

This is where the Northern Pipeline Committee, I think, made a very useful and important contribution, at least, to my understanding of the matter. They pointed out that one of the things that is worrying the people in this particular field of enhanced oil recovery is the impact of the 8 per cent PGRT. As the deputy chairman of the committee pointed out to this chamber, they recommend that it be lifted until such time as the capital costs are recovered on enhanced oil recovery investment. I think they have an excellent point. They also point out that the enhanced recovery system offers a 50 per cent increase, if it is completely successful, in respect of the oil reserves of the country. Quoting from the summary of the report, they say:

Enhanced or tertiary recovery:

extends conventional production and the useful life of existing facilities reduces Canada's petroleum shortfall until new supplies from the frontier and oil sands become available contributes technology to Canada, with direct and spinoff benefits

The report then goes on to offer some recommendations as to how to achieve these objectives, and one of them is that the 8 per cent PGRT should be remitted on enhanced oil recovery investments until such time as the capital sums involved are returned to the investor.

I believe that these considerations are of some importance to our discussion of this bill. It has to be admitted that, again, due to the pressure of time and events, it seemed to be impractical for the committee at this sitting to proceed further into this matter, but it certainly is part of the committee's function, I suggest, to warn the Senate of some of the possibilities they envisage. In fact, in the preliminary report on the pre-study part of this bill, as the deputy chairman of the committee read into the record, we did come to the conclusion that we did not know enough about this subject in order to come to reasonable decisions on some matters connected with it. While the reservation in the pre-study report dealt only with the submissions by a number of oil companies, whose names were read into the record, I suggest our area of concern goes much further than what they had to say to us, because they were obviously speaking from a position of self-interest.

● (1440)

We have to look into the question of how pricing is affecting the production of conventional oil in this country. There was information tabled before the committee in its pre-study which indicated that in connection with conventional oil production in Saskatchewan, gross revenue in one field, the Lloydminster field—and others like it—clocks in at $16.72, and the producer netback is a loss of 42 cents. Now honourable senators will understand why the wells are being closed. That is 42 cents per barrel.

Senator Olson: Is the 8 per cent responsible for that?

Senator Roblin: It is certainly part of that. The 8 per cent tax is 76 cents; so if it did not bear the 76 cents tax that particular well would be making money.

Senator Olson: It is not as much as the 50 per cent which some other governments are taking.

Senator Roblin: I cannot get into that. That is something for your committee to look into. That is why I ask you to pay attention to that recommendation. I am the last one to pretend that this is anything but a very difficult matter. It would be false for me to suggest that I know the solutions to all these questions, but I do not think my honourable friend knows either. It would do both of us good to look into it a little further.

The same committee report indicates that in connection with exported oil from the south Saskatchewan fields, laid down at Chicago—Joliet, Illinois; that is close enough to Chicago to call it Chicago—the price to the customer was $43.60. When we go through everything that everyone takes off, by the time it gets back to the producer he has a loss of 84 cents on the production of that barrel of oil that he is sending to Chicago.

So honourable senators can see why there is a little trouble in the economics of the oil industry. If we go a little further and we take, for example, the relative profitability onshore, in North America, on per dollar invested in one million to five million barrel fields, the profit per dollar invested in 1981 in the United States is estimated to be $1.53, and the profit per dollar invested in Alberta is estimated to be 23 cents. I do not know whether or not these facts are correct. They are submitted by a party at interest, and I want to stress that; but it seems to me that that spread is remarkable. If one wonders why some elements of the Canadian oil industry are restless these days, with respect to whether they are going to drill in Canada or the United States, I think that gives us an idea of what is the basis of their concern.

I want to come back to my final point. I am not sure that I agree entirely with the wording expressed by the deputy chairman of the committee when he spoke about further study on this matter. I would like to have an opportunity to read what he said, or perhaps to read the final written report of the committee before I would agree with it entirely. But I think his heart is in the right place, because he is suggesting that what we need is a thorough study of the whole matter and that the piecemeal examination that we are now engaged in is not as productive as it might be.

When we consider the price impacts which I have just mentioned, surely somebody should be looking into that, if he is interested in Canadian self-sufficiency. If we are looking at the marginal wells situation, despite the fact that the minister and I might not agree with all the facts here, there is a nubbin of something there that we ought to look into. If we are thinking about enhanced recovery prospects, which have been reported by the pipeline committee, or of the off-oil situation and how to maximize it, or of the reservations that the committee itself mentioned in its pre-study report, everything indicates, to me, the desirability of having a study of this oil energy situation in all its aspects, not only on all the bills that are before us but on all the policies that are resulting therefrom, with a proper opportunity to validate, or not, the figures that have been given to the committee, and which I have given to you, and the concepts of self-sufficiency, marginal wells and enhanced recovery.

I believe that a prima facie case exists that these are problems, that energy has to be one of the biggest problems we have in this country; and we in the Senate might do the country a service if we were to take upon ourselves the responsibility of making a thorough examination of this whole matter.

I would hope—although I do not think the committee has set any time limit in its report to the house—that the leadership on the other side would decide that the first order of business when we return in the fall would be to take a look at this question to see what can be done to develop our thoughts and views on the facts. We need not listen to ministerial advisers alone; we certainly need not pay sole attention to those of the industry who have other axes to grind. We want to hear from consumers. There is a whole round of interests that should be considered, and a whole series of facts that should be established. If the committee's recommendation were to lead to that state of affairs, I, for one, would be very happy.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I certainly had not intended to make any remarks at this stage, but some comments have been made by Senator Roblin to which I should like to refer. If I might be so bold, I wish to say that the contribution of both honourable senators was most valuable and many questions have been raised that would warrant further study by an appropriate committee of the Senate; but, of course, the Senate will decide that.

Senator Roblin made the statement that the bill does not make provision—and I know he is right in that regard—for the possibility of commercial production of gasohol in any large measure, but provides for experimental development. I should like to point out—and I am sure the honourable senator knows this—that the whole question of gasohol being economic is a debatable one. I feel that the production of grain is designed basically for human consumption and, secondly, for livestock consumption, and to go out and produce grain as a substitute through this method—

Senator Roblin: Could it be wood—poplar trees?

Senator Argue: It could be wood, that is correct; but I was talking about grain gasohol. Grain is the material most often referred to when gasohol production is considered. I am making these remarks in relation to grain, and certainly pulp for gasohol, if feasible, would be quite acceptable. In my judgment, grain should first be produced for human consumption; secondly, for animal consumption; and, thirdly and as a last resort, as a substitute for petroleum.

With regard to the oil and service industries, the industry around Estevan and Weyburn, which, of course, is quite close to where I live—I am also acquainted, in a casual way, with the industry in the Lloydminster area—it is true that people who are associated with the service industry have experienced great difficulty and they have had to lay off workers. That has been brought about by the closing of what are sometimes called marginal wells. I believe that is another indication that the whole question needs to be solved. I believe the federal government is prepared and has been giving ground. An agreement can be made only if both parties are prepared to make the agreement. So I would express the hope that provinces will see the need for further progress. I am pleased that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has taken the lead in getting an acceptable policy.

With regard to Saskatchewan, the figures I have been given—I quote them from memory—indicate that a well in Saskatchewan, that has a monthly production of 755 barrels, would carry the 8 per cent federal production tax; but in Saskatchewan the provincial royalty is just a fraction of one per cent under 50 per cent—in other words, it is approximately 50 per cent of the production. That is a very onerous royalty. If you take 50 per cent plus another 8 per cent, the two together may make it very difficult for those marginal wells.

Criticism of the 8 per cent is one thing, but one should bear in mind that as far as Saskatchewan is concerned, and as far as these marginal wells are concerned—and that is not a very big producer: 755 barrels a month—it is really the provincial tax of 50 per cent that is causing the major trouble, and it has been there, of course, for some time.

The next figure I give is very much from memory, but I know it to be approximately correct, and that is that a well that is producing some 250 barrels a month—in other words, a very tiny producer—still has to pay a royalty to the Saskatchewan government of 29 per cent. I think, as far as allowing those marginal producers to keep on producing and make some kind of a net return is concerned, the action that is required is mainly in the hands of the Government of Saskatchewan. When we talk about the 8 per cent, remember very high royalties of up to 50 per cent are making it most difficult, as they have for many years, for these very marginal producers.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I can give my friend the figure, if he wants it, in connection with this export to the United States of which I spoke. There is a breakdown here of the percentage which goes to the various governments. The summary is that the Canadian federal take is 41 per cent; the Canadian provincial take is 51 per cent; and the producers' netback is -2 per cent.

Senator Argue: I was quoting precise statistics on precise wells in a precise province, and not Canadian averages.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Barrow, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading later this day.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

POST OFFICE

DISRUPTION OF SERVICE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. Are there new developments in the postal strike? Is there any hope that negotiations will be resumed? In view of the statement of the Prime Minister the day before yesterday to the effect that he would not ask Parliament to pass back-to-work legislation because Mr. Parrot has said he would refuse to obey it, is the government position still the same, that is, does it still maintain that it will be not introduce such a bill until such time as Mr. Parrot has assured the government he will obey it?

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, first of all, the expressed attitude of the national president of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, that he would rather go to jail than return to the bargaining table—

Senator Flynn: And you do not want him to go?

Senator Perrault: —will not, in the ultimate, influence the government's attitude towards this dispute. As I stated yesterday, the government is most anxious to have both sides return to the bargaining table voluntarily, and in a good, constructive spirit.

There has been an exchange of correspondence, which has just been made available to me, between the Honourable Don Johnston and the National President of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers. If I read these two letters, which are not over-lengthy, it may serve to indicate that at least some progress appears to have been made.

The first letter is from Mr. Jean-Claude Parrot, National President of the CUPW, dated July 7, 1981, to Mr. Donald Johnston, President, Treasury Board of Canada. The text of this letter, which has only now been released, is as follows:

Dear Mr. Johnston:

In an effort to break the current deadlock in the postal dispute, the Canadian Union of Postal Workers requests you to permit the involvement of Mr. Michael Warren, President Designate of the Canada Post Corporation, in direct negotiations.

It is obvious to the Union that Mr. Warren has a direct interest in the future of the Crown Corporation. The present contract that is being negotiated will extend several months after the establishment of a Crown Corporation on September 1st. In fact, as you are aware, the Union has even expressed interest in negotiating an 18-month contract which would expire as of June 30, 1982. As it is Mr. Warren, as President of the Crown Corporation, who will be responsible for administering the contract that is being presently negotiated, it is only logical that he be involved directly in the negotiations process.

However, it should be understood that, without prejudice to the position of both parties, there are no conditions for a return to the bargaining table providing that Mr. Warren will be present.

Yours truly,

Jean-Claude Parrot,
National President

Senator Flynn: It is "Parrot", not "Perrault". Watch that accent!

Senator Perrault: A reply has been sent by Mr. Johnston to the National President of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, the text of which is as follows:

July 8, 1981

Mr. Jean-Claude Parrot,
National President,
Canadian Union of Postal Workers,
280 Metcalfe Street,
Ottawa, Ontario.
Dear Mr. Parrot:

I wish to acknowledge your letter of July 7, 1981, which contained your proposal to return to the bargaining table "without prejudice to the position of both parties" and with "no conditions".

I welcome the indication that you are prepared to return to the bargaining table without the pre-conditions previously stated. However, the condition which you request in return for the dropping of pre-conditions has considerable implications which necessitate careful consideration.

My colleagues and I have serious reservations about requiring Mr. Warren to go to the bargaining table. He has been consulted from time to time and kept informed. However, at this very early stage in his association with the Post Office and at this initial phase in preparation for the proclamation of the legislation establishing the Canada Post Corporation, we believe it is preferable for him to devote his efforts to that end. To insert him into the middle of complex and difficult negotiations at this stage would be unfair to him, and could prejudice his future role in the Postal Corporation. It is our preference, as envisaged in the legislation, that all last collective agreements prior to the proclamation of the legislation be completed under the PSSRA, thus setting the stage cleanly for all first agreements to be negotiated by the Corporation under the Canada Labour Code. At that time Mr. Warren would be responsible and involved to the degree he determines.

However, I do welcome your initiative as a sign of a sincere desire to resume negotiations without pre-conditions. I believe that it and other possibilities which may exist should be explored further. To that end, I suggest that these possibilities be discussed through a designated representative for each side as soon as possible.

I trust that you will give favourable consideration to this proposal and look forward to your reply.

Yours sincerely,

Donald J. Johnston

Honourable senators, apparently communication links have been re-established between the Treasury Board and the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, and it is hoped bargaining will resume very shortly.

Senator Flynn: What are the dates of those letters?

Senator Perrault: The date of the letter from the National President of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers is July 7, and the reply of the President of the Treasury Board is dated July 8—that is, yesterday.

Senator Flynn: No, that is today.

Senator Perrault: Yes, that is today. It is today's reply to the letter from the President of the CUPW of yesterday. This is the latest information concerning the strike. I hope it is helpful to honourable senators.

● (1500)

Yesterday Senator Smith asked a question with regard to the Post Office payroll. The 1980 payroll for CUPW was approximately $372 million. The union's demands would have increased that payroll by 28 per cent.

Honourable senators, all further information will be brought to this chamber immediately.

LABOUR RELATIONS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—THREATENED STRIKE BY IWA—EFFECT ON NEWSPRINT SUPPLY

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I have a question for the government leader. He may be aware of the threatened IWA strike in the province of British Columbia which would have a devastating effect upon the supply of newsprint in Canada and abroad. The government leader may also be aware that the newsprint inventory of Canadian newspapers is very low. A supply of only several days of newsprint, at present levels of consumption, is now on hand.

I wonder if the government leader can advise us whether the federal government is contemplating any steps to ensure that such important organs of public interest as the Edmonton Journal, the Calgary Herald, and, of course, the Vancouver Province and the Vancouver Sun are supplied with enough newsprint to enable them to continue to express their voices fully in Canadian public affairs.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators are aware, of course, that the negotiations between the IWA and the employers are being undertaken in an area of provincial jurisdiction. However, the question will be taken as notice with respect to those aspects which relate to the national interest.

POST OFFICE

DELIVERY OF INCOME TAX REFUNDS AND PAYMENTS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I have a delayed answer to a question asked yesterday by Senator Marshall concerning the disposition of tax refund cheques during the postal strike.

Tax refund cheques now in the postal system will not be delivered until the end of the strike. However, cheques already processed, but not yet mailed, will be made available to taxpayers at district taxation offices. The department will also be looking at other possibilities for distribution. Cheques are currently being sorted and will be transferred to district offices some time next week.

Taxpayers who are required to file an income tax return or other information during the postal strike will not be penalized for late filing provided the envelope is postmarked within five calendar days of the termination of the strike, or hand-delivered to a district office. No extension will be allowed for returns that were due to be filed before the start of the strike.

Taxpayers who owe tax are required to make their payments either directly to their district taxation office or through a bank. Similarly, employers who have deducted income tax, Canada Pension Plan contributions and Unemployment Insurance premiums from their employees' salaries are required to remit those deductions through a bank or make arrangements for a pick-up through their district taxation office. Chartered banks have agreed to accept tax payments even if departmental remittance vouchers are not available. Banks will require the name, the account or social insurance number and the year in respect of which the payment is made. Large corporations and employers will be contacted by the department to arrange for pick-up of current remittances and instalment payments.

No taxpayer's right of objection will be prejudiced by the disruption of postal service. The usual 90-day limit for filing a notice of objection will be considered to begin with either the resumption of mail service or the date of the notice of assessment, whichever is the later. Similarly, there will be an extension of appeal periods that expire during the strike.

As can be seen, the government is doing as much as possible to assist everyone who is affected by the postal strike.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. With regard to the payment of taxes, the Leader of the Government has said that payment should be made directly to district taxation offices. However, in the case of payments which were put in the mail before the strike and which are not yet delivered, is it the position of the government that the taxpayer will have to pay interest if they arrive late?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I do not want to speculate on that point. However, I should think that if the letter is postmarked on a day before the commencement of the strike, interest will not be required. The question will be taken as notice.

Senator Flynn: The letter may not be postmarked.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. It is quite possible, I should think, that letters mailed before the strike actually started would not have been postmarked, simply because the people who would have been doing the postmarking were not on the job.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the point is a valid one and an inquiry will go forward. Certainly the government has ever in mind the welfare of the taxpayer of this country.

JUSTICE

ALLEGED URANIUM CARTEL—ACTION TAKEN BY ATTORNEY GENERAL OF CANADA

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government to obtain some information for us concerning the charges that have been laid by the Crown in the case of the alleged uranium cartel? Will the minister ascertain whether the action taken by the Attorney General of Canada within the last day or so completes the matter as far as he is concerned, or whether the Attorney General still has the matter under advisement? Will he also ascertain whether the government is providing counsel for the government officials who were named although not charged?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): I think we should give a delayed answer to that delayed question.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, charges were indeed laid in Toronto yesterday at 2.45 p.m. by Orest R. Sametz, a combines investigation officer, on behalf of the Attorney General of Canada.

It is important to note, of course, that because the matter is sub judice, public comment in any detailed fashion is inappropriate. It is a well-established fact that we do not discuss criminal matters that are before the courts.

A brief statement can be made, however. The Attorney General of Canada has made the decision to lay charges. He found the evidence sufficient to justify the laying of charges. He acted on advice from expert counsel—John W. Brown of Blake, Cassells & Graydon. The same advisor had been retained by Mr. Bertrand, the then Director of Investigation and Research, and Mr. Brown had continued his investigation through the period of the previous Conservative government.

No additional charges are contemplated. The list of 18 companies and three individuals named as co-conspirators is inclusive. Again, the Attorney General acted on the advice of expert counsel. The suggestion which has been advanced in various quarters that other individuals should be named is felt to be an improper proposal.

The report of the evidence will not be made public as it forms the basis of the Crown's case. However the results of the formal inquiry under section 17 of the Combines Investigation Act will become public on prosecution.

Certain opposition spokesmen in the other place have been asking for the repeal of the Uranium Information Security Regulations. I have been advised by the Associate Deputy Minister (Litigation) that, in view of the 1980 decision of the Federal Court of Appeal in the McManus case, the regulations cannot interfere with the calling of evidence under prosecution. Mr. McManus, the Director of Planning and Administration at the Atomic Energy Control Board, was examined as a witness under section 17 of the Combines Investigation Act. The assistant deputy minister is of the view that the regulations do not operate as a bar. The minister has indicated privately that if there is any indication that the regulations do impede prosecution or defence, it might be appropriate to look into an amendment.

I have been advised by the office of the Minister of Justice that no counsel need be retained for the two public servants named as co-conspirators, as they will appear only as witnesses.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

ATTEMPTED TAKEOVER OF CANADA PERMANENT MORTGAGE CORPORATION BY GENSTAR CORPORATION

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government whether any federal government agency or ministry is investigating the attempted takeover of the Permanent, which is the third largest trust company in Canada, by Genstar, which is not a wholly Canadian-owned company.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice. I have no information on that point.

BILL TO AMEND AND TO REPEAL—THIRD READING

Hon. A. I. Barrow moved the third reading of Bill C-50, to amend the Customs Tariff and to repeal the Irish Free State Trade Agreement Act, 1932, the Union of South Africa Trade Agreement Act, 1932, and the United Kingdom Trade Agreement Act, 1937.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

EXCISE TAX ACT EXCISE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. A. I. Barrow moved the third reading of Bill C-57, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to say just a word or two about this bill. In ordinary circumstances I would consider it necessary and desirable to make some rather extended remarks on third reading about the things I think are wrong with this bill. However, I am deeply sensible of the fact that the debate on second reading was just recently concluded and the speeches of various honourable senators are fresh in the minds of those present in the house today. Consequently, I do not intend, and it does not seem to be necessary, to refresh those memories by going into matters in some detail.

I do, however, wish to make brief reference to some of the objectionable things, or things which I consider objectionable, not to argue about them but just to make it clear on the record that silence does not imply consent, and to make it clear also that the discussions which have taken place since the bill first came before us for second reading have not been sufficient to remove those objections from my mind, at least.

I will not enumerate all the things to which I object, but honourable senators will, I am sure, recall that I objected to the imposition of tax by relating the tax to a ratio or to indexing instead of to a specific sum. I objected to the Governor in Council having the right by regulation to adjust the ratio he might see fit, which words seem to me to give him pretty free rein. I questioned the constitutionality of certain provisions in the bill, one of them having to do with what is a natural reservoir of oil or gas in Canada, and who has the right to deal with it or obtain revenue from it. Another objection had to do with the provision that the Crown in right of the province is bound by certain aspects of the bill.

One other objection, which was not mentioned frequently on second reading, is that the purpose of Part IV of this bill, as set out in clause 25 on page 56, is that it is to implement part of the National Energy Program. It seemed to me, and it still seems to me, that this piece-by-piece implementation may well bring about a situation in which laws are imposed allegedly and purportedly in pursuit of implementation of the National Energy Program piece by piece, before either Parliament or the country is fully aware of what is being proposed in total by legislation.

There was some discussion earlier this day on the report presented by the deputy chairman of the committee and the very able remarks he made, and the able remarks of Senator Roblin thereafter about the desirability of fully investigating what is embraced by and involved in the National Energy Program. It seems to me that this should be a priority item when Parliament resumes this fall. Secure in the confidence that all honourable senators agree with the points I have made, I shall not detain you any longer.

Hon. Ann Elizabeth Bell: Honourable senators, since I had the temerity to move an unprovoked motion to amend this bill on second reading, I wonder if you would allow me to say that I thoroughly disapprove of having to allow this bill to go through our honourable chamber in this way. I still feel that there are illegalities in Part II and Part IV of the bill. Certainly, they overstep the bounds of propriety in that the taxes which are being levied, before they have been approved by Parliament, do not relate to any existing legislation. I feel that these taxes do not relate to the existing Excise Act or Excise Tax Act in a direct way. I feel this is a dangerous intrusion into the powers of Parliament. Having said that, I cannot support the passage of Bill C-57 on third reading.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

NORTHERN PIPELINE

FOURTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Hastings, seconded by the Honourable Senator Côtteau, for the adoption of the Fourth Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline.—(Honourable Senator Macdonald).

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I yield to Senator Balfour.

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, there is really nothing that I can usefully add to the very detailed and comprehensive comments delivered in this chamber last week by my colleague, the chairman of the Northern Pipeline Committee, Senator Hastings, except that we on this side of the chamber completely endorse Senator Hastings' request that this committee be authorized to undertake a study and to report on the impact of various possible systems of transportation of hydrocarbons from that area of Canada lying north of the 60th parallel.

There can be no question, given the fragile ecology of the Arctic, that the choices available for this purpose—pipeline systems, tanker systems, undersea tankers, ice-breakers and others—will require exhaustive study and consideration, including the collection and review of much technical detail. The sooner this task is undertaken, I suggest, the better. Accordingly, I am pleased to support the recommendation of Senator Hastings.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

ENERGY

GOVERNMENT POLICY—MOTION TO REFER SUBJECT MATTER OF INQUIRY TO BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Murray, seconded by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.:

That the subject-matter of the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Argue, P.C., which appeared on the Orders of the Day on November 20, 1980, be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. William J. Petten: Stand.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I believe that yesterday Senator Frith indicated that he was willing to yield if anybody wished to speak on this matter. It is not my intention to speak, but I am sorry that Senator Frith is not present. I had hoped that he would indicate at this point—now that we have received the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on Bill C-57—whether he is in agreement with the principle of Senator Murray's motion to refer the matter of energy policy to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee or any other committee so designated by the Senate. I put this on the record in the hope that the honourable senator will take the time to think about the matter overnight and give me his views tomorrow.

Senator Petten: I shall pass that suggestion on to the deputy leader, who has left the chamber to obtain information as to what our workload will be tomorrow.

Order stands.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT MOTION

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Friday, July 10, 1981, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I think this is a good occasion for the deputy leader to give us the program for today and tell us why we are being invited to come back at 10 o'clock tomorrow morning.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators will remember that after Royal Assent was given last night we received messages with four bills from the other place, which were then given first reading. We shall give them second reading today and, if it is appropriate, possibly third reading. There is also a Senate bill relating to the Jules and Paul-Émile Léger Foundation which we hope to have dealt with expeditiously, if it is the wish of the Senate to do so. That is the legislation on our plate at this moment.

There will be legislative activity in the other place both this afternoon and this evening. We do not know what we might receive from them, though we are relatively certain that we will receive a bill concerning pensions for veterans' widows—a matter Senator Marshall has kept our consciences alive to for some time. It is not likely that we will receive that bill until late this afternoon or this evening. This is why I think we should hold ourselves ready to deal with any catch-up legislation from the other place. Therefore, with respect to that legislation, whatever it might be in addition to the pensions bill, we could agree that we will be ready to deal with it and, if it is passed, have Royal Assent, we could then, I hope, adjourn for the summer.

● (1405)

Senator Flynn: I can appreciate that the deputy leader is not in a position to confirm all of the rumours going round with respect to exactly what will take place in the House of Commons this afternoon. I suppose at three o'clock, or around that time, we will know. I would invite the deputy leader to complete his answer at that time.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, yes, Senator Flynn is right when he says that I will not confirm such rumours; and he is right when he says that we should know more at three o'clock this afternoon. For that reason, I think it more appropriate to treat this as a notice of motion and let it come up under Motions at the end of the sitting. We will have more information at that time.

Hon. Lowell Murray: On the point of order raised by the Leader of the Opposition, may I ask the Deputy Leader of the Government whether he has had an opportunity for further consideration or consultation about Item No. 16 on our Order Paper, that is to say my motion to refer the national energy policy to a committee of this house? I ask the question in view of the fact that I raised the possibility the other day of having a vote on this matter. Since that time we have had a further recommendation in this matter from the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce through its Deputy Chairman yesterday.

Does the Deputy Leader of the Government have any information to give us on this question?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I believe, as I have from the beginning, that there are a number of advantages to having the Senate study the principles and objectives of the whole National Energy Program, but I think there are also some problems that exist with regard to our doing so now or committing ourselves to doing so now. Therefore, on that order I should like to be assured that it will stand until we come back in the fall, when we can reconsider the matter in the light of the circumstances as they then exist. If it is not a necessary result that it so stand when we adjourn, we agree right now that we will have the motion put back on the Order Paper for consideration in the fall.

Senator Murray: That is perfectly satisfactory, honourable senators.

THE HONOURABLE JEAN MARCHAND, P.C.

MEDICAL REPORT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to bring to the notice of the chamber a report with respect to His Honour the Speaker. Senator Marchand had a restful night last night, and spoke with his office by telephone on a number of occasions this morning. He said the discomfort experienced yesterday had all but disappeared. Doctors at the National Defence Medical Centre said they will be keeping His Honour at the hospital for rest and tests for a few more days. They are discouraging any visits until tomorrow at the earliest. Once again they confirmed their earlier statements that His Honour's condition and his weak spell yesterday were not related to any heart trouble. While tests will continue, all symptoms and reactions are consistent with extreme fatigue.

[Senator Flynn.]

Senator Marchand regrets that he cannot be with honourable senators, but he sends his best wishes and his sincere thanks for all of the expressions of concern received by his office.

Of course, all honourable senators wish him a very speedy recovery and return to his distinguished post in this chamber.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, first of all, I want to say that we, on this side of the chamber, are very happy to hear that our Speaker has been given a clean bill of health and we would ask Senator Lapointe to convey to him our best wishes for a speedy recovery and to advise him not to hasten his return to the Senate. In any case, we hope that it will not be necessary for him to do so as of tomorrow, so we would advise him to take it easy and have a good rest.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

POST OFFICE

DISRUPTION OF SERVICE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, from what I hear there has been no development in the postal strike situation, and I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if he can inform us if it is the firm view of the government that Parliament should adjourn without considering any legislation to force the Post Office employees to return to work? My understanding is that the session may be adjourned tomorrow for the remainder of the summer. Of course, if the government has not changed its views, that means that no legislation will be presented to Parliament and that the strike will be permitted to continue for perhaps several weeks.

• (1410)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as far as the postal dispute is concerned, I understand that the adjournment motion, which is to be presented in the other place later today, does allow for the possibility of Parliament being recalled if any special action is required with respect to the Post Office or any other matter. I think the plan, unless there is an early recall of Parliament, is to have the House of Commons resume its deliberations on October 14. Of course, a decision will be made at some point with respect to the proposed resumption of Senate activities after the summer recess.

Perhaps the most recent development in the postal dispute took the form of a statement made this morning by Mr. Johnston on the CTV program Canada AM. He said, in part:

I wrote him [Mr. Parrot] yesterday saying that I appreciated the fact that he had dropped his preconditions, that we had reservations about involving Mr. Warren in the negotiations but that we would like to explore alternatives and suggested that we have some representatives get together and work out alternatives that would be satisfactory to him. Instead of replying to that letter, which he has yet to do, he held a press conference saying that I had rejected the proposal and so on. It is very difficult to deal with the union when they won't come down to the negotiating table.

Mr. Johnston went on to say:

Mr. Warren was selected after a very careful review and study to head a new crown corporation. The whole purpose of the corporation effectively is to give it a new start, particularly in the area of labour negotiations. He will be the chief executive officer of one of the largest companies in Canada. I would doubt very much that Mr. Warren intends to sit at negotiating tables in the future in the crown corporation.

Chief executive officers do not usually indulge in this type of activity. Further on in the same interview Mr. Johnston was asked the following question:

But he [Mr. Warren] made that very clear when he was first appointed that one of his biggest priorities and one of his biggest concerns was the labour relations problems in the post office and he was going to take that one on head-on.

Mr. Johnston replied:

Head-on, certainly, but that doesn't mean that he is actually going to sit at the bargaining table and get involved in a dispute prior to the corporation even commencing operations. And we don't know when that will be—it might be September first, it might not. So, it seems very unusual that Mr. Warren would be asked to come and sit in operating under a mandate from the Treasury Board, having no more room to manoeuvre than anyone else from the Treasury Board. We have stipulated no preconditions. Our negotiating team is there and Mr. Parrot is saying we will not negotiate with your negotiating team, we want to change it by having Mr. Warren present. I point out that Mr. Parrot has yet to negotiate with our negotiating team.

So, honourable senators, again, the government takes the position that it would like to see the process of free collective bargaining resumed with CUPW representatives. The government negotiators are waiting and available to resume those negotiations.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government has again mentioned the request by Mr. Parrot to have Mr. Warren on the government negotiating team. I am wondering why the President of the Treasury Board did not offer the concession that Mr. Warren be present at the negotiations as an observer, which in all probability would have been acceptable to Mr. Parrot. That would certainly be practical experience for him—that is, not taking part in the negotiations but, at least, learning about Mr. Parrot and his friends.

● (1415)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the proposal advanced by the Leader of the Opposition will certainly be communicated as a suggestion to the President of Treasury Board.

The situation which concerns the government is this: Mr. Parrot has stated that he is not satisfied with the government negotiating team, and he suggests the addition of a designated person to that team. The question Mr. Johnston asked was as follows:

Is he going to tell the people of Canada who should negotiate on behalf of the government in labour contracts?

He went on to say:

I am not suggesting that Mr. Parrot be replaced at the negotiating table, I am not suggesting that Mr. McDermott come in and negotiate.

Senator Flynn: That might be a good idea.

Senator Perrault: Mr. Johnston went on to say that he thinks it is Mr. Parrot's right to determine who he puts at the negotiating table. He went on to say:

I find it most peculiar and most unusual that anyone should think that the union should dictate who should negotiate with them. And on top of that I point out again that the negotiators have gotten along very well, as I understand it, and we have a very competent negotiator, Mr. Castle, heading the team. But Mr. Parrot has refused to come and put his positions on the table.

In any case, the suggestion advanced by the Leader of the Opposition will be communicated to Mr. Johnston.

JUSTICE

ALLEGED URANIUM CARTEL—ACTION TAKEN BY ATTORNEY GENERAL OF CANADA

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question concerns the prosecution of six Canadian companies alleged to have been involved in a uranium cartel in 1972.

The Prime Minister said in the House yesterday that as far as the part played by the government is concerned, it may have been an abuse but not a crime. Since it is well confessed that the government was the instigator of the cartel, I was wondering how the government can be sure it avoided committing a crime if the companies involved in following the instructions of the government are alleged to have been involved in the commission of an offence.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition will be studied and a reply may be given at some future date. The question appears to request a legal opinion.

Senator Flynn: At the same time will you study the meaning of the Prime Minister's statement?

Senator Perrault: I have nothing to add to the rather complete statement which was made yesterday.

Senator Flynn: Rather confusing.

Senator Perrault: I invite honourable senators to read the statement which is contained in the House of Commons Debates of yesterday's date.

ENERGY

IMPERIAL OIL LIMITED—COLD LAKE, ALBERTA— CANCELLATION OF HEAVY OIL PROJECT

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to ask a few questions concerning the announcement by Imperial Oil Limited yesterday of its intention to suspend its activities at the Cold Lake site.

I would inquire, in the first instance, if the government has received any statement from Imperial Oil Limited in connection with its attitudes or intentions in the matter?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I am not sure whether the government has received a direct, written communication, but I think Mr. Armstrong, in his public announcement, said that the project was going to be suspended until an agreement was reached and that he had had very recent discussions with both levels of government.

Senator Roblin: With respect to the comment that there have been recent discussions with both levels of government, may I ask whether any negotiations are taking place with respect to this matter at the present time?

My inquiry alludes to the fact that the company has not only suspended its operations because of the lack of progress of negotiations between the two governments in respect of the oil in Canada, but it also made it clear that the present financial arrangements, namely, the price offered so far with respect to the production of Cold Lake non-conventional oil, was not adequate for its purposes.

I remember discussing this with the minister on a previous occasion and he seemed to think that the financial arrangements were satisfactory, but it is now clear that Imperial Oil wishes to negotiate that matter as well. Are any discussions taking place with respect to that?

● (1420)

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, negotiations are taking place between the two levels of government on a number of items. That has been announced by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and also by the provincial Minister of Energy and Natural Resources, Mr. Leitch, but they have, for good and sufficient reasons, chosen to refrain from negotiating through the media, and they have slated further meeting for later this month.

Senator Roblin: Who is "they," please?

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Olson: The federal Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Minister of Energy and Natural Resources for the Province of Alberta. They have indicated that there are a number of matters to negotiate, including prices for various categories of oil. I do not wish to be drawn into a detailed debate on pricing, nor do I have all the background information with respect to prices for the various categories of oil. Certainly, synthetic crude is one of them. I think it would be wrong, even for the ministers who are directly responsible, to begin negotiations through the media or the public. What was offered last October, as my honourable friends knows, was, I believe, $38 per barrel plus an escalator based on either the CPI or some other index. As my honourable friend knows, the difficulty has been that until the whole package is put together the Province of Alberta has indicated that they are not willing to move on any separate part, even though the tar sands and the Cold Lake project comprise a very large single part of the whole energy agreement.

Senator Roblin: I am pleased to see that the minister has shifted his position—

Senator Olson: I haven't.

Senator Roblin:—with respect to what he told me six weeks ago, when he nailed his colours firmly to the mast of the pricing formula that was in vogue at that time. It takes an awful lot to move him, but he will eventually be moved to a more practical proposal.

I am asking him what comment he has to make on the fact that, according to expert opinion, the present situation is going to result in a further delay of at least two years before the Cold Lake plant starts to produce its 140,000 barrels a day, which is equal to almost a third of what we import, and which has been relied on as one of the reasons why we may hope to approach self-sufficiency. To say nothing of the fact that we will continue to pay $40 or $45 a barrel for 140,000 barrels a day. That amounts to something over US $200 million a year and, of course, there is the effect that will have on our foreign exchange.

I ask the minister whether he can think of anything that will enable those concerned to speed up the development of this process and help get this country out of the horrible mess that the NEP seems to have landed us in.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, first of all, I take exception to Senator Roblin's interpretation of what I said some time ago. I think the responses I gave to those questions were accurate at that time. What he must understand is that as negotiations change—and there have been meaningful negotiations—of course, some of the background changes. I think that if my honourable friend is suggesting now that there is some way that we can persuade the Government of Alberta to issue the permits for the go-ahead of this particular project—and perhaps some others—perhaps he could tell us. I know that his party was involved in it for about nine months and they were unable to reach an agreement to have those permits issued. Now they make some excuses about how close they were and all that, but we have looked into that, and that is subject to different interpretations as well.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Mr. Leitch is on the record on that matter.

Senator Olson: I hope that we do not frustrate what now seem to be some progressive negotiations, with some give-and-take on both sides, and that we will reach an agreement to meet all of the conditions and improve a number of things, including the requirements of foreign exchange so that we get to that as quickly as possible. That has been the stated objective of this government ever since it took office.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend complains about the former Conservative administration.

Senator Olson: I am just giving you an example.

Senator Roblin: Well, I will give you an example. You quote nine months for them. It has taken you 18 months, and what have you done? Nothing. You have made the situation far worse. When the Conservative administration was in office, they were on the verge of an agreement, as everyone knows. Here you are, after 18 months. How long a gestation period does my honourable friend require?

Senator Olson: I can answer very quickly. My honourable friend should look at the reply that Senator Murray gave some days ago. I asked him one simple question: Did you have an agreement on revenue sharing? And the silence was overwhelming. That is still the major problem.

Senator Roblin: Eighteen months later the minister tells us it is a major problem. Why hasn't he solved it, if he is able to point with upraised finger, or however he does point, to the former administration? To say that the Conservatives did not do it when they were in office will not wash any more. That's old hat. You have been in office 18 months, and what have you done? You have made the matter worse, that's what you have done. What is the status now of the $40 million gift to the Imperial Oil Company?

Senator Olson: The status of the $40 million, in an attempt to keep that project alive, is that if it proceeds by July 1, 1982, it is a recoverable loan. My honourable friend knows that, because I know that some of the remainder of his questions are based on the same newspaper reports as I have read. So that is clear.

My honourable friend keeps talking about their having been on the verge of an agreement, and yet the most fundamental fact is that they had no agreement. I think it was almost skirting on the fringes of misleading the House when they said they did. Now we have caught them out in saying that, and, of course, I can understand that the honourable senator's protest—

Senator Murray: What did Mr. Leitch say?

Senator Olson: —is based on the lack of or degree to which there was no agreement.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Shame!

Senator Roblin: The minister should tell that to Mr. Leitch, because he is the man who made the statement, that I think is quite satisfactory to rely on. I want to say to my honourable friend that when he comes in here with an agreement that makes sense, then, of course, he and I will be able to conduct our conversation on more agreeable terms; but until he does, I resent the fact that he sloughs off his failures on what happened 18 months ago under another administration. That sort of thing is not going to make any impression.

Senator Olson: I am sorry if my friend is taking such great exception to what I said. He now comes here—and he has done it several times before—demanding that there be an agreement; but it is elementary that if there is going to be an agreement, then both sides have to agree—not one side. We stated our position. If my honourable friend wants the federal government to substantially increase prices—in other words, buy an agreement—I wish he would say so. I am sorry if I hurt my honourable friend's tender feelings, but I was merely pointing out that it was not so easy for you either when you guys were in charge.

Senator Roblin: My feelings are more robust than my honourable friend is likely to give me credit for. I would like him to acknowledge the fact that in the first seven months of this year there has been a $2 per barrel increase, in terms of the price of oil, which is shared by the province and the industry, and there has been a $6 per barrel increase which has gone to the tax coffers of the federal government. That is what has happened.

Senator Olson: My honourable friend knows exactly why. It is because of some action that was taken that increased the total price of oil in this country.

Senator Roblin: It is because the minister is not approaching self-sufficiency, and it is because he is using public money to buy an over-priced oil company, and a few other things of that description. That's why.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I have some supplementary questions to put to the Minister of State for Economic Development concerning the effect of the decision announced yesterday by Imperial Oil. The minister, when he set up the smokescreen a few moments ago—

Senator Perrault: Don't get political, now.

Senator Murray: —conveniently neglected to answer one of the questions that was put to him by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, namely, whether it is a fact that the effect of the decision by Imperial Oil means that the construction of that project could not possibly get underway for two years, that there would be at least a two-year delay in that project coming on stream as a result of the decision announced yesterday.

● (1430)

Senator Olson: Well, those are interpretations, for whatever reasons the statements were made, to put them back together. But my understanding—and I cannot find it here, but I think you can also read it from the documents that you have in front of you—is that the leading officers of the two companies involved, namely, Esso Resources and Imperial Oil, which in some respects are the same, have said they would attempt to re-activate the project immediately an agreement is reached. How much time it would take to put back some of the pieces, particularly the personnel, is a matter of his estimate; but certainly he indicated, according to the press release I have, that they would try to re-activate it immediately an agreement is reached.

Senator Murray: Well, I think the house and the country are in a rather difficult position, when the best information we can get from a minister of the Crown on a matter of this importance is what he and we have been able to read in newspapers. I would have expected that the minister would have access to more detailed information than is available in the newspapers, and that he would have busied himself since yesterday in obtaining that kind of information.

Be that as it may, let me ask him whether he has any information to the effect that, as a result of the decision yesterday, site preparation which was to have begun this summer cannot begin; that equipment that was to have been ordered will not now be ordered; that the personnel team to which he referred is being disbanded; and that, in effect, construction will not be beginning this winter. In other words, self-sufficiency is down the drain.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it is pretty obvious that self-sufficiency may be postponed somewhat in relation to the position we were in perhaps a year ago, or perhaps even two years ago. I do not want to hurt my friend's tender feelings again about that, but it was also one of the objectives of the previous government, and I think it is pretty obvious that the sooner one gets underway with some of these major processing plants, the sooner one will get self-sufficiency.

I therefore really do not think it takes any great argument to see that if we do not get them started at one point, then it is liable to be a year later, and so on, until we get the flow out of these plants; but these are decisions, obviously, that can be made only after an agreement has been reached between the provinces and the federal government. It is our position now, and it has been for the last 18 months, that we must get to a reasoned agreement as soon as possible. That remains so to this day.

Senator Roblin: On your own terms. It takes two to bargain.

Senator Murray: As far back as the early seventies—I think it was 1973, but I can check the date—the Trudeau government was projecting self-sufficiency in oil by the end of the 1970s. A few months ago they were projecting self-sufficiency in oil by the end of the 1980s. Now it is postponed again. The matter is of some importance, because the whole National Energy Program is based on certain supply-and-demand projections which the minister has made, and which surely he must now change.

Let me ask the Minister of State for Economic Development whether the government will very soon update and present to the house and to the public the projections that it has made on oil supply, and in particular its projection that in 1990 we would be receiving 733,000 barrels a day from non-conventional sources.

Senator Olson: Well, honourable senators, if my honourable friend knows anything about the oil business he will know one thing for sure, and that is that it is not absolutely predictable. There is a very large base out in the great western sedimentary basin where the seismographic data indicate that there is quite a lot of oil to be found still. My friend's question was slightly different from that. He was asking me about the amount of flow out of the tar sands, or synthetic oil, which includes several fields out there, not only Cold Lake but one or two more plants at Fort McMurray, the Athabasca tar sands, perhaps one at Peace River, and certainly a fairly substantial flow out of the Lloydminster area on both sides of the Saskatchewan-Alberta border.

If the honourable senator is suggesting now that we can predict with absolute precision when all of that will come on, he is asking for something that can hardly be given. I can also tell him that I do not underestimate the ingenuity and the capability of the oil industry, and the Canadians involved in that industry, to bring on a whole lot more flow of synthetic oil out of those fields, because we know it is there and we know there are sufficient quantities there. It is a matter of having the processing systems in for the separation of the sand into heavy oil, and then upgrading it to synthetic crude that can be moved into the consumer stream. I do not think that as far as I am concerned that is impossible within this decade.

Senator Murray: Well, that is fine; but let me ask the minister a very factual question.

Is it a fact that the oil supply projections on which the National Energy Program is based include the coming on stream in 1987 of the Cold Lake project and the Alsands project?

Senator Olson: Well, honourable senators, of course that was put in there; but I have to remind my honourable friend of one other thing. He is asking for facts, but predictions are never facts, they are opinions, and they are not the same thing. When those projections are put in there they are based on the certain rate of development. Certainly, we in this country have the capability to accelerate that rate, with the ingenuity, the knowledge and the technology we have.

Senator Murray: Let me ask the minister whether, as a result of the decision announced yesterday, the government is making any change in its projection that by 1990 oil imports will be at zero.

Senator Olson: Well, honourable senators, that was based on a number of processing plants going in on the dates that were indicated at that time. I think it is right that the Cold Lake one was projected for about 1987, coming on stream with an amount of up to 140,000 barrels a day. It is now clear that the beginning of the construction of that project will be delayed somewhat.

What also has to be thrown into the mix is that, once begun, it may be that we will have the capability to accelerate the construction phase of that processing plant—I will call it that, although it is a process that is not confined to one plant, but over a whole field—with the right kind of concentration of activity, to the point that it will come on at the date that was predicted.

Senator Murray: I will not prolong the exchange, except to suggest to the minister and ask him to suggest to his colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, that they go back to the drawing board with the National Energy Program, and update all of the projections and statistics which are now barely worth the paper they are written on so far as the objectives of the National Energy Program are concerned, and that the honourable the Minister of State for Economic Development bring those back to the house in due course so that we know exactly what we are dealing with here.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I shall do that, but I shall also ask them to put in the other positive factors that may somewhat shorten the process. It might disappoint my honourable friend if it turns out that the National Energy Program was just on track, so far as imports are concerned.

Hon. R. James Balfour: Might I address a supplementary question to the honourable the minister? He alluded to the conventional oil that remains to be discovered in the western sedimentary basin. I wonder if he would enlighten the house as to just how this conventional oil will be discovered, in view of the fact that the bulk of the western Canadian drilling industry has fled Canada for the United States.

Senator Olson: Well, honourable senators, my honourable friend uses pretty extreme language when he talks about “fled”, and so on. All I know is that I have some familiarity with the oil industry, having lived with it all my life, and I also know that there is quite a lot of optimism that there will be significant additional quantities of conventional oil found in that great sedimentary basin. I know, too, that included in the negotiations, as has been announced, is a price that will be high enough to offset some of the incentives now, where the netback in the United States is somewhat higher.

There is one other factor that should be taken into account, and that is that the possibility of finding additional crude oil in the conventional fields in western Canada is probably five to one, relative to the United States, and that in itself is a pretty important incentive.

Senator Balfour: I wonder if the honourable the minister would enlighten me and indicate to the chamber the scientific basis for the information he has given us. If I understand him correctly, there is five times greater an opportunity to develop additional reserves in the western sedimentary basin of Canada than there is in the continental United States.

• (1440)

Senator Olson: I did not have any great scientific background for that information. That is what I have been told by a number of people in the oil business. I suppose that the information is based mainly on the fact that a very large part of the sedimentary basin in the United States has already been drilled out more intensively than is the case in Canada. Based on the seismic data therefore there is more room for the possibility of further exploration in Canada.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): What are they doing down there then?

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

ARREST OF JURIS BUMEISTERS, LEADER OF THE LATVIAN SOCIAL DEMOCRATIC WORKERS' PARTY

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether he has had the opportunity to act upon the requests that he has received on behalf of Juris Bumeisters, the leader of the Latvian Social Democratic Workers' Party, who was arrested in Riga and sent to the Siberian gulag of the U.S.S.R. This action seems to be in contravention of the Helsinki Final Act.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The honourable Senator Haidasz is most concerned about the Bumeisters case, as are many other Canadians.

Mr. Juris Bumeisters was the leader of the Latvian Social Democratic Workers' Party in Riga. The position of the Canadian government is that the persecution of individuals is a clear violation of the Helsinki Final Act. The Secretary of State for External Affairs stated Canada's position in November. He made that statement at the opening of the CSCE. At that time he made known Canada's concern for the respect by all participating states of the principles set out in the Final Act, including human rights and fundamental freedoms.

The entire first part of the conference reviewed how states lived up to their commitments in the Final Act. During the review of the implementation, our delegation called attention to violations in the U.S.S.R. and in other countries. Particular note was made of violations of human rights in Latvia, Estonia and Lithuania, and of the continued subjugation of the Baltic peoples. Canada raised with the Soviet Union a number of cases of particular concern to Canadians, and among those cases were several which concerned individuals from the Baltic states.

GRAIN

FEED BARLEY—EXPORT PERMITS

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board.

Last year at this time there was considerable controversy over the issuance of Canadian Wheat Board permits for the export of barley from Ontario. Since we have now arrived at the same time of year, I should like to ask if the policy has been settled. Is there still difficulty in this area?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, this has been a difficulty for some years. There is a perception in western Canada that western producers often have to sell into the eastern market at a disadvantage. There is a perception in Ontario that, because export permits are controlled by the Canadian Wheat Board, they do not have sufficient access to the export market for barley.

On Monday of this week in Winnipeg, the Minister of Agriculture and I had the opportunity to meet with the Canadian Livestock Feed Board, the Canadian Wheat Board, the Advisory Committee to the Canadian Livestock Feed Board and the Advisory Committee to the Canadian Wheat Board. This subject was given an extensive review.

I think there are at least some encouraging indications that the whole question may be on the way to solution. Certainly there was a great deal of goodwill at the meeting. I believe that the Advisory Committee to the Canadian Wheat Board and the Advisory Committee to the Canadian Livestock Feed Board at that time found a good deal of common ground.

All I can say at this point is that I hope that the parties concerned will be able to work out a policy that is eminently fair to barley producers in western Canada who do not want to sell or appear to sell at a disadvantage into the eastern market. At the same time, I think it is desirable that in those sections of Ontario where there is a surplus of barley, if the right solutions can be agreed to, the export market should be made available for that barley.

Senator Molgat: I have a supplementary question. I gather from the minister's remarks that the final policy is not yet established. Could he tell us when we might expect a definite statement with regard to this matter?

Senator Argue: I do not have precise information. I hope that it will be fairly soon, but the matter is not in my hands. It is really for the boards and their advisory committees to develop an agreed policy. If that agreement is reached, then in all probability it would recommend itself to the government.

TRANSPORT

VIA RAIL—PROPOSED COMMITTEE STUDY

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, if I may I should like to address a question to the Deputy Leader of the Government relating to VIA Rail on the subject about which I asked him two or three days ago. Is he able to say whether he, his colleagues or the government have taken any action toward making it possible for a committee of the Senate to look into the matter of VIA Rail and the matters which were brought to the attention of the deputy minister in a letter addressed to him some months ago by Transport 2000?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thought that we had agreed to keep that matter alive until the fall. However, with Senator Smith's well-known intuition, he has raised the question again.

It happens that I have had discussions with the Minister of Transport recently and I can say this: There seems to be a good deal of activity which will take place this summer with reference to VIA Rail. Therefore, I think that I can assure the honourable senator that the subject will perhaps be more refined for our discussion in the fall. At that time we should consider exactly what it is we might want his committee to deal with on the subject of VIA Rail, having the advantage of more material as a result of activity taking place during the summer.

Senator Smith: I thank the deputy leader for his information, but I would like to ask a supplementary question or two. He kindly referred to some activity that might take place during the summer in relation to VIA Rail. Is the deputy leader able to say whether this proposed activity has in any way to do with a decision of the government to withdraw financing from VIA Rail to the extent that it will be compelled to abandon service or withdraw from service a number of passenger trains, including two in the Atlantic area?

Senator Frith: No, I have no such information.

Senator Smith: To be more specific, has the deputy leader any information about a decision of the government or of the Minister of Transport to withdraw financing from VIA Rail with reference to an experimental run between Halifax and Marathon, Nova Scotia, via Digby?

Senator Frith: I have no useful information on that subject at this time. I hope, however, that we might have some information with regard to that category of subject by the fall.

Senator Smith: I suppose this is really not so much a question as the giving of information, but I wonder if the deputy leader would ensure that, during the discussions—in which there are any—in which he participates concerning that matter, it is remembered that the experiment which has been conducted in the last few months has shown a very greatly increased usage of that train by passengers.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I will see that those exact words are brought to the attention of the appropriate officials.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I have a supplementary question with regard to VIA Rail. A report has been received that it is the intention of the government, by Order in Council, to eliminate certain rail movements such as the Winnipeg to Thompson run and other VIA Rail routes in western Canada and throughout the country. My question is: Why are these matters not being referred to the Canadian Transport Commission, a course of action which would enable public hearings to be held before final action is taken on them?

● (1450)

Senator Frith: I can't say.

Senator Roblin: Will my honourable friend undertake to find out?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I may say that there have been some speculative reports about the future of VIA Rail and the future of the hearing process, but no final decisions have been taken.

Senator Roblin: That is really not my point. I realize that things do not stand still and that changes must be made.

However, the usual procedure for abandoning a line, is to have the matter referred to the Canadian Transport Commission, or to some other body, so that people can have the advantage of public hearings. In this case, according to my information, that process will be short-circuited and changes will be effected by Order in Council. I should like to know if that is correct. If it is correct, why is that the case?

Senator Perrault: A statement will be made in due course by the Honourable the Minister of Transport. The information with respect to the future of the rail service of this country will be made very clear at that time and the processes with respect to allocation of lines—

Senator Roblin: It is the public hearings aspect that I am concerned with.

Senator Perrault: —and other discussions on this matter will be elucidated by him at that time.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Leader of the Government. Is he aware that it has been advertised in Manitoba that hearings will be held with respect to this particular matter in Thompson, Churchill and so on? Those hearings have been advertised in Manitoba papers and are to be held from some time next week to July 29, inclusive.

Senator Perrault: Yes, I am aware of that fact.

Senator Roblin: Well, I was not, and I thank Senator Guay for bringing that to my notice. That was my point.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SLAVE INDIAN BAND—LOSS OF INTEREST ON NATURAL GAS ROYALTIES

Hon. Guy Williams: I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate concerning an injustice to the Slave Indian Band. I would ask the leader to obtain answers from the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

According to an article which appeared in the Victoria Times, the Vancouver Sun and the Vancouver Province, Ottawa is draining the Indian people of Fort Nelson of millions of dollars. The article states that:

The Slave Indian Band says it is losing millions of dollars in interest on natural gas royalties won in a landmark settlement last year because of a 1973 federal cabinet policy.

Band lawyer, Andrew Schuck, said the royalties from the revenue sharing agreement the Band signed with the B.C. Government last year, were paid directly to the Federal Government which held the money in trust.

"Right now, the Federal Government uses the Indians' money, pays the Band 12.9 per cent interest and pockets the difference" he said in this North Eastern B.C. community. "It is rather ironic that money that I collected for my fee, I am keeping in the bank at 19 per cent interest".

The Band paid Schuck about $3 million for negotiating a settlement with the Province which could bring the Band one hundred million dollars during the next 20 years. The money is half of the B.C. Government's revenue from gas recovered by Petro-Canada and Quintana Explorations Limited from under the Muskwa Indian Reserve.

In a 1973 Order in Council, the Federal Government decreed that it would pay interest on funds it held in trust for Indian Bands based on the average interest rates of 20 year government bonds.

R. A. Hodgkinson, Director of the Membership and Statutory Requirements Branch in the Federal Indian Affairs Department, confirmed Monday, the Band was receiving interest at a rate below that paid by private financial institutions and chartered banks.

He said "Ottawa and the Bands had been unable to agree on changes to the Indian Act to alter the interest rate policy."

I say: "What Indian bands were unable to decide whether to accept or reject the change of percentage rate in interest?"

Ottawa's rate is based on the average interest rates on 20 year government bonds, ranging from a low of 3 per cent to a high of 13.75 per cent. The method of calculating the rate was set by a Federal Cabinet Order in 1973.

I must just say here that at the time I am sure there was no knowledge or the Indian people in Canada were not made aware of this outrage.

A study done by W. K. Smith & Associates, a Victoria based management consultant firm, the Band hired after it received the agreement's first proceeds last year, estimates the Band will lose $3 million in interest alone, just on a trust account set up for Band members under 19 years of age.

This leads me to wonder what is going to happen to the judgment that is in favour of Musqueam Indians of Vancouver, B.C. According to the media it involves $10 million.

My feeling at this moment is that the $10 million will be transferred, possibly, from the Treasury Board the trust fund and will not be paid to the Indians who had won it in court.

I would appreciate very much if answers could be obtained from the minister responsible. Thank you very much.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The questions will be taken as notice, honourable senators.

TRANSPORT

ATLANTIC REGION—VIA RAIL—RUMOURED SUSPENSION OF SERVICE

Hon. Daniel Riley: Honourable senators, I was pleased that Senator Smith and Senator Roblin raised the question concerning VIA Rail, because I have a question to address to the Leader of the Government in the Senate with respect to VIA Rail today. I think it is becoming important that we have officials of VIA Rail appear before our Transport Committee.

In view of the fact that there is currently, I mean today, considerable concern being experienced by the citizens, the media and the business community in the Saint John, New Brunswick, and Digby, Nova Scotia, areas—and I am sure Senator Cottreau is aware of this—regarding persistent rumours that it is the intention of VIA Rail Incorporated either to curtail or eliminate passenger rail service between Montreal and Saint John, thereby affecting Digby, Nova Scotia, will the leader forthwith contact the Minister of Transport to obtain an assurance from him that these rumours are without foundation and that there is no intention to curtail or to eliminate these services?

I understand that Parliament may adjourn tomorrow for the summer recess, but I think that this question is so important that either we should have an answer from the minister tomorrow or else the minister should contact me directly, as soon as possible, in order that I may assure the people of those areas that these rumours are without foundation.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, no final decisions have been taken, it is my understanding, with respect to the VIA Rail routes and services. There have been a number of rumours circulating in the media with respect to a number of the routes. A number of VIA Rail routes in Canada, I understand, are grossly underutilized. Others, I suppose, are experiencing a high degree of activity.

As the deputy leader said a few moments ago, it may well be a useful exercise for the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications to hold hearings this fall on the subject of rail services in Canada. Perhaps it could call for witnesses from VIA Rail. In any case, the immediate question concerning that service, the question as delineated by the Honourable Senator Riley, will be directed forthwith to the Minister of Transport to see if we can obtain some information. However, I doubt very much whether any final decisions have been taken.

● (1500)

Senator Riley: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Pointing out that there is a furor going on today in the press in Saint John and that there is a great deal of indignation being expressed by the business community, the citizens in general and the civic administration, I think it is imperative that we get some assurance right away that these rumours are without foundation.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the information will be sought and if a reply can be obtained it will be brought to the Senate tomorrow.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I would like to ask a further question with reference to VIA Rail. Is the Leader of the Government in the position to give assurance that no passenger train services of VIA Rail will be withdrawn until an appropriate hearing has been held in relation thereto before the Canadian Transport Commission?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, because I do not have all the necessary information with respect to VIA Rail and the proposals which are being developed, if, indeed, they are being developed by VIA Rail management, I am not in a position to answer that question. However, it will be taken as notice.

Senator Smith: I thank the honourable gentleman for taking the question as notice. I wonder if I could impose further on the government leader's good nature and ask whether he will arrange for an affirmative answer to be made tomorrow to the question I just asked?

Senator Perrault: Certainly, an inquiry will be made today. If a reply is available, it will be brought to the Senate tomorrow.

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I, too, have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government. I strongly support Senator Riley, Senator Smith and the others who are on the committee. We have had Dr. Bandeen before the committee previously, and I believe that it did some good.

The Leader of the Government has given nothing but fluffy answers. He is not willing to commit the government to anything other than that he will take the questions as notice, make inquiries and so on. But as Senator Riley and Senator Smith have indicated, if we do not have someone come before the committee before the fall, then by that time VIA Rail could close out everything they wished to without hearings or anything else. It seems to me that the intended purpose of the actions of VIA Rail is to discourage people from using their service.

Following up on what Senator Smith has said, will the government leader come back to this chamber tomorrow, in the event that it is the last day of the session, and say that the government does care enough about the people of Canada and is concerned enough about the people of Canada—

Senator Riley: The people of the maritimes.

Senator Muir: Particularly the people of the maritimes—and I thank you, Senator Riley. Will the government leader come back to this chamber and say that the Minister of Transport has given a commitment that nothing adverse will be done by VIA Rail. Surely, there must be a little bit of control—and I have seen it in the past—by governments over crown corporations to ensure that there will be no shutdowns or closures of any rail lines until hearings are held, because by the fall, goodness knows what may occur.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I hope to bring further information on this subject to the Senate tomorrow afternoon. That is my objective. The Minister of Transport will be contacted. I have given all the information in my possession.

NEWFOUNDLAND

PROVINCIAL ECONOMY—CONTROL OVER NATURAL RESOURCES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I wish to reply to a question asked by Senator Marshall regarding discussions with the Newfoundland government on control of offshore resources. I am particularly pleased to do this because it will dispose of the last outstanding question that I have taken as notice.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: The federal government has, for several years now indicated its willingness and indeed, has made several unsuccessful attempts to negotiate a management and administrative agreement with Newfoundland and the other Atlantic provinces. During his recent visit to Newfoundland, the Prime Minister again proposed that the two governments work out a joint administrative arrangement for timely development of the offshore for the benefit of the people of Newfoundland and all Canadians. The federal government has also offered repeatedly to refer the ownership issue to the courts and has suggested this could be done through a joint reference to the Supreme Court. I mention these efforts of the federal government to demonstrate to the honourable senator that the federal government is keenly aware of the need to settle these issues if development of this valuable resource is to proceed. Meanwhile, the honourable senator will be aware that exploration activity is continuing off the Newfoundland coast and the oil companies are now preparing development plans for submission to government.

POST OFFICE

DELIVERY OF INCOME TAX REFUNDS AND PAYMENTS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, questions were asked by the Leader of the Opposition and by Senator Smith on July 8 concerning tax payments made or falling due during the postal strike. I am pleased to inform honourable senators that taxpayers who are required to file an income tax return or other information during the postal strike will not be penalized for late filing, provided the envelope is postmarked within five calendar days of the termination of the strike. I am sure that this statement adds a note of reassurance to the earlier statement on the subject.

THE ENVIRONMENT

ONTARIO—NIAGARA RIVER—HYDE PARK WASTE DISPOSAL SITE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Senator Haidasz sent me prior notice of a question concerning the drinking water of six million people living around Lake Ontario which is being seriously contaminated by the deadly toxic chemicals trichlorophenol, the banned herbicide 2-4-5, and dioxin. Allegedly, these chemicals are leaking from the waste dumps of the Hooker Chemical and Plastics Corporation of Niagara Falls. Senator Haidasz' question reads:

I would like to know what steps the federal government has taken to protest and prevent any further damage to the health of so many people and the ecology of that beautiful region?

The government is concerned about the proposed agreement between Hooker Chemical Company and the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency under which Hooker would take corrective measures to contain toxic wastes deposited at the Hyde Park site.

We have expressed to the U.S. government our concern that the containment methods must provide adequate long-term safeguards and have requested consultations prior to the agreement being finalized.

We consider this to be the most effective and appropriate route for the Government of Canada to take. It also provides support for the amicus curiae or friend-of-the-court intervention in U.S. courts by Pollution Probe and Operation Clean Niagara.

TRANSPORT

NEWFOUNDLAND—LOSS OF ARCTIC EXPLORER—NEED FOR INCREASED SEARCH AND RESCUE CAPABILITY

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with regard to a question asked on July 6 by Senator Doody concerning the Arctic Explorer tragedy, the Minister of Transport has provided a statement to this effect: We must be rational when examining the accident involving Arctic Explorer. The loss of life was not a result of the fixed-wing aircraft response time; rather it was a result of the company failing to notify Search and Rescue until Arctic Explorer had missed three calls. Once Search and Rescue had been notified, their response time was commendable. But because of the conditions of this accident, even if Search and Rescue had responded in half the time, nothing more could have been accomplished.

It is natural to be anxious about such matters, yet we must be realistic. We do not have any guarantees that any future accident will occur in the exact same location as this one.

One might pose the question: What if the accident had occurred off the coast near Gander rather than Greenwood? Search and Rescue have tried their utmost to locate their equipment in the most strategic locations. Also, honourable senators, Mr. Pepin has decided to launch a formal inquiry, but a commissioner has not yet been selected. In this inquiry, communications will also be investigated. The initial finding, it is hoped, will be available within two days.

FISHERIES

SQUID—ISSUANCE OF LICENCES TO JAPANESE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my last delayed answer is rather long. It relates to a question asked by Senator Marshall on July 6 dealing with squid. Senator Marshall has left the chamber momentarily. I wonder if honourable senators would consider it adequate if I were to ask that the answer be printed in the record of the proceedings as having been read?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

The 1981 total allowable catch for squid in the North West Atlantic is 150,000 t. The Canadian squid industry, between 1977 and 1980 produced an average of 55,000 t. of live weight squid products. Even in 1979, a year of extremely high squid abundance in our waters and of our best squid market the Canadian industry produced just over 87,000 t.

In accordance with the principles of the Law of the Sea, Canada is required to share surplus stocks in its waters with other countries. Our general policy in the distribution of squid allocations has been to allocate it to countries that consume it, as opposed to giving it to countries that simply compete with Canada on the world squid market. The Japanese are the world's major squid consumers, their consumption accounting for about two-thirds of total world squid production (approximately 630,000 t. a year). The viability of Canada's squid industry is primarily dependent on access to the Japanese market. Japanese total import requirements vary from year to year dependent largely on the success of the Japanese domestic fishery, but Japan has been the major importer of squid from Canada. Present prospects suggest that there may be a good Japanese domestic catch in 1981, as there was in 1980, which reduces significantly the demand in the Japanese market for squid imports.

Our squid allocation to Japan recognizes the importance of the Japanese market for Canadian squid. Related to the 1981 squid allocation to Japan an agreement was negotiated with the Japan Deep Sea Trawlers Association whereby that association made a commitment to purchase a specified quantity of Canadian squid. Thus, for a year in which the market outlook for squid is cloudy based on the expectation of a good Japanese domestic catch in 1981 and current large inventories in Japan, Canadian exporters of squid products have a guarantee of sales to the Japanese market for at least this predetermined quantity of squid.

In addition to the significant employment and income generated by these sales to fishermen and plant workers, the Atlantic Region will also benefit by Japanese expenditures of about $5.5 million for a ship's repair and crew transfer program. This program, which was negotiated as part of our allocation arrangement, would not be possible if Japanese vessels were not fishing in our waters.

POST OFFICE

DELIVERY OF INCOME TAX REFUNDS AND PAYMENTS

Hon. G. I. Smith: I wonder, honourable senators, if I might return to the delayed answer concerning income tax returns and the Post Office. I am certain that the information given by the government leader will be very gladly received by many people. However, I want to make sure that it covers all the classes of people who are interested. I believe the answer referred to those people who have to make quarterly payments, and I am not sure whether the words used would cover this group, a number of whom were required to make their payments on or about June 30.

[Senator Perrault.]

● (1510)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The honourable senator raises a valid point of inquiry. That further information will be obtained if it is at all possible.

THE PUBLIC SERVICE

EMPLOYMENT OF THE DISABLED AND HANDICAPPED

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I should like to commend the Leader of the Government in the Senate for his prompt response to questions, although the answers may not contain very much information. However, I would draw to his attention a question I posed on two occasions some weeks ago. I have been waiting patiently for a response.

My question related to statements made by the Minister of Employment and Immigration and the Minister of Supply and Services regarding the employment of disabled persons which are, according to committee reports and press reports, quite contradictory. I am sure the leader will remember my question.

Is he able to clarify the positions of those two honourable gentlemen with regard to this matter, and has any other information been gathered on the subject?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, no information has been received, but a further inquiry will go forward and, hopefully, we will provide that information before the summer recess. Certainly, my office will do its best.

PUBLIC WORKS

THE LATE RIGHT HONOURABLE JOHN G. DIEFENBAKER— MONUMENT

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, some days ago I posed a question as to whether the news media reports were correct in regard to the possibility of erecting a monument in honour of the late Right Honourable John G. Diefenbaker.

The Deputy Leader of the Government will recall that the press reports stated that the government had decided that a monument would not be erected in Ottawa, but that one would be erected in Prince Albert, which seems to me a most unusual situation since there is already a monument to the late right honourable gentleman in that city.

Would the Deputy Leader of the Government ascertain whether the press reports are incorrect? Frankly, I hope they are incorrect.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I remember the question, and later reading the press report upon which it was based. As yet, I do not have the information requested, but I will try to have it for tomorrow.

AGRICULTURE

ASSISTANCE FOR FARMERS

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Balfour on April 22, 1980. I would ask that the answer be taken as read.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

The Department of Finance have advised me that it is not accurate to say that a taxable capital gain such as from the sale of farm assets would be exempt from tax where the proceeds are invested in an RRSP. A proposal to allow up to $100,000 of taxable farm gains to qualify for such an exemption was proposed in the December 1979 budget but was not re-introduced by this Government. The Minister of Finance has indicated that he has under review the whole area of capital gains taxation and has released a study paper dealing with this subject and it is unlikely that any measures relating to taxation of capital gains will be put forward until the Government's review is complete.

It should be appreciated that the gain on the sale of farm properties does currently qualify for investment and income averaging annuity contracts and to that extent the tax on such gains may be deferred.

GRAIN

RAPESEED—SPREAD BETWEEN CURRENT PRICE AND FUTURES MARKET PRICE

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Balfour on May 29, 1980. I ask that the answer be taken as read.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

The spread between street and futures prices in 1980 resulted from a number of factors. The Vancouver futures price was significantly higher than the Vancouver cash market price because of the car allocation procedure in effect at that time. The GTA has since revised the car allocation formula and with the co-operation of the trade has implemented a car exchange program which improved the market efficiency in Vancouver. The cash-futures price spread has returned to normal. Second, rapeseed supplies in commercial positions were large relative to disappearance. The resulting extended carrying period combined with higher interest rates caused costs to increase rapidly; therefore the spread between the Vancouver cash and country market was wide. The supply of rapeseed is coming back into balance with demand and the spreads between Vancouver and the country reflect this fundamental factor.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

[Translation]

Hon. Lowell Murray: Madam Speaker, with leave of the Senate, I should like to revert to reports of committees so that I may table the first report of the Special Joint Committee on the Official Languages which I have just received from the printer.

Leave having been given to revert to Reports of Committees:

[English]

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the first report of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Official Languages. I would ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see appendix, p. 2759.)

Senator Murray moved that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before Orders of the Day are called, could the Deputy Leader of the Government inform us as to whether he has any new information concerning what may happen in the other place and the possible adjournment for the summer? Information in this regard would be of interest to honourable senators at this time.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my information is that Bill C-82, to amend the Pension Act and the Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act will get three readings in the other place today, so there is reason for us to be here tomorrow.

I am also advised that a house order has been obtained in the House of Commons providing for three readings today of Bill C-83, which is a bill regarding salaries and indemnities for members of the House of Commons and the Senate which, I believe, also deals with pensions for members of the House of Commons. The house order provides for that bill to be voted on by 9.45 this evening. If it passes then it, too, will be available for our consideration tomorrow and, therefore, I think we should implement the motion, notice of which I gave earlier, namely, that when the Senate adjourns today it do reconvene at 10 o'clock tomorrow morning.

● (1520)

Senator Flynn: Does that mean that the summer adjournment could take place tomorrow?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, yes, that is my information. There is still some question in the other place as to whether there should be an adjournment before settlement of the postal strike. I believe that the Leader of the Opposition in the other place has some very definite reservations as to whether Parliament should adjourn, and I believe he expressed them in the other place today. Therefore, that is still up in the air. If the motion, notice of which has already been given in the other place, is implemented by adjourning tomorrow, then Parliament would reconvene on October 14.

Senator Flynn: If my understanding is correct that the motion for adjournment provides that Parliament would return only on October 14, subject to recall, of course, for any emergency, then even if the debate on that motion is prolonged in the other place, that does not prevent us from adjourning tomorrow until October 14, subject to recall, of course, under the same circumstances?

Senator Frith: I agree, subject to recall under the same circumstances and assuming that the only reason they would be sitting is not to consider other legislation but for the sake of the postal strike, and even if it were for other legislation, we could be recalled in that eventuality also.

CORPORATIONS AND LABOUR UNIONS RETURNS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—COMMONS AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the amendments made by the House of Commons to the Bill S-10, to amend the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act.

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury moved that the amendments be concurred in.

He said: Honourable senators, you will recall this bill originated in the Senate, and we dealt with it last October. It was finally passed by the Senate in December of last year. There was considerable discussion about this bill in our committee, and at least one amendment was made.

The bill then went to the House of Commons, and was discussed at length in the committee of that house. As a result of that discussion a number of amendments were made, if changes of words are included, which have the effect of raising the threshold of the size of companies which are required to complete returns under the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act.

You may remember that when I introduced this bill in the Senate last October, I mentioned that the effect of the bill would be to exempt some 70,000 Canadian companies from the requirement of completing those returns. The amendments which raise the threshold of the size of companies which must make the returns mean that there is a much larger number of companies—in fact, 96,000 Canadian-owned companies—which will be exempt from completing the returns.

The question then, of course, is: Are there enough companies left making the returns to preserve the integrity of the whole system of returns that are made under the act?

[Senator Flynn.]

We are advised that even with the exemption of those 96,000 companies, the 17,000 companies that still have to make the returns, will represent about 81 per cent of the transactions which are carried on, and they represent about 95 per cent of the assets of mining and utility companies, and 85 per cent of assets of manufacturing companies. Therefore, there are still large areas of corporate activity that are being covered and reported on under this act, but a great number of small companies are being relieved of that burden. There will remain, I think, 17,000 Canadian-owned companies that will have to complete certain types of returns, and 90,000 foreign-owned companies that will have to make some returns.

If you refer to clause 2 of the bill, you will find that the amendments are to the proposed paragraphs 3(1)(a) and 3(1)(b). The threshold for reporting liability by corporations will be raised from $10 million in revenues or $5 million in assets to $15 million and $10 million respectively, and the threshold for reporting liability of corporations will be raised from the aggregate amount of $100,000 to $200,000 minimum for each equity or long-term debt owed to persons or affiliates not resident in Canada.

There are certain lines which are changed because of the changes in words. These amendments have been made by the committee of the other place, and have been accepted by the government. The effect of them is to make it clear that it is not necessary to deal in aggregates which might bring in another large group of companies.

The amendment to paragraph 3(1)(b) removes the words "total aggregate" in the third line, and substitutes the word "or" for "and" in subparagraph 3(1)(b)(ii) where debt obligations to non-residents in Canada are dealt with.

If there are any questions, I shall be pleased to try to deal with them, but I hope that what I have said is a sufficient explanation of the motion.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I think that we have had a clear explanation of the changes, and I believe that they are quite reasonable. It always seemed to me that this net was too fine, and it caught too many small fish that could contribute nothing to the policy objectives of the act. In that frame of mind, I have to agree with my honourable friend that raising the thresholds in the amounts he suggested is a good thing.

There is only one minor curiosity that I find here. I have never been able to establish the relationship between the amount of assets at $10 million and the amount of gross revenue at $15 million. I do not know of any company in this country—the word "any" takes in a lot of territory, but there cannot be many companies in this country that would have assets of $10 million and a gross revenue of $15 million. That always seemed to me to be quite out of proportion, and I could not understand it. It seems to me that the gross revenue ought to be considerably higher. The threshold should be more than 10 or 15 per cent of the assets; perhaps it should be double or three times the assets.

I do not know whether my honourable friend has an explanation for that. He might tell me there is no connection between these two paragraphs, and perhaps that is the answer, but I have always been curious as to why the proportionate relationship between these two sums was so obviously out of line with reality. However, that is not going to prevent my agreeing that these amendments be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

VETERANS' LAND ACT VETERANS BENEFIT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Charles McElman moved the second reading of Bill C-79, to amend the Veterans' Land Act and to amend the Veterans Benefit Act in consequence thereof.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to move adoption of these amendments to the Veterans' Land Act. This legislation has been of first-rate service to Canadian veterans for nearly 40 years. However, with the passage of time, certain aspects of the Veterans' Land Act have been overtaken by the pace of social change. What were once regarded as assets, in the 1940s, are now viewed as anachronisms. Safeguards erected to protect veterans after the war are now considered barriers.

By putting forward these amendments, the government is proposing an updating of the act so that it will not clash with family law legislation in the provinces. These changes will also allow a veteran more freedom of choice in planning his estate.

As we look to the future, it is fitting that we also look back and applaud those legislators who drew up the initiatives contained in what is known as the Veterans Charter. Two of our colleagues—Honourable Senators Croll and Langlois—were members of the Special Committee on Veterans Affairs that in 1945-46 introduced a mix of updated and new legislation designed to bring post-war confidence and encouragement to our servicemen and women.

In his foreword to the book entitled The Veterans Charter, the Honourable Ian A. MacKenzie, the then Minister of Veterans Affairs, wrote:

Not for ten, perhaps twenty, years will it be known how much ex-servicemen and women have been able to contribute to a Canada at peace as a result of these re-establishment measures. When the accounting is made, I know the programs laid down in the Veterans Charter will appear in true perspective as a social investment of unmatched success.

Certainly, honourable senators, few would disagree that our nation has received great dividends from this social investment. Re-establishment credits were the springboards from which many thousands of Canadian service people returned to civilian life with cash and confidence. Many leaders of industry and the professions profited from the opportunities offered by the university training scheme, thus providing Canada with a reservoir of qualified people to direct our post-war boom.

The Veterans' Land Act, the legislation before us today, was the third major re-establishment plan available to veterans. The act offered servicemen and women the opportunity to become farmers, to purchase rural or semi-rural land, and to put down roots in the earth they had protected so nobly. It also encouraged veterans to buy small holdings so that they could hold another job and still be part-time farmers. It aided others to become fishermen and trappers.

Our whole nation has been nourished by this legislation, as every province in Canada became home for some of the 143,000 veterans who took advantage of the VLA. This involved the advancement of $1.34 billion, public funds that were wisely invested.

In 1975, Parliament decided that no new agreements would be permitted, that the Veterans Land Administration had served its purpose admirably and should be allowed to wind down. Honourable senators should know that there are still 39,000 veterans living on property held in the name of the VLA and that the last sales agreement will not terminate until the year 2007.

But, for all its successes, all its merits, the Veterans' Land Act has been under increasing criticism in recent years, particularly by groups and individuals interested in the laudable aim of advancing the rights of women in society.

The large majority of all outstanding VLA agreements of sale represent the matrimonial home, yet the spouses of veterans are locked out of having a legal interest in the property. This is because the property agreement is between the veteran alone and the Crown. When the legislation was first introduced, the thrust was that it was the veteran who had earned certain benefits through war service and nobody else could share in them.

I should point out that most of the veterans who applied to the Veterans' Land Administration were male, but in a few instances they were female, and, as a result, their husbands had no legal right in the property. So what happened, honourable senators, was that when a veteran borrowed funds from the VLA at preferential rates, he made an exclusive agreement with the Crown, and the spouse could enjoy no dower, homestead or family rights in the property.

Yet there were certainly cases where the wife had helped her veteran husband to provide a downpayment on the matrimonial home. It was not unknown for a bride to contribute land to the matrimonial partnership. But if the couple then decided to take advantage of the VLA opportunities and upgrade and expand the property, title had to be transferred to the Director of the Veterans' Land Administration and, as far as the Crown was concerned, the spouse had no equity in the property so long as the loan was outstanding. No matter that both might have to work to pay off the debts and that the wife had previously invested her own land or money in the property, the legislation shut the farm gate on her.

Contrast such situations with recently adopted family law legislation in a number of provinces. In these provinces the spouse is generally deemed to have a 50 per cent interest in the matrimonial home.

So what it adds up to, honourable senators, is that the Veterans' Land Act has inadvertently run afoul of family law legislation. As a result, there have been recent occasions where wives, involved in legal actions against their one-time spouses, have attacked this legislation as being a barricade behind which the husband can hide and frustrate their opportunity to share in the benefits of the matrimonial home.

Of course, the wife can ask the court to declare that she has an interest in the property to be held in trust by the veteran, but she cannot force a sale and, in any event, this route involves expensive legal action and many spouses may be unaware of this option.

When this legislation was first introduced, it was a different social world. The husband was regarded as the head of the household and divorce was a rarity. In addition, our legislators built in safeguards with the sole purpose of helping the veteran in his early years in business. Now, as those farms mature and fortunes alter over the years, those safeguards have changed into restrictions. Times have changed and these amendments are a recognition that legislation must change also.

I am confident that the vast majority of veterans will welcome these amendments. As a matter of fact, in the other house, the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs, in speaking to the bill, advised that he had consulted with the Royal Canadian Legion, veterans' associations and the Commission on the Status of Women, and all had reacted favourably to the bill. Most veterans will want their spouses to be officially recognized as legal partners in the home they share. Certainly, from the standpoint of estate planning, these amendments will make life much simpler for the veteran.

It has not been an easy matter to amend this act. The properties concerned are, in a strict sense, as much the property of the Crown as are the Parliament Buildings. It was necessary to ensure that, while recognizing the consequences of the act, Parliament would not abruptly throw out all the traditional hard-won rights of the veterans.

It is proposed to amend section 37 in order to recognize that a veteran's spouse does have rights in the matrimonial property as provided by provincial legislation. In addition, the bill proposes that VLA contract holders who have earned the conditional grant can have the option to obtain title to their VLA property by replacing the existing agreement for sale with a registered first mortgage. Of course, the first mortgage will have the same terms and the same interest rates as the VLA loan.

Let me stress, honourable senators, that the first mortgage proposal is an option. How many veterans will want to change their agreement of sale to a regular first mortgage is a matter for conjecture. Undoubtedly there will be some who will welcome the opportunity to facilitate meaningful family estate planning and the conveniences which flow from full proprietary rights. Similarly, there will no doubt be some traditionalists who enjoy the protection of living on Crown property and will be satisfied with the status quo. That, as I have said, will be the individual's choice.

Honourable senators, I believe that the combination of these two amendments answers the complaints made against the present legislation and still leaves a measure of decision-making to the individual veteran. This combination provides protection for all spouses, facilitates the enforcement of marital property settlements ordered by provincial courts, and allows veterans more freedom to plan their estate and enjoy proprietary rights.

• (1540)

The legal work associated with mortgage registration will be accomplished through the Department of Justice, just as in the original instance when title to the property was acquired in the name of the Director, Veterans Land Administration.

Administratively, the mortgage approach will benefit VLA through lower costs. Once the veteran exercises this option and is no longer a tenant at will, VLA will no longer have the responsibility of dealing with oil companies, pipeline easements, expropriations and the like.

All in all, honourable senators, these amendments are both welcome and necessary. The spouse is given matrimonial rights in the VLA property. The mortgage proposal allows the veteran freedom in managing his property and more choice in planning his estate.

Honourable senators, I commend this bill to you for your approval.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I just want to say a word or two to show that we are in complete agreement with this bill, though after the very fine, detailed explanation given by the sponsor there is not much, if anything, that needs to be said.

Without any doubt, this has been a very worthwhile piece of legislation and a great many veterans have benefited by it. If I may go back for a moment, I recall that after the war, as the sponsor mentioned, this act was supposed to enable people to acquire farms, or part-time farms, or become commercial fishermen. That was fine, but there was a big demand by veterans to broaden the act so that persons wanting to build a home would be able to do so. At that time, if I remember correctly, quite a large piece of land was required for the small holding, as they called it. Over the years that was gradually done away with, so that in time a great many veterans were able to get a long term, low interest loan under the Veterans Land Act that enabled them to build their homes.

As the sponsor mentioned, the procedure was a very simple one. The veteran conveyed his land to the Director of the Veterans Land Administration and in turn got back an agreement of sale. When he had paid off his loan, the director gave him back the deed to the property, and everybody was happy.

I was a little surprised to hear that there are still so many of these loans outstanding. Most of them must have been taken out over recent years. When it was announced that the cut-off date would be 1975, I think it was, for eligibility, I suppose a great many people took advantage of the act and made their application then so as to get in under the wire. In any event, time has shown that this amendment was necessary, especially in the case of divorced persons: when the loan was paid off, the veteran got his or her deed, as the case may be, and the spouse had no further interest in it.

I do not quite understand this business of the locked-in position. I would think that once the director conveyed the land back to the veteran, the veteran's spouse must have had an interest, either by way of dower or under the matrimonial property acts of the various provinces, though as to that I am not sure.

In any event, since the need was there, it is just as well that it has been taken care of. I particularly like the provision whereby a veteran will have the option, under the 10-year forgiveness clause, to get back his deed and give back a mortgage. In other words, he is the owner then, and if he wants to convey his land to his son, or somebody else, he is able to do so. In fact, if he wants to sell it, presumably he can do so, subject to the mortgage, as in any other transaction.

Of course, in this day and age the provisions of the family court statutes in the various provinces should be applicable to any of these things, and that, I think, is a good piece of legislation.

Generally speaking, then, certainly on this side, we support the provisions of the bill. I will say this, however. I never had much—though something—to do with these cases of fishing or farming. I dealt mostly with people wanting to build a home. You could not find, however, better people than those whose job it was to administer the Veterans' Land Act.

I see no reason to prolong the debate, nor do I see any reason to send this bill to committee. I think Senator Bird wants to say a few words. After that, let us give the bill third reading and pass it.

Hon. Florence B. Bird: Honourable senators, in the absence of Senator Bonnell, I think it my duty to inform you that the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science did consider section 37 only last Tuesday. We thought the amendment provided a great improvement to the existing act and that the amendment should be adopted. We had in fact decided that if we did not receive Bill C-79 before we adjourned for the recess, we would include it in our report as a recommendation. Now that it has been received, however, I am very happy to tell you that it had gained the unanimous approval of the committee.

I thank Senator Macdonald and congratulate Senator McElman. I hope we can move to third reading immediately.

Hon. Guy Williams: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question, for my own enlightenment, to the sponsor of the bill.

Some years back the Veterans' Land Act was debated in this chamber. At that time I said that the Veterans' Land Act was the most unfair piece of legislation in Canada. I was referring to its effect on the Indian veterans. If my memory serves me right, there were over 1,700 in the country.

There were two reasons why I said this was the most unfair piece of legislation in Canada. One was that it did not recognize the spouse of the veteran. The other was that the Indian veteran was only considered for one-third of the total amount, which is the unreclaimable amount, approximately $2,300 or one-third of the total amount. There were over 1,700 Indian veterans participating.

What I want to know is, what is happening to them now?

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, as sponsor of the bill I fear I cannot give an answer to Senator Williams. It is one that is quite beyond the scope of the background information provided by the department for this bill. I would, however, like to say that as a veteran myself I agree with him on the outstanding service rendered to the country by those many native people who joined the various elements of the armed forces of Canada and served with great distinction and courage.

I regret that I do not have an answer to the question asked by Senator Williams.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator McElman: I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), that this bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

OFFICIAL RESIDENCES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-81, to amend the Official Residences Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill pours the legal footings for a summer residence for the Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons. I mean to explain briefly why and how it does so.

The sessions of Parliament have grown longer over the years. The Prime Minister of our country, whoever he or she may be, is entitled to an official residence and a summer residence. I will not compare the obligations of the Leader of the Opposition to those of the Prime Minister, because that does not matter. The obligations of the Leader of the Opposition are onerous and important. Our system absolutely depends on a smoothly functioning and properly supported opposition. That opposition depends upon a leader who is given every help to fulfill his or her functions.

What this bill means to do is fill a gap which, rather startlingly, has not been filled long since. That is the "why" of the bill.

The "how" of the bill is relatively simple, honourable senators. You have the bill before you. You will see that in clause 1 it establishes the legal basis for a residence for the Leader of the Opposition—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): In the House of Commons.

Senator Frith: The Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons, yes. The distinction has been noted.

Senator Flynn: In the text it only appears as "Leader of the Opposition."

Senator Frith: I believe that the definitions section clarifies that uncertainty.

Section 3 of the act provides that the Minister of Public Works is obligated to furnish, maintain, heat and keep in repair the buildings situated on the lands described in the schedules, if the residence is established. Naturally, the furnishing of a residence requires its maintenance. It also requires a staff, and therefore the bill provides that the Leader of the Opposition may appoint a steward or housekeeper and up to three other employees to manage the residence.

Section 6 of the act deals with the necessary supplies and remuneration of persons named in the preceding section, and provides also that monies appropriated by Parliament for the operation of the House of Commons may be used for the payment of the remuneration of such employees.

In introducing this bill, honourable senators, I repeat that all it does is pour the legal footings for the summer residence. The house is not yet chosen but will be, with the concurrence of the Leader of the Opposition, by the National Capital Commission and the Minister of Public Works, and will be selected from properties that are available. I assume that the available properties will be examined and, in consultation with the Leader of the Opposition in the other place, a residence will be chosen which, from that time on, will be the official summer residence of the Leader of the Opposition. Of course, the residence can be replaced, if such an action is found desirable, because the legal foundations for doing so are established by this bill.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I should like to state my understanding of clause 3 of this bill, which provides that the Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons may appoint a steward or housekeeper and up to three other employees to manage his residence—that is, his official residence, Stornoway—and of clause 4, which provides for the payment of this staff. As I understand then, these clauses confirm the arrangements that were made in the summer of 1979 by Prime Minister Clark and the government of the day for the then opposition leader, Mr. Trudeau, who had at that point moved into the official residence, Stornoway. Therefore, it is appropriate that we should give those arrangements legislative sanction at this time.

We on this side have no objection to the possible provision of a summer residence for the Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons. I simply make the point that this bill does not really provide the summer residence. This bill provides that the Governor in Council may, by order, allocate any lands in the National Capital Region, where, as it is well known, the Crown owns a great deal of land and buildings, and can provide a summer residence for the Leader of the Opposition. Whether the Governor in Council chooses to do so and whether the present Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons chooses to accept such an offer is between the cabinet and the present Leader of the Opposition.

I leave it at that, except to say that in my humble opinion, if the government is concerned as to the prestige of the position of Leader of the Opposition, there are many other things which could be done more usefully and which would be more relevant to his public responsibilities than this particular provision.

However, we will allow the bill to go through with those observations.

Hon. Robert Muir: I should like to comment briefly on this bill. I commend the deputy leader and the government for bringing it in. I am not particularly concerned about who gets the credit for the bill, who had the original idea and all that sort of thing. I do not care whether the name of the Leader of the Opposition is Clark, Trudeau, Diefenbaker, King, St. Laurent, or whatever it was or will be—we have been pikers in this country with regard to the leaders of our parties. I think this is a good move, and is one that should have been made many years ago.

It is possible that other things could be done to enhance the position of the Leader of the Opposition and to enable him to do a better job. I am one of those who have been here a long time—someone might interject and say too long—but I have also been around the world many times. I have been to many different countries and have seen what is provided for their leaders. It shocks me to think that we can be so petty. Oftentimes we are petty with regard to what is provided for the Prime Minister of this country and for the Leader of the Opposition, and I think that this bill is a step in the right direction.

● (1600)

Again, I commend the government for introducing this legislation. I think this should have been done years ago.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, if Senator Frith speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, Senator Murray made the point about Stornoway. So far as I know, what he said is quite correct. The second point he made was that this only establishes, as I said, the legal footings. He did not use that word, but obviously we agree on that.

As to other things the government can do to help the Leader of the Opposition, we will not go through those at this stage of the sitting, but perhaps we might look forward to a long shopping list of suggestions from Senator Murray, when we resume, that we will try to bring to the attention of the government.

I thank Senator Muir for his comments as well. Obviously he and I agree, as do Senator Murray and I, on the principles of this bill and the way in which it tries to accomplish them.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Flynn: At the next sitting.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that the bill be read the third time now.

Senator Flynn: At the next sitting. We want to think about it.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Senator Flynn: No, no. At the next sitting.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Petten, that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg moved the second reading of Bill C-14, to amend the Diplomatic and Consular Privileges and Immunities Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill deals with the establishment and operation of purported embassies or consulates in Canada by persons not representing a sovereign state or not representing a government recognized by Canada. The new or proposed legislation would make it an offence to engage in such conduct, enabling the courts to prohibit the representation of such premises as a diplomatic mission or a consular post.

It is the same as the bill which was introduced in the Senate as Bill S-11 by the last government, with second reading being moved at the time by Senator Macquarrie. I regret that, not having Senator Macquarrie's gift of poetic language, my presentation will have to be more matter of fact.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): You don't do too badly either.

Senator Goldenberg: Apart from certain corrections in terminology, the main concern of the bill is to provide for a contingency under which a country, or even a part of a country, would establish in Canada something purporting to be an embassy or a mission. While this would be a violation of the Vienna Conventions on Diplomatic and Consular Relations, to which Canada is a party, the Government of Canada at the present time has no legal avenue to deal with a transgression which would result from the establishment and operation of such purported embassies or consulates in Canada.

The bill therefore seeks to resolve a sensitive problem which may occur any time and create for Canada some embarrassment on the international scene and, more particularly, create tensions in Canada's bilateral relations with the country concerned.

I have referred to the Vienna Conventions, and I will just quote two articles.

Article 2 of the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations provides that:

The establishment of diplomatic relations between States, and of permanent diplomatic missions, takes place by mutual consent.

Article 4(1) of the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations provides that:

A consular post may be established in the territory of the receiving State only with that State's consent.

These articles specifically require the force of law to be implemented in Canada. It is therefore only consistent with the spirit of Canada's obligations under the Vienna Conventions to take the necessary measures to prevent the opening of such so-called embassies or consulates when they are opened without Canada's consent and when they purport to represent a country or a government not recognized by Canada.

I submit, honourable senators, that this bill is non-controversial and I trust that, the same measure having been introduced by two successive governments, it will receive speedy passage without reference to committee.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as Senator Goldenberg has just indicated, the bill is substantially the same, except for a few words, as Bill S-11 introduced by the Clark government. Senator Goldenberg mentioned that Senator Macquarrie had at that time moved second reading. I have not had the opportunity to check but I think that the bill was passed by the Senate, and I am not sure whether it had even gone through first reading in the other place. I have not had time to check because I had to answer for Senator Asselin who could not be here this afternoon.

Senator Goldenberg: All I can say is that I have here the speech that Senator Macquarrie made at that time.

Senator Flynn: When exactly?

Senator Goldenberg: On December 11, 1979, and I can give you the exact pages.

Senator Flynn: Fine, then it probably did not go to committee?

Senator Goldenberg: No.

Senator Flynn: It was a few days before that fateful December 13, if I remember correctly.

In any event, Senator Goldenberg provided a good explanation and we thank him especially, on behalf of the Senate, for explaining the various technical aspects. The fact is that the government cannot redress a situation resulting from the establishment of what the bill calls purported embassies or consulates, or what we might otherwise call sham embassies and consulates. At one time or another, the problem has come up, if not here then in some other country.

Senator Goldenberg: In Australia.

Senator Flynn: Yes, in Australia. The bill seeks to give the government authority to redress the situation, which could cause some dissatisfaction, if you want, or our relations with those countries affected by the establishment of such purported embassies or consulates.

I note that Mr. Louis Duclos, Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, said the following in the House of Commons in concluding his very brief explanation:

Let me point out, in conclusion, that the legislation would not be directed against any particular group by name.

So much for that.

It should not affect the present representation of Baltic States in Canada.

I wondered in what way it would not affect this representation because, in fact, the act always makes reference to a sovereign country or a country recognized by Canada. As I understand it, the Baltic States representation is more the representation of dissident groups in these countries than of the official Baltic States. I quite agree that the bill should not affect this situation because our interest—and I believe that this is a question of justice toward many citizens from these countries who emigrated to Canada—is to recognize this type of representation.

Senator Goldenberg: If you allow me—

Senator Flynn: Yes, go ahead.

Senator Goldenberg: As soon as I was asked to introduce this bill, I called the legal services of the Department of External Affairs. The situation was explained to me, and I shall quote exactly what I was told. The reply was in English and I shall give it as I received it:

● (1610)

[English]

Canada has not recognized de jure the incorporation of the Baltic States into the Soviet Union.

[Translation]

The act will, therefore, not apply to the Baltic States.

[Senator Goldenberg.]

Senator Flynn: I understand, but the act says that any diplomatic mission must be that of a sovereign country, whereas these missions do not represent sovereign states. Of course, in practice, the government turns a blind eye on this situation. I have no objection to this, and I believe this is the solution because not recognizing the incorporation of these countries in the Soviet Union is one thing, but this does not make a sovereign state of these countries.

Senator Goldenberg: The government has decided to turn a blind eye to the situation of these states.

Senator Flynn: That is the answer that I expected and I am satisfied with it.

In any event, I agree that it is a useful tool. There is also the principle of reciprocity which allows, in certain cases where our embassies and consulates are not allowed certain privileges, the privileges of certain embassies and certain consulates to be also restricted; this is excellent and the principle is good. We all agree with the explanation given concerning the Baltic States or other similar situations. I therefore believe that it is not necessary that the bill be referred to a committee. It could receive third reading tomorrow, at the same time as the previous bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Goldenberg: Honourable senators, I would like to ask Senator Flynn whether he insists that we give the bill third reading tomorrow, because I do not think that I shall be able to be here.

Senator Flynn: Well, I shall move the motion for you if Senator Frith does not do so.

Senator Goldenberg: Very well, Senator Flynn, I would be honoured!

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

JULES AND PAUL-ÉMILE LÉGER FOUNDATION

BILL TO INCORPORATE—SECOND READING

Hon. Léopold Langlois moved the second reading of Bill S-23, to incorporate the Jules and Paul-Émile Léger Foundation.

He said: Honourable senators, I am particularly proud of having the privilege of introducing on behalf of the government the bill to incorporate the Jules and Paul-Émile Léger Foundation, sponsored by the Honourable the Secretary of State.

The main object of the foundation is to honour the efforts and memory of a great servant of Canada and those of his still living brother, and all the undertakings of these two great fellow citizens who generously devoted all their energies to the service of their country and its citizens.

The foundation will ensure among other things the continuation of the efforts made by Jules Léger during his lifetime and those still pursued by Paul-Émile Léger in favour of the most distressed and underprivileged citizens of the world.

Jules Léger was one of Canada's greatest servants and one of its most illustrious ambassadors. After being called upon to represent all Canadians in this our country, he made continuous efforts to overcome a serious handicap, to relearn the simplest movements and, with the help and encouragement of his distinguished wife, to remain in the most elevated office in which any citizen of this country may be called upon to serve.

Paul-Émile Léger ceaselessly continues to show the same passion and zeal for all humanity by working for the well-being of the most underprivileged in this world.

He is a living example of the generosity that has always characterized this country's citizens. He is a constant reminder of the most fundamental values and true needs of humanity.

It is therefore the wish of the Canadian government to acknowledge the exceptional contribution made by Jules and Paul-Émile Léger to this country and to the whole world, by setting up this foundation that will bear their names and strive to continue the great works with which they have been identified for a number of years.

It is because they wanted to look after the most humble and underprivileged that Jules and Paul-Émile Léger are now among the greatest in our community and that we now wish to encourage Canadians to follow their magnificent example.

Honourable senators, it is with deep emotion and total confidence that I commend this legislation to your support.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on behalf of all senators, I am grateful to Senator Langlois for his explanation of that bill which is aimed at honouring the efforts and contribution of our former Governor General and Paul-Émile Cardinal Léger. Everything he said in that connection meets with our entire approval.

Senator Langlois said that the bill was sponsored by the Secretary of State. I understand that it is a government bill but if I am not mistaken, it will create a private corporation over which the government will have no control. Such a corporation could as well have been created by means of letters patent issued under the act respecting Canadian non-profit corporations.

I realize that by asking Parliament to approve the setting up of such a corporation greater lustre is given, as it were, to that corporation. However, I would like the sponsor of the bill to tell me whether it is really the only reason why Parliament is asked to pass such a legislation for such purposes, because once the bill is passed, the corporation will have precisely the same status as if it had been created under letters patent under the Act respecting Canadian non-profit corporations.

I have no objection, but I would like to make it clear, because many people will imagine that it is a corporation on which the government has some kind of control. One could be led to believe that the corporation relies on the government for the financing of its efforts, but I do not think it is true; there is no control and under the legislation there is no financial contribution from the government.

Senator Langlois: I think it is obvious by just looking at the bill that it will be a private corporation which will not fall under the jurisdiction of the government because, if you look at that part of the bill which deals with powers, you will see that the members of the board of directors shall have full authority to act, make investments and borrow money without the intervention of any public agency.

I think it has been decided to proceed this way mainly because of the special character of this legislation and, undoubtedly, the need to have it endorsed by the government so that it will be actually acknowledged as a corporation which has very special powers indeed. However, its power to establish subsidiary corporations is subject to the approval of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs of Canada, pursuant to Part III of the Canada Corporations Act. In addition, the bill contains a special clause concerning the disposal of the assets if ever the foundation should end its operations. Here is how clause 22(3) reads:

In the event of the dissolution of the Foundation, any property of the Foundation that remains after the payment of its debts and liabilities or after the making of an adequate provision for the payment of its debts and liabilities shall be transferred to the Procurer of the Roman Catholic Diocese of Montreal to be used for philanthropic purposes.

I believe that answers Senator Flynn's question.

Senator Flynn: That is fine, but all I wanted was confirmation from the sponsor of the bill that we are proceeding this way to give more class, so to speak, to the incorporation.

Senator Langlois: I am pleased to be able to confirm that for the second time!

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Langlois: With leave of the Senate, honourable senators, I move third reading immediately, unless there are objections; in that case, we might wait until tomorrow.

Senator Flynn: I have no objection. The only thing I was wondering about is whether arrangements have been made so that the House of Commons will pass this bill quickly.

Senator Langlois: Apparently that has been done.

Senator Flynn: Then I agree.

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CHILDHOOD EXPERIENCES AS CAUSES OF CRIMINAL BEHAVIOUR

REPORT OF HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE COMMITTEE—
ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, entitled: "Child at Risk", tabled in the Senate on 16th October, 1980.—(Honourable Senator Bell.)

Hon. Ann Elizabeth Bell: Honourable senators, I owe you an explanation for not having spoken on this matter since it has now been standing in my name for several weeks. I would like to wait until we resume in the fall to speak on this matter.

I must admit that one of my reasons for asking to take part in this debate was that I noticed it was standing in Senator McGrand's name, and I thought he was going to close the debate, forgetting entirely that Senator Bonnell would be closing the debate.

In the meantime, there are several other senators who I know are very interested in taking part in this debate. After conferring with Senator Bird, we thought it would be a good idea to reinstitute an inquiry in the fall when we will begin a new session with a Speech from the Throne. In that way this very important report will not be allowed to gather dust, and we can take it from there with its recommendations. I hope that is agreeable to you.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, July 10, 1981, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, perhaps Senator Frith would tell us whether the debate has begun in the other place on Bill C-83.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, my information is that it began about 25 minutes ago. I was informed that Mr. Pinard had launched the debate on Bill C-83, and that he had finished his intervention and that Mr. Baker was on his feet. I have also received information that the vote will take place at 9.45 this evening.

Senator Flynn: Is it an order of the house that the final vote be taken at 9.45 this evening?

Senator Frith: That is the information I have received.

The information I received with respect to Bill C-82 is that that bill will probably not be dealt with until tomorrow. The House of Commons sits at 11 o'clock and they will have Question Period and then deal with that bill. We may not receive that bill—I think they will pass the bill quickly—until 12.30 or 1 p.m. It depends on whether they shorten the Question Period, or if they can. It is understandable that Senator Flynn and other honourable senators want to know why I am still suggesting that we sit at 10 a.m. I do not think that is too early. We will have our Question Period, and we shall spend some time on the salaries bill. It is my feeling that we should sit at 10 a.m., although we may not have Royal Assent before 1.30 or 2 p.m.

Senator Flynn: If there is agreement that we could have Royal Assent as soon as we have disposed of those two bills, then that is fine. I feared that we would have to wait until late afternoon before having Royal Assent; that we would have nothing to do but wait.

Senator Frith: I received a note a few moments ago, and the estimate I have from the office of the President of the Privy Council and house leader in the other place is that we should have it soon after they deal with it after 11 a.m.—that is, at 12 noon—so it would 12.30 or 1 p.m. here.

Motion agreed to

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

July 9, 1981

The Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Official Languages has the honour to present its First Report as follows:

In accordance with its Orders of Reference dated Tuesday, May 7, 1980, and Thursday, April 23, 1981, your Committee considered the Annual Report of the Commissioner of Official Languages, 1978, the Annual Report of the Commissioner of Official Languages, 1979, and the Annual Report of the Commissioner of Official Languages, 1980.

Your Committee has agreed to report as follows, and requests that the Government consider the advisability of adopting the recommendations therein.

INTRODUCTION

The Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons on Official Languages was appointed on May 23, 1980 and held its first meeting on October 9 of the same year. Its mandate, as amended on April 23, 1981, is to consider the 1978, 1979 and 1980 Annual Reports of the Commissioner of Official Languages, each of which covers a broad spectrum of Language-related issues.

After holding four meetings in October and November 1980, during which it heard testimony from the Commissioner of Official Languages and from the Deputy Secretary of the Official Languages Branch of the Treasury Board Secretariat, the Committee was obliged to interrupt its work for about three months because certain of its members served on the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution. However, it resumed regular meetings in February 1981 and heard further testimony from the Commissioner of Official Languages, the President of Treasury Board, the Chairman of the Public Service Commission and the Under Secretary of State.

Having thus gained an overview of the roles, responsibilities, policies and programs of these central bodies, the Committee decided to devote its immediate attention to issues relating to the provision of federal services in both official languages to members of the public. In this context, since March 24, 1981, it has heard testimony from the "Fédération des Francophones hors Québec", the Council of Quebec Minorities, the Speaker of the Senate, senior officials of the House of Commons and from deputy heads and other senior officials of some fifteen major federal departments, agencies and Crown corporations.

Following this, the Committee will consider the issues of Language of work and equitable representation of the two language groups within the Public Service, as well as several other areas related to language reform.

Based on the testimony presented since October 1980, our first report addresses several of the major causes of problems associated with the provision of service to the public in both official languages, and contains the Committee's recommendations on measures that it believes should be taken to help rectify those problems.

It became apparent during the Committee's sessions, for example, that there are differing opinions regarding the scope of article 10 of the Official Languages Act concerning the travelling public. To members of the Committee it appeared that the additional guarantees which the Act provides to the travelling public are explicit and binding, while several crown corporations favoured a more informal view of the clause. The interpretation of one crown corporation which appeared before the Committee was described by the Deputy Commissioner of Official Languages, M. Gilles Lalande, in the following fashion:

"You will understand that for the Commissioner's office, for the Commissioner of Official Languages and the officers who work for him, as for the members of the Special Joint Committee, this is an interpretation which appears to be somewhat different and certainly not far from a contradiction of the position or intention of the legislator at the time the Official Languages Act was adopted."

As a result the Committee has requested these corporations and agencies to submit in writing their interpretation of article 10. The Committee intends to study the matter in detail when it reconvenes in the fall, and will attempt to clarify the obligations of each agency under the Act at that time.

The Committee has also decided to hear the position of various unions when Parliament resumes in the fall to further examine the question of conflict between clauses in the Act regarding provision of services and clauses in certain collective agreements. Finally the Committee intends to recall certain departments and agencies which it heard in the fall, and which it deemed to have serious defects in the provision of their services to the public, to determine what progress has been made to rectify the problems which were noted.

LANGUAGE OF SERVICE

The testimony heard by the Committee has served to confirm the findings of the Commissioner of Official Languages to the effect that, in 1981, twelve years after Parliament's adoption of the Official Languages Act, few, if any, federal institutions are yet capable of meeting the Act's requirements in a fully satisfactory manner. Indeed, in those parts of Canada not included in the bilingual regions established by Treasury Board for administrative purposes, (New Brunswick, Montreal, certain regions of Quebec, Northern and Eastern Ontario and the National Capital Region) service in the language of the minority population is at best sporadic, at worst non-existent. Even within the bilingual regions, departments and agencies are unable to guarantee that a full range of bilingual services are available to the public at all times and in all locations.

If this deplorable situation has been amply documented in the annual reports of the Commissioner of Official Languages, it has been made all the more evident as a result of the testimony provided by the broad range of witnesses heard by the Committee. By probing beyond generalities and getting at the core issue of how, where and to what extent each department and agency is able to provide service in both official languages, the Committee has confirmed the testimony provided by the Commissioner, the Fédération des Francophones hors Québec and the Council of Quebec minorities that much still remains to be done before full compliance with the Official Languages Act is achieved.

While much progress has been achieved over the years, the Committee found that the inability to provide a full range of bilingual services was endemic to virtually every federal institution. Each department and agency offered one or more of the following explanations for this or that weakness: lack of qualified bilingual personnel, recruitment and deployment problems, delays in translation, policy and planning difficulties, costs, conflicting priorities, difficulties arising from provisions in collective agreements, and so on. All implied that language reform was a long-term program and that its overall objectives would not be fully achieved for some years to come.

Committee members made it clear during the meetings that while they found some of these explanations at least partially valid, they deplored the apparent lack of urgency that deputy heads and other senior officials attached to resolving problems which have existed for over a decade. The Committee was particularly critical of the Senate and House of Commons, the two institutions responsible for the Official Languages Act but still unable to meet its requirements in many respects. It suggests that these two bodies should undertake immediate and serious efforts to rectify a situation that is all the more unacceptable given the symbolic importance of Parliament. The Committee also has taken note of the letter sent to the Hon. Jeanne Sauv   on June 2, 1981 by the Commissioner of Official Languages, Mr. Yalden, where he states:

"I assume however, that additional guidelines will now be issued to all organizational units to ensure that their action plans are sufficiently comprehensive, that specific objectives and appropriate time frames are set out, and that implementation can be easily monitored."

The Committee feels that the House should not hesitate to take advantage of this offer of service.

Recommendation 1

The Committee recommends:

(a) that the House of Commons prepare as quickly as possible guidelines and appropriate time frames to elaborate on those tabled in the House in May of 1981 as suggested by the Commissioner of Official Languages in his letter of June 2, 1981, to the Honourable Jeanne Sauv  , and that these guidelines be distributed to all sectors of House administration in order to ensure detailed and definite language plans.

(b) that the Senate proceed as quickly as possible with the formulation of similar guidelines and appropriate time frames.

The Committee also suggests that, if Parliament decides to allow parliamentary committee sessions to be televised, this Committee take advantage of such an opportunity and thereby play an active educational role in informing the public at large of the importance of federal language reform.

The Committee was also made aware of the fact that some federal institutions have taken useful initiatives to improve their ability to serve the public satisfactorily in both official languages. For example, the RCMP has published a brochure which explains in straightforward, jargon-free terms the language-related responsibilities of its personnel; other departments and agencies would be well advised to produce similar material for the information of their staff. Air Canada, too, has had a series of meetings over the past several years with its employee union representatives and has partially resolved some of the conflict that exists between the provisions of the Official Languages Act and certain collective agreements.

These initiatives, however, along with others that could be noted, are all too rare. The overall finding of the Committee is that far too many institutions are all too frequently unable to provide service in the right place at the right time in the right language.

The Committee found that the reasons for this unacceptable state of affairs lies as much in the apparent inability of federal institutions to determine where bilingual services should be made available to the public as in their inability to staff the appropriate positions with qualified bilingual personnel. Despite their responsibility to do so, many departments and agencies have so far failed to translate into practice Section 9 of the Official Languages Act, which determines in broad language the locations where the public can communicate with and obtain services from federal institutions in both official languages.

This key section of the Act obliges a federal institution to provide its services in both official languages a) in the National Capital Region, b) at its head or central office in Canada if outside the National Capital Region, c) at each of its principal offices in a federal bilingual district established where there is significant demand for such services.

Given the importance of the concepts contained in Section 9 of the Act, the Committee asked several witnesses to provide their views on bilingual districts, significant demand and related issues.

1) Bilingual Districts

The Committee found that part of the problem associated with implementation of Section 9 results from the fact that, notwithstanding the recommendations contained in the reports of the two bilingual district advisory boards established since the Act came into force, the Government has never proclaimed any bilingual districts. (According to the provisions of Section 14(1) of the Act, the Governor in Council will be required to establish another such board once the language-related data of the 1981 census are prepared and sent to the Clerk of the Privy Council.)

In response to a question from a Committee member who, while specifying that he had never been strongly in favour of bilingual districts, nevertheless asked for the Commissioner's views on the subject, the Commissioner stated as follows:

"Personally, I am rather favourable to the concept of bilingual districts. One reason is that they would guarantee a greater stability and degree of certainty to the official language minority whether it be the French-speaking minority outside of Quebec or the English-speaking minority in Quebec. In bilingual districts, the minority would be entitled to government services as an absolute right and not depending on their actual numbers or level of demand. There would be no need to determine whether there is sufficient or sizeable demand in a certain area of New Brunswick, for example. Such areas would be designated as bilingual districts and the population would be guaranteed its rights. Just as I support language guarantees in the constitution and provincial legislation in preference to regulations or bureaucratic decisions, I subscribe to a measure such as this since it would establish rights for the minority. Why is this necessary? If it is only a question of privilege, on mainly a matter of interpretation on the part of civil servants, there is far too much latitude for those who have no desire to provide services to the minority. I would prefer a greater clarification."

Notwithstanding this view point expressed by the Commissioner, Committee members reached a consensus in subsequent meetings that the establishment of bilingual districts would not represent a satisfactory solution to the language-of-service issue. Among other problems Committee members noted that bilingual districts were established on the basis of geographic guidelines which were too rigid. The Committee noted that it would be unacceptable to abolish a bilingual district in the future if a census indicated that the minority official language population of a given region had declined to the point where it constituted less than 10% of the total population of that region.

Recommendation 2

The Committee therefore recommends that the Official Languages Act be amended so as to remove all references to federal bilingual districts.

2) Active Offer of Service

Testimony revealed that the concept of significant demand, as expressed in Section 9(2) of the Official Languages Act, is interpreted differently by individual federal departments and agencies. When assessing or defining significant demand, some departments do so in terms of the demand they have determined as existing in a given location, while others do so in terms of the size of the official language minority population of a region, on the basis of information received from minority language associations or as a result of market studies and surveys. Certain departments base their approach on the bilingual regions concept established by Treasury Board for the purpose of language of work, assume significant demand in these regions and try to assess demand in other regions. Still others use different criteria: for example, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission defines significant demand as demand which is too difficult to meet satisfactorily through administrative arrangements.

It should also be stressed that the assessment of demand in a given region may differ from one department to another. In short, no clear criterion has been established to assist departments and agencies in deciding when or where demand for service in both official languages is significant.

On a related issue, the Committee found that the current wording of Section 9 places the onus on the minority official language population to demonstrate that service should be offered in its language. On this matter, the Committee endorses the Commissioner's view that such an onus is inconsistent with the overall spirit and intent of the Act, which would seem to suggest that federal institutions should actively offer services in both official languages rather than wait for demand to surface. As the Commissioner noted during one of his appearances before the Committee:

"the minority communities, that is the French-speaking groups outside Quebec, are so accustomed to accepting government services in the majority language, that is in English, that there is in fact no demand for services in French."

The Commissioner further noted that, when departments actively offer their services in both official languages, demand for service in the minority language almost invariably increases.

In light of this testimony, the Committee was faced with the problem of how to provide the official language minority population with a more concrete guarantee of service in its language. This problem is made all the more acute by the Committee's decision to recommend the removal from the Act of all references to bilingual districts.

After much deliberation, the Committee decided that the essentially mathematical concept of 'where numbers warrant' would serve as a useful complement to the more abstract concept of significant demand. In a sense, too, the concept of 'where numbers warrant' would retain the mathematical notion on which bilingual districts were to be based without being rigidly tied to the 10% population statistic intrinsic to bilingual districts. In addition, in order to clarify and strengthen this section of the Act, the Committee decided that the notion of active offer of services should be incorporated into any amended wording and that the term 'to the extent that it is feasible to do so' be removed.

Recommendation 3

The Committee therefore recommends that Section 9 of the Official Languages Act be amended to:

- a) delete the words "and at each of its principal offices in a federal bilingual district established under this Act" (see Recommendation 1), and (to the extent that it is feasible to do so);*
- b) include the concept of 'where there is significant demand and/or where numbers warrant';*
- c) include the concept of 'active offer of service'.*

3) Responsibility of Determining 'Significant Demand' and 'Where Numbers Warrant'

As noted above, it became evident during Committee hearings that few departments and agencies have been able to define satisfactorily the locations where there is a significant demand from the official language minority population. On the other hand, the Treasury Board Secretariat does not appear to have taken all the initiatives it might have done in the circumstances. The Commissioner of Official Languages confirmed the perceptions of Committee members vis-à-vis the assessment of significant demand when he stated:

"Now, what has happened is that Treasury Board has in effect put out a general directive, which in essence is: when you are in doubt, assume the demand is there. There is a circular of that sort; but the departments, depending on which ones they are, might ignore it and Treasury Board does not do anything about it. Our complaint against the Treasury Board is that they are not nearly severe enough with departments. At least, they are not in this area; I do not know about other areas. They simply do not insist, do not push; they put out general guidelines in rather milquetoast-like vocabulary and then sit back and hope the departments will do something about it, and often they do not."

In response to a question from a Committee member who asked if it would not be possible to have a regulation under the Act which would stipulate that the Office of the Commissioner of Official Languages should define where demand is significant, the Commissioner stated:

"I think that would be fine. If you will, this is an example where the law allows too much hanky-panky in trying to figure out where there is sufficient demand or not, and therefore a more objective observer—I would be prepared to take on that responsibility."

After careful examination, the Committee agreed that it was time that regulations having the force of law be issued by the Governor in Council, especially since Section 35 of the Official Language Act provides for the following:

"The Governor in Council may make such regulations as he deems necessary to effect compliance with this Act in the conduct of the affairs of the Government of Canada and departments and agencies of the Government of Canada."

It would now appear opportune to use this particular section of the Act. The Committee also decided that the Commissioner of Official Languages, using his power of recommendation, would be the most appropriate person to suggest the locations where services should be provided in the manner established by an amended Section 9.

Recommendation 4

The Committee therefore recommends that locations 'where numbers warrant' and locations 'where there is significant demand' be determined by the Governor in Council upon recommendation by the Commissioner of Official Languages and that the appropriate regulations be passed under Section 35 of the Official Languages Act.

4) Identification of Bilingual Positions

Testimony presented to the Committee by most departments and agencies indicated that few of them had identified the real need for bilingual services in the so-called unilingual regions of Canada. Consequently, the accuracy with which they had identified the number and deployment of bilingual positions raised serious doubts. Several departments had identified as few as two or three bilingual positions in each of the Western provinces, and occasionally none had been so identified in Newfoundland. A significant number of departments encountered difficulty in providing bilingual services anywhere outside of Quebec. Several audits by the Treasury Board revealed numerous lapses by departments regarding the provision of bilingual service even in the National Capital Region, where there is, under the Act, an obligation to provide bilingual services.

In addition—and perhaps even more serious—as few as half of these scarce bilingual positions are filled by bilingual incumbents. Moreover, the level of second-language knowledge required of the incumbent of such positions is often far too low to enable the employee to provide effective service to the minority language population. Recent Treasury Board studies reveal that a large number of occupants of bilingual positions still make little use of both languages and in fact ignore the bilingual designation of their positions. It may be presumed that a certain number of these positions were not correctly identified: Treasury Board is currently examining some 4,000 bilingual positions which carry language requirements that require the lowest level of second language proficiency together with an estimated required use of less than 10% of all communication time.

Taken together, these facts indicate that some departmental services are virtually non-existent in the minority language in Western Canada and in Newfoundland. If someone is on holiday, sick, on coffee or lunch break or absent for some other reason, the partial and unsatisfactory service sometimes available disappears completely.

Recommendation 5

The Committee recommends that by March 31, 1982, each department and agency be required to determine what bilingual resources it has at its disposal or should acquire in order to enable it to offer satisfactory services in the second official language, examine the identification of all positions providing service to the public, and subsequently identify as bilingual an adequate number of positions.

5) Imperative Staffing with Regard to Service to the Public

The Parliamentary Resolution on Official Languages, adopted in June 1973, made provisions for the appointment of unilingual persons to bilingual positions on the condition that they state their willingness to take language training at government expense. It also recognized that employees who, since the April 1966 Pearson statement, had had at least ten years of continuous government service, had the right to apply for and be appointed to most bilingual positions, even if they refused to become bilingual. Furthermore, the Resolution recognized “incumbent rights”, which enable the incumbents of unilingual positions reidentified as bilingual, or bilingual positions where the required language standard has been raised, to stay in their position without acquiring the necessary language skills.

These procedures represent a digression from the full application of the merit principle, as established in Sections 10 and 20 of the Public Service Employment Act. Such appointments are made possible by the Official Languages Exclusion Order which suspends application of those sections of the Public Service Employment Act for several thousand candidates each year. The original deadline set for ending this system was December 31, 1978.

In September 1977, the Government published its “Revised Official Languages Policies in the Public Service of Canada”, in which it postponed this deadline to December 31, 1983. The Government also stated that employees 55 years of age or over on October 31, 1977 would henceforth be able to apply for most bilingual positions even if they did not state their willingness to become bilingual.

On January 30, 1981, the President of the Treasury Board added further modifications to the official languages policies, once again postponing the deadline, without, however, specifying a new one. Such staffing measures would be maintained as long as they were needed, “in other words, as long as the number of bilingual employees is inadequate in certain sectors”.

After careful study, the Committee decided that the conditional staffing powers, which should have been the exception to the rule and temporary in nature, is becoming a system unto itself.

Imperative staffing, whereby qualified bilingual persons are appointed to bilingual positions, was originally to have been the cornerstone of language reform. It is now anything but, since it was used for only 1.5% of appointments to bilingual positions in 1978, 2.6% in 1979 and 5.9% in 1980. Moreover, these percentages include imperative appointments resulting from the nature and technical requirements of certain positions (e.g. translators, interpreters, editors, revisers). Imperative staffing actions increase each year, but so does the percentage of unilingual persons appointed to bilingual positions (12.2% in 1978, 15.3% in 1980).

In the Committee's view, imperative staffing is essential if the Public Service of Canada is to attain institutional bilingualism. As long as unilingual individuals occupy key positions relating to service to the public, it will be impossible to speak about service of equal quality in both official languages. In the Committee's view, it is irrational to allow a majority of such bilingual positions to be filled by unilingual candidates. Services offered to the official language minority groups in these regions are grossly inadequate; there are too few bilingual positions, the level of bilingualism required is too low, and the incumbent of the position very often does not meet the language requirements of the positions upon appointment. Even if the unilingual candidate returns from language training with a certain knowledge of the second language, he very often loses that skill because of lack of practice. Finally, while the employee is on language training, the department is obliged to use “administrative arrangements” as a means of offering its services.

The Treasury Board announced in January 1981 that, as of the fall of 1981, departments will receive delegated authority to staff positions on an imperative basis without obtaining prior permission from the Public Service Commission. The Committee regrets the fact that there are few criteria according to which departments will be able to staff positions in this manner. While it is encouraged by the new criterion enabling managers to staff on an imperative basis positions which, for three years and for whatever reason, have been occupied by employees who do not satisfy the language requirements of those positions, the Committee would have preferred this new criterion to become a requirement.

In addition the Committee is not satisfied with the Government's recent arbitrary decision to carry over for an indefinite period the use of non-imperative staffing procedures despite the fact that in the fall of 1977 the revised official languages policy established December 31, 1983 as a firm date. In the Committee's opinion the Government did not give valid reasons to justify this revision, which will have the effect of delaying once again the establishment of a truly bilingual public service.

Recommendation 6

The Committee therefore recommends:

- (a) that the December 31, 1983 deadline be re-established after which there should be no conditional appointments*
- (b) that this deadline be confirmed by parliamentary resolution.*

CONCLUSION

The hearings conducted by the Committee have provided an initial forum for parliamentarians to review the progress made to date in the area of language reform. These sessions have enabled Members and Senators to re-assess the substance of the Official Languages Act and to evaluate the performance of central agencies with regard to their official languages programme responsibilities. As a result of these hearings the Committee is convinced that amendments must be made to the Official Languages Act, and trusts that the Government, and ultimately Parliament, will give the necessary priority to the recommendations contained in this report. In order to complete its work, the Committee requests that it be reconstituted.

SUMMARY OF RECOMMENDATIONS

Recommendation 1

The Committee recommends:

- a) that the House of Commons prepare as quickly as possible guidelines and appropriate time frames to elaborate on those tabled in the House in May of 1981 as suggested by the Commissioner of Official Languages in his letter of June 2, 1981, to the Honourable Jeanne Sauvé, and that these guidelines be distributed to all sectors of House* administration in order to ensure detailed and definite language plans.

- b) that the Senate proceed as quickly as possible with the formulation of similar guidelines and appropriate time frames.*

Recommendation 2

The Committee therefore recommends that the Official Languages Act be amended so as to remove all references to federal bilingual districts.

Recommendation 3

The Committee therefore recommends that Section 9 of the Official Languages Act be amended to:

- a) delete the words "and at each of its principal offices in a federal bilingual district established under this Act" (see Recommendation 1), and 'to the extent that it is feasible to do so';*
- b) include the concept of 'where there is significant demand and/or where numbers warrant';*
- c) include the concept of 'active offer of service'.*

Recommendation 4

The Committee therefore recommends that locations 'where numbers warrant' and locations 'where there is significant demand' be determined by the Governor in Council upon recommendation by the Commissioner of Official Languages and that the appropriate regulations be passed under Section 35 of the Official Languages Act.

Recommendation 5

The Committee recommends that by March 31, 1982, each department and agency be required to determine what bilingual resources it has at its disposal or should acquire in order to enable it to offer satisfactory services in the second official language, examine the identification of all positions providing service to the public, and subsequently identify as bilingual an adequate number of positions.

Recommendation 6

The Committee therefore recommends:

- a) that the December 31, 1983 deadline be re-established after which there should be no conditional appointments*

Report of the Minister of Supply and Services Canada under the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act (Part II, Labour Unions) for the fiscal period ended in 1979, pursuant to section 18(1) of the said Act, Chapter C-31, R.S.C., 1970.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will not present a formal notice of motion for adjournment at this time but, with your permission, I will explain what the plan for the day is. If events occur as scheduled, I will then present a motion consistent with that plan.

We will proceed with our agenda, the next item being Question Period, followed, of course, by Orders of the Day. Among the Orders of the Day are third readings of two bills, and second reading of Bill C-83, which was just referred to in the message we received from the House of Commons.

In addition, however, we expect to be dealing with Bill C-82, to amend the Pension Act and the Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act. It is expected that in the House of Commons at twelve o'clock, that being the time when Question Period there finishes, Bill C-82 will be introduced and debated. If the other place passes that bill we will most likely receive it just before one o'clock. If that is the case and we pass the bill, and if we also pass Bill C-83, which has to do with salaries, we will then want those bills assented to before we adjourn. For that reason, the plan is to have the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General here for two o'clock, and Royal Assent at about 2.15 p.m.

All of those steps are subject to the usual slip between cup and lip, but that is how we have planned it and what we hope to be able to do.

Just to recapitulate, we will have Question Period, we will then deal with the third readings of the bills that were given second reading yesterday, and we will then proceed with Bill C-83.

We shall complete our consideration of Bill C-83 and our order paper before 1 o'clock. At that point we will adjourn during pleasure to reassemble at the call of the bell. Should we receive Bill C-82 at 1 o'clock, then we shall continue to sit between 1 and 2 p.m. to deal with it in order to be ready for Royal Assent. After Royal Assent, I shall move that we stand adjourned until October 14.

According to rumour, there is the possibility that the House of Commons will not adjourn. Apparently, some of the members in the other place wish to discuss the postal strike. Unless there are a number of honourable senators who also wish to stay on to discuss the postal matter or any other matter, I shall assume, and hope, that the motion for adjournment will be agreed to.

The Senate does not have to include a special provision in its adjournment with regard to being called back because our rule 14A(1) provides:

If, during any adjournment of the Senate, the Speaker is satisfied that the public interest requires that the Senate meet at a time earlier than that set forth in the motion for such adjournment, the Speaker may call such a meeting by sending a notice to each senator at the latest address of the senator filed with the Clerk of the Senate, informing the senator of the time of the meeting.

Honourable senators, that is the plan for the day and the plan for the adjournment. I shall be glad to answer any questions.

● (1005)

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the plan just outlined by the Deputy Leader of the Government is as a result of discussions between him and me. The only detail that we might review is with regard to the adjournment to await the arrival of Bill C-82 from the House of Commons. If we do not receive that bill before we complete consideration of the Orders of the Day, then I suggest that it would be appropriate to reconvene at 1.30 p.m. to deal with Bill C-82. Since the bill is non-controversial and is welcomed, Senator Macdonald will need only a few minutes to deal with it. I am confident that we can complete the entire matter before 2 o'clock, at which time we might have Royal Assent.

Senator Frith: I agree, honourable senators.

[Senator Frith.]

QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

POST OFFICE

DISRUPTION OF SERVICE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I ask the government leader if he has anything new on the postal strike, whether there has been a move from one side or the other? I would like to know, for instance, whether my suggestion that Mr. Warren be called to act as an observer, in order to prevent Mr. Parrot's proposal from being flatly turned down, has been considered by the government and Mr. Johnston.

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have nothing further to report on the postal strike. However, I am hopeful that some information will be forthcoming later today. The material I had hoped to provide for honourable senators in the form of a delayed answer has not yet been received.

Senator Flynn: I hope that when the Leader of the Government receives the additional information it will also indicate whether it is still the position of the government not to ask Parliament to legislate the strikers back to work.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the observations of the Leader of the Opposition have been noted. Certainly, to my knowledge, there has been no change in the government's position with respect to Mr. Warren's becoming an active negotiator in the discussions. However, as to the Leader of the Opposition's suggestion that Mr. Warren attend the discussions as an observer, I have not yet received an answer from the minister responsible for the Post Office.

INDUSTRY

IMPORTATION OF AUTOMOBILES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I want to apologize to the house for a small error I made yesterday. Upon checking the records, I found one question which had been directed to me left unanswered. It was a question asked by Senator Smith concerning the auto industry. I believe I said yesterday that I had completed the delayed answers. I apologize for that and would indicate that, if we have adjourned by the time I receive the details in order to provide that answer, I will send them to the honourable senator's office.

THE BUDGET—EXTENSION OF FEDERAL SALES TAX—EFFECT ON MARGINAL MANUFACTURING

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on December 16, 1980, Senator Sherwood asked a question about how the extension of the federal sales tax to marginal manufacturing will impact upon food prices, and whether the government has studied the expected outcome and, if so, whether it is prepared to release details.

At that time he asked two other questions, one relating to the imposition of the tax on marginal manufacturing and one relating to the possible additional unemployment which could be created if certain importers close their assembly or packaging plants in Canada.

I have a rather long reply which I propose be incorporated in the record of today's proceedings. If Senator Sherwood has further questions on the basis of this reply, I shall certainly do my best to obtain any additional information requested.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Foodstuffs are exempt of federal sales tax. Thus packagers of foods will not incur any tax liability because of the change. Such persons will actually benefit because the provision will allow them to acquire their packaging equipment on a tax exempt basis. To the extent that these reduced equipment costs are passed on to wholesalers and retailers, consumers will also benefit.

Importers do have the opportunity to arrange their affairs so as to minimize their tax burden. Nevertheless, it is unlikely that significant cost savings would be attained by closing facilities in Canada and relocating abroad. First, incoming freight costs would increase because the packaged product would be more bulky and more costly to ship. Secondly, the packaging would enhance the value for duty and tax calculation purposes which, turn, would increase the impact of both those levies. It is possible that these two increased cost elements would offset any tax saving attained by ceasing the packaging activity in Canada.

The measure is designed to aid Canadian manufacturers who utilize Canadian raw materials and Canadian labour by making them more competitive with importers whose products consist mainly of foreign raw materials and foreign labour. It could be expected that Canadian manufacturing activity will be stimulated which, in turn, will increase employment. The increased manufacturing activity should result in a net employment gain notwithstanding that a few importers may choose to shift their packaging abroad.

TRANSPORT

NEWFOUNDLAND—LOSS OF ARCTIC EXPLORER—NEED FOR INCREASED SEARCH AND RESCUE CAPABILITY—ADDITIONAL INFORMATION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, additional information has come to hand in response to a question asked by Senator Doody on July 6 concerning the amount of time it took rescue planes to reach the survivors of Arctic Explorer and the location of fixed-wing aircraft in Newfoundland.

As to the amount of time it took the helicopters to reach the survivors, it took 13 minutes after the rescue center in Halifax had been alerted for the helicopters to be tasked. They were airborne within 42 minutes, including the time it took to get into the air. It took 1 hour and 55 minutes from tasking time to on-search.

The fixed-wing Buffalo aircraft, sent from Summerside, P.E.I., took 19 minutes to task after receiving the overdue report. They were airborne within 1 hour and 28 minutes of tasking. From tasking to on-search took 3 hours and 20 minutes which included refuelling at St. Anthony.

It should be emphasized, honourable senators, that this information is preliminary information coming from the DND log, and is subject to the official investigation by Transport Canada.

Concerning the location of fixed-wing aircraft in Newfoundland, it is obviously impossible to have the resources to guard against all the possibilities along 4,000 miles of coastline on both the Atlantic and the Pacific oceans. I have been informed that our people, in both the Department of National Defence and the Department of Transport, try to centralize equipment and resources in locations where most incidents occur.

Honourable senators, a question was asked by Senator Marshall on July 6 concerning an investigation into the sinking of Arctic Explorer.

On July 8, 1981, the Minister of Transport announced that a formal investigation will be held to investigate the sinking of the ship, Arctic Explorer. Under the Canada Shipping Act, the commissioner of such an inquiry is empowered to investigate all aspects of such a casualty.

Since communications may often play a pivotal role in providing information on circumstances on board a ship at any crucial time, they would most probably be an integral part of such a formal investigation.

VIA RAIL—REVIEW OF SERVICE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, questions regarding VIA Rail were asked by a number of senators yesterday. I would refer honourable senators to the answer given last week in the other place by the Minister of Transport. At that time he said that cabinet had not made a final decision on the future of rail passenger services. This is still the case.

Obviously, the government is very much concerned at VIA's mounting operating deficit—it will be $365 million this year alone—and there is a clear need for greater capital investment to modernize the fleet. That is why a review of the rail passenger program is taking place.

Honourable senators will have noted that VIA took delivery of its first LRC—those initials stand for light, rapid and comfortable, and, hopefully, on time as well—train set last Tuesday. This is a tangible indication of the government's commitment to passenger rail.

As to what specific elements are being considered in the review, it should be repeated that no final decision has been made. When it has, it will be announced immediately.

The reply by the minister in the other place may be found at page 11080 of House of Commons Debates of June 30.

SASKATCHEWAN—REGINA AIRPORT EXPANSION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was asked by Senator Balfour on June 17 last concerning the Regina airport expansion. Again, this is a very detailed reply, and I would be pleased to have it incorporated in today's record.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

The Regina Airport Study which recommended that the airport be retained and further developed in its present location, the air terminal be expanded and the runway and taxiway complex be developed, was accepted by the Minister of Transport and Saskatchewan's Minister of Municipal Affairs in June 1978.

Concepts for expanding the air terminal building have been prepared and approved in principle by the airlines.

A Treasury Board submission covering the hiring of consultants for preliminary design work and developing estimates has been approved by the Board on June 25, 1981.

Approval in principle to cover the entire project, expansion of the air terminal with associated airside and groundside work has been requested from the Treasury Board but not yet granted. It is expected that the proposed expansion of the air terminal and related works will meet the forecast traffic demand to 1991. The estimated cost of the project which is to be phased over several years to avoid disruption of air terminal building operations is approximately $19 million and the main elements are as follows:

1. Expand and modify the air terminal building to provide permanent customs facilities, additional airline operational areas, adequate baggage handling and public area facilities, additional food services and other concession areas, additional aircraft loading bridges, et cetera.
2. Groundside facilities including increased air terminal building curb area, public and employee parking lot expansion, realignment of the terminal area roadways and landscaping.
3. Airside improvements including the strengthening and reconstruction of apron areas associated with the air terminal building expansion.

[Senator Perrault.]

It should also be noted that this is not an interim or abbreviated plan.

NATIONAL REVENUE

CUSTOMS—EFFECT OF DECISION OF SUPREME COURT OF CANADA

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Nurgitz on June 30, 1981, regarding the Supreme Court decision in the case of The Queen v. Shelley. Senator Nurgitz asked two questions: Whether the contents of the judgment have been made known to customs officials; and, if so, what the impact of that knowledge is.

In reply to the first question it can be stated that the regions have been advised of the content of the judgment.

The response to the second question is that this decision impacts only on criminal cases such as the Gene Shelley case. The Crown will have to prove unlawful importation, or other matters referred to in section 248 of the Customs Act, beyond a reasonable doubt. Previously, section 248 could be relied upon to place the burden on the accused to prove the matters referred to therein.

PRIVATE BILLS

ONTARIO NEWS COMPANY, LIMITED—MESSAGE FROM COMMONS

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons returning Bill S-20, to revive Ontario News Company, Limited and to provide for its continuance under the Canada Business Corporations Act, and acquainting the Senate that they had passed the bill without amendment.

G.A. BARBER & SONS LIMITED—MESSAGE FROM COMMONS

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons returning Bill S-21, to revive G.A. ITALY

EARTHQUAKE DISASTER—CANADIAN AID—REPORT OF NATIONAL COORDINATING COMMITTEE

Hon. Pietro Rizzuto: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, it is my pleasure to give you a brief report on the financing campaign to assist the victims of the earthquake in Southern Italy on November 23, 1980.

The funds collected by the National Coordinating Committee amount to $87,905,265. These funds come from every region of Canada and also include the contribution of our governments.

The campaign was held under the leadership of our Speaker, Honourable Senator Jean Marchand, whom I wish to thank in my own name and on behalf of all the victims who will be able to benefit from the generous assistance provided by our fellow Canadians.

I also want to express the thanks of the Chairman of the National Congress of Italo-Canadians, the organization which represents most Italians in Canada.

In addition to the contributions received by our ad hoc committee, immediate assistance was provided by organizations such as the emergency services of the Canadian Red Cross, our dioceses and our governments, and all this assistance amounts to $3 million. Total Canadian contributions exceed $12 million.

The ad hoc committee intends to use the $8,905,000 collected on behalf of the victims in southern Italy as follows: $1 million to build housing for senior citizens; $1 million to build school gymnasiums, and the rest to build houses.

Once again, honourable senators, I would like to thank Senator Marchand for his very generous participation. His assistance was not limited to the collection of funds, but he also went to Italy in January. His contribution was very helpful in making this campaign truly successful. Thank you.

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the third reading of Bill C-81, to amend the Official Residences Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the third reading of Bill C-14, to amend the Diplomatic and Consular Privileges and Immunities Act.

• (1020)

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, I was not in the chamber yesterday when Bill C-14 received second reading.

Having read the debate in which Senator Goldenberg and Senator Flynn participated, I am pleased with the interpretation expressed by them regarding the recognition of the Baltic states.

Annually, on the occasion of the celebration of Baltic Evening on Parliament Hill, the honorary consuls of the Baltic states have been enthusiastically greeted in this chamber. This bill does not prevent this recognition of our favourable relations with those honorary consuls.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT SALARIES ACT PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES ACT MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT RETIRING ALLOWANCES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-83, to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act, the Salaries Act, the Parliamentary Secretaries Act and the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act.

He said: Honourable senators, today we have before us a bill originating in the other place, the purpose of which is to increase the remuneration of parliamentarians.

Undoubtedly, some members of the public will say that the moment is ill chosen. But is there ever a "correct" time for increasing parliamentary indemnities? I have been in Parliament for many years, after serving in a legislative assembly. Other honourable senators have had as long or longer parliamentary service. Can any of us ever recall a "correct" time, a "popular" time, for a salary increase for parliamentarians? Again, this time, in the view of some Canadians, this may not be considered to be the correct time for indemnity adjustments.

Some members of the public expect parliamentarians to devote themselves exclusively to the problems of the nation to the exclusion of all other considerations. Many forget that the men and women who accept this difficult and demanding role and occupation must also be allowed to take care of their families and live an adequate life. Some forget that the complexities of present society and the proliferation of problems confronting Canadians impose an ever greater burden upon parliamentarians than they did many years ago. Today the work of a parliamentarian, certainly at the national level, is year-round. There was a time in the history of our nation when Parliament met for two or three months a year, but that is no longer the case. In one way or another, almost all of us are involved in parliamentary work for 12 months of the year.

Among the contemporary burdens placed upon parliamentarians, is the sensitive task of voting themselves the remuneration that will be paid to them. Perhaps in the future it may be possible—and I hope that time will come—for a better system of establishing levels of parliamentary indemnities to be put in place. In my view, all of us should assiduously pursue the task of putting in place a system of determining indemnities which can win public acceptance. Certainly we should determine how other jurisdictions manage this very sensitive problem. If we can find a better method, then most assuredly we should adopt it. At first glance the process of parliamentarians establishing their indemnity levels seems to be a significant privilege. In reality it is a thankless burden.

● (1025)

Parliamentary salaries and allowances were last revised in 1974. An annual adjustment formula and the creation of a commission to study the remuneration of parliamentarians were then established by law.

Honourable senators will recall that in 1979 a commission was established after the election of the Clark Conservative government. Because of the 1980 election it became impossible to implement that commission's report, which had been prepared very conscientiously by Mr. Alfred Hales, a former distinguished Conservative parliamentarian.

Another commission was established, composed of Mr. Cliff MacIsaac and the Honourable Léon Balcer, whose report was tabled in this chamber last December. Both of these gentlemen, of course, are former parliamentarians with outstanding records of service, one a member of the Liberal Party and the other a member of the Progressive Conservative Party.

The MacIsaac-Balcer document was prepared very thoroughly and conscientiously. Parliamentarians, I think, found themselves in agreement with many of the recommendations contained in it, although not all of them; but it was generally an excellent document, the result of thorough study and serious consideration.

The bill before us, a copy of which honourable senators have, proposes to increase the remuneration of parliamentarians. Permit me, however, to be more precise. It would be misleading simply to focus the discussion on the simple percentage increase reflected by this bill. In reality, it is a matter of determining the salaries of parliamentarians and evaluating the remuneration which is due to them. Canadians expect their parliamentary representatives, whether they serve in the House of Commons or in the Senate, to be both competent and devoted. They do not want political careers to be reserved solely to the independently wealthy. Most importantly, they count on those who make the decisions that affect the collective future of the nation to be independent of outside sources of income in order to assure impartial judgment.

Sessional allowances are granted to permit parliamentarians to live decently, but without luxury, in order that they may devote themselves fully to the affairs of state. Parliamentarians, of course, must sacrifice their private lives, and in most cases must maintain two residences, between which they must commute for much of the year. That presents, as all members of this chamber have found, very expensive problems. People do not enter political life to enrich themselves, but neither should they ruin themselves financially in doing so.

[Senator Perrault.]

The MacIsaac-Balcer all-party report made many recommendations concerning the salaries of parliamentarians, recognizing the difficulties of their work: the long hours, the necessity for them to be present in Ottawa to discuss problems concerning the nation as a whole, and to be present in their regions and their constituencies to listen to individual Canadians and to attempt to solve their problems.

The government, in consultation with the opposition parties—and I think it should be emphasized that there were long meetings involving representatives of the Conservative Party and the New Democratic Party—gave long and serious consideration to the report's recommendations. The increases contained in this bill would be retroactive to July 1, 1980. In effect, the MacIsaac-Balcer report studied the salaries in force on January 1, 1980, and it is only reasonable that the delays that were necessary because of the time required for the drafting of the bill should not retard the coming into force of the recommendations. The government, in consultation with the other parties, with Mr. Clark, Mr. Broadbent and Mr. Trudeau in agreement—an agreement involving party caucuses—is recommending the adoption of only two-thirds of the increases recommended in the MacIsaac-Balcer report, even though parliamentarians have received salary adjustments which have been less than those of the majority of Canadians over the past seven years.

● (1030)

No honourable senator wishes to see the chamber devote time each year to the consideration of salaries when there is so much parliamentary business before Parliament. That is why the law establishes an annual adjustment formula. This fills the vacuum caused by the absence of a negotiating partner with whom parliamentarians would negotiate an annual salary adjustment.

This formula is not cast in stone. Its value and its effectiveness is verified after each general election. The MacIsaac-Balcer report recommended that the annual allowance and salary adjustment of members of Parliament be based on a complex process of comparison and evaluation of average increases in many sectors of the economy. Rather than follow this path, which would be difficult in application and which would raise much controversy, the bill proposes to alter the existing formula. It advances what is felt by all of the parties to be an improved formula. The annual adjustment would be one per cent less than the lesser of the industrial composite and the consumer price index. This formula tends to ensure a more normal evolution of remuneration of parliamentarians without unnecessarily taking up parliamentary time.

All of us are aware of the plight of certain parliamentarians in all parties who were defeated, left almost penniless and with all of their former employment connections lost because of their service here. We want to do something to help situations such as this. The MacIsaac-Balcer report suggested what I believe—and I think many of those who have served in Parliament will agree—is a long overdue reform: severance allowances for members in the other place who are defeated or those who must leave Parliament because of ill health and so on.

This is, I repeat, a long overdue reform. Those who have gone through election campaigns and have seen some of their colleagues literally reduced to a penniless status within months of being defeated in an election will welcome this reform. The reform affects only those in the other place, but I support it most enthusiastically. I know that other honourable senators will support it as well. The report also recommended that a defeated MP eligible for retirement benefits be given a smaller but similar allocation.

The bill proposes to accord a severance allowance along the lines of those recommended by the MacIsaac-Balcer report, but only to those ineligible for retirement benefits. I believe this is another good reform. This allowance would also be payable to those who must retire from public life for reasons of health. Of course, this again applies to those who serve in the other place. I personally am most enthusiastic about this proposal. The amount would be equal to half of the remuneration to which a member of the House of Commons was entitled.

The bill also proposes to modify certain provisions of the House of Commons pension plan. The contributions would be increased from 7.5 per cent to 10 per cent, because it is rare that today's member of the House of Commons can sit for 25 years or more to receive the maximum retirement benefit. This period has been reduced to a more realistic one of 15 years. The bill also provides for supplementary retirement benefits to parliamentarians who receive a salary for additional parliamentary responsibilities.

Referring specifically to the Senate, sessional allowances have been increased to $40,200 per annum, which is the same amount as members of the other place receive. The principle of equality and parity has been retained.

Additionally, new allowances are established for the government whip and the opposition whip. Let me say that both of them serve this chamber extremely well. In Senator Petten and Senator Macdonald we have two outstanding senators who are a credit to the parliamentary system.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: This is a long overdue recognition. All senators agree that the whips are fully deserving of such additional compensation.

With regard to a revised pension plan for senators, the Internal Economy Committee is distributing proposals and is inviting all honourable senators to comment on them. It is suggested that careful study be given to the provisions for pensions for members of the other place. The Mercer document and the recommendations from the budget subcommittee have been discussed on a preliminary basis, and the document is being distributed to all honourable senators. When the recommendations and comments have been received, they will be directed to the chairman of the subcommittee, the Honourable Senator Barrow. The necessary changes will then be recommended to the Senate leadership and the government. I want to assure honourable senators, who note that there are no changes in that section of the bill with respect to senators, that members of the cabinet, particularly the Minister of Finance, are aware of certain anomalies which exist in the Senate pension plan. Senate recommendations for change and reform have been invited and are welcome.

Honourable senators, I have nothing further to add. I believe that the bill is worthy of support. Thus I urge support on second reading for this measure.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the delicate operation of establishing the salaries of members of Parliament is one of the most distasteful we are called upon to carry out. It is even more difficult for members of the House of Commons than for us here in the Senate. They always have to face their electors afterwards. Although in a great many cases the electors do not hesitate at all to seek the services of their representatives, they feel absolutely no reluctance either to criticize them and tell them that they are overpaid. All that makes for an altogether unpleasant atmosphere in the House of Commons, in particular when it is time to come to grips with that issue.

Since 1975, if memory serves me right, there is a provision in the Senate and House of Commons Act, section 34(7), under which the government has the obligation, after each general election, of appointing one or more commissioners to inquire into the adequacy of the annual variations of sessional allowances payable to members of the Senate and House of Commons and other allowances payable to them and to report thereon with such recommendations as they consider appropriate, within six months after the time of their appointment.

As the Leader of the Government pointed out, after the 1979 election the Clark government appointed Mr. Alf Hales. Naturally, the following election was called much too soon for the Clark government to implement the conclusions of his report.

After the 1980 election, the government now in office appointed Dr. McIsaac and the Honourable Léon Balcer, under the same provision of the Senate and House of Commons Act, to draft a report on that question. We have had that report since the month of November 1980. It has since been debated at various levels.

What we have before us today, this bill, is the result of bipartisan consultations where all parties were represented. But I must emphasize that it was mainly the parties of the House of Commons which were involved in those negotiations. Unfortunately most often the Senate has been left aside. Our problem is somewhat different, of course. When we debate those questions we in the Senate are certainly less tense than our colleagues in the Commons. In any event, the fact remains that one of the major difficulties of the system as it now exists, with respect to the typical reactions we all know, is that the Senate is almost always excluded from the preliminary discussions.

The Leader of the Government mentioned that it would be desirable to have another system which would free all parliamentarians, from both the House of Commons and the Senate, from this responsibility, because it is inevitably subjective.

It is not easy because in fact the decision will always remain with Parliament. Parliament cannot delegate its powers. Someone mentioned the system used in Australia or New Zealand where the commission of inquiry into the matter had to table its report before Parliament. After the report is tabled, and provided it does not meet with opposition from members or senators—I am not sure of the number—if it is not opposed, the report is automatically implemented. Is that more satisfactory? I do not know. One thing is certain; with our method we do receive a report from objective people, from outside Parliament, who have experience that they have acquired elsewhere in most cases. Nonetheless, as the Leader of the Government indicated, the public rarely reacts favourably.

However, in general in this instance, reactions in the press have been correct and showed an understanding of the situation. But there will always be people who will want to distort the scope of certain decisions. They always refer to the expense allowance, for instance, as a part of the salary. If members of Parliament or senators were asked to keep an expense account for each day they spend in Ottawa or in Parliament one would expect the amount to be quite high in the end. But in any event, that would create an unnecessary paper burden and would also be extremely subjective.

One of the recommendations of the MacIsaac-Balcer report was to allocate a maximum of $500 for housing in Ottawa. Of course, if I only want to spend $300 on rent, I should not be encouraged to spend $500. However, if that is the maximum amount and everybody else spends up to the maximum I would say to myself, why not? I would get a nicer apartment. That is why we have an automatic expense allowance. In my opinion, it is quite a reasonable formula under the circumstances, much better than any other submitted up to now.

The MacIsaac-Balcer report indicates on page 22 of the French text and on page 21 of the English text that from 1974 to 1980 the allowances of federal Members of Parliament increased from $24,000 to $30,600 and to $32,000 with the adjustment at the beginning of the year. It is a percentage change of 27.58 per cent. In all other areas, the variation rates for the same period, except in the case of management officers, lawyers in Canadian industries where the variation rate is 48.7 per cent, are all above 50 per cent. In some areas, such as engineers working in the Canadian industry, it is 81.7 per cent. The basic rate of increase in percentage points is generally 83.6 per cent. Some catching up was necessary. The report suggested that on July 1, 1982 the salary be increased to $45,000. The government as a result of self restraint and after consultations with the parties in the House of Commons has decided to grant about two thirds. This means there is always an instinctive reluctance to solve a problem which is, of course, very personal for members of Parliament.

The MacIsaac-Balcer report made a few new recommendations such as the severance allowance to which the Leader of the Government referred. I think that there is unanimous agreement and even if a few members at the other place voted against the bill, they all indicated that they approved the severance allowance. You are aware of the really pitiful situation of a good many members who have sat in a single Parliament which can last a year or less than a year. I know that in some cases, members took years to restore their financial situation because after sitting a few short years they had to start in private business all over again or look for a job. On that point we agree.

With respect to the Senate more particularly, as I said, the practice is that those preliminary discussions take effectively the place of discussions which should normally be held in Parliament, in the House of Commons and in committee. This is what happened in this case. Even as far as the pension plan is concerned if we had been involved, we could have solved the problem for senators at the same time and in about the same way as provided here for the members of the House of Commons. In this regard, as Senator Connolly with confirm, there is the particular problem of senators with life appointments. I believe that only about 20 are left, and about half have given notice that they will retire at 75. These senators have all contributed for 15 or 16 years to the pension plan. However, this plan does not provide a pension on early retirement. Moreover, it provides only two-ninths of the pension for the widow or, if you prefer, for the surviving spouse of a senator. I recall that when this legislation was introduced here quite some time ago, we had figured out that in the case of the widow of senator Jean-François Pouliot, who had spent about 35 years in Parliament, she would receive, as she did for many years, a yearly pension of $2,333.33. At the present time, with reference to the allowance of $40,200, senators with life appointments who have given notice of their intention to retire at 75 can see that if they die before reaching the age of retirement, their widow will receive $8,500. This is only half the amount provided under the plan which applies to senators appointed since 1965. As noted by the Leader of the Government, the new plan applies only to members of the House of Commons. Of course, I point out that the Leader of the Government has assured us that this issue will be settled in the near future as it is important for the senators. We must not forget that the age of retirement here is not the same as in the House of Commons. A member of the House of Commons can sometimes retire after 15 years, even though he can be only 40, 45 or 50. Here, however, as a general rule, we retire at 75. Of course, senators appointed since 1965 can retire earlier, depending on their length of service and whether they are satisfied with the pension to which they are entitled. However, once again, these are provisions which should clearly be imposed or amended.

● (1040)

[English]

Hon. John J. Connolly: Will the honourable senator allow me to make a very short intervention? I believe he said a few moments ago that at the present time the pension of a widow of a retired senator is about $8,500.

Senator Flynn: I said that it will be.

Senator Connolly: Yes, that amount is a result of the automatic escalation brought about by the increase in indemnity. But heretofore, the amount was less than $7,500, and for some time it was about $6,600, which is much lower than is provided, as I understand it, in the scheme relative to members of the other place.

Senator Flynn: I believe the pension to the widow was two-ninths of the senator's pension, and that under the existing provisions the pension is three-fifths of the senator's pension. It is my understanding that under the new provisions for members of the House of Commons it can be arranged that the widow of a member receive exactly the pension the member is entitled to receive.

[Translation]

In any event, as I said, I take note of the government leader's assurance that the government will soon introduce amendments. At that time, hopefully, we will not be faced with unreasonable opposition from the other place.

On the provisions concerning the Senate itself, I would also indicate as did the government leader, that I welcome the provision under which the government whip and the official opposition whip will receive an allowance that is fully deserved.

This had been an oversight the previous time, as we pointed out. That oversight has now been corrected. It is my feeling that, aside from the opposition from the new group led either by Senator Deschatelets or Senator Molson, there is no objection to the whips, in the course of their normal activities, receiving an additional salary.

I regret however that an anomaly created in 1975 under the previous bill on the matter, concerning the salary of the Speaker of the Senate, has not yet been corrected. At that time, Senator Lapointe was Speaker and, as I indicated, I did not agree that our Speaker should receive less than the Speaker of the House of Commons, especially in view of the fact that for a number of years—and I would say this started with Senator Lapointe—the Speaker of the Senate has been assuming a diplomatic role on behalf of the government. The Speaker performs a number of functions and has indeed a full-time occupation. After all, as far as protocol is concerned, from the standpoint of foreign representations, the rank of Speaker of the Senate is very high. I think it comes next to the Prime Minister's—

● (1050)

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: Therefore, I regret that this discrepancy remains. Indeed, it seems worse still under the new bill, since the Speaker of the Senate will get $19,600 while the House of Commons Speaker will be paid $30,800.

This means there is more than a 33 per cent discrimination against the Speaker of the Senate. Of course I do not underestimate the difficulties in chairing the House of Commons. But I would stress that the Speaker of the Senate has been undertaking responsibilities over these last few years. We have seen quite recently that our Speaker had to make an extenuating trip to the Philippines, where he represented Canada when the President was inaugurated, with the result that our Speaker is now in hospital.

His is no easy task. And that should be recognized. In any event, since I doubt that we can get a separate amendment, I urge the Leader of the Government to take the matter into consideration when the bill is studied again to adjust the senators' pension plan. I invite the Leader of the Government to try and get that changed. But I feel that next time this should be taken into account and parity should be restored to the salary paid the Speaker of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Commons.

As for the rest, I see no problems. I feel the government has assumed its responsibilities. I believe the parties of the opposition asked their members to avoid partisan debate on the matter. All went well. Still, I feel that perhaps, with regard to the procedure followed, preliminary negotiations could take another form, and perhaps be more open, less secretive and involve the members of the Senate at every level and in every regard—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn:—so that we can avoid the situation in which we find ourselves today where we have to await the good will of the House of Commons to settle a problem that concerns us alone. That being said, I thank the Leader of the Government for the details he gave us. Once again, I feel the government should be congratulated on its courage, and the parties of the opposition on their honesty in dealing with and solving this problem.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

THIRD READING

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), moved that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 1.30 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

PENSION ACT COMPENSATION FOR FORMER PRISONERS OF WAR ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-82, to amend the Pension Act and the Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), that this bill be read the second time now.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Translation]

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the bill before us now has to do with pensions. The bill itself is not unduly complicated in the sense that it is not very long. It is fairly simple, but the legal jargon and the legal occultism hide certain very significant aspects and principles. Thousands of widows and dependents of handicapped pensioners stand to benefit immediately from this legislation; in other words, certain widows who would otherwise have to wait up to five years before drawing a pension will be entitled to monthly cheques as of July 1, 1981.

Honourable senators, this new legislation follows up on Bill C-40. Bill C-40 itself established a precedent with respect to the way the survivors of handicapped pensioners are treated. Honourable senators will recall that Parliament adopted Bill C-40 in July last year. Before the adoption of that bill—and when I say before I mean during a period of about 50 years—the widows' pensions were payable to the surviving spouses of veterans whose death was due to military service, I repeat, whose death was due to military service.

In addition, the benefits were paid to the widows of pensioners whose disability had been estimated at 48 per cent or more at the time of death; to put it another way, there was no eligibility for benefits if the disability percentage was below 48 per cent.

Bill C-40 changed all that. Honourable senators will recall as well that Bill C-40 was unfortunately the last veterans legislation introduced by the former minister, Dan MacDonald. It was Dan MacDonald's last gesture and the end of the long list of benefits he had granted in that field.

As I said, the basic eligibility requirements for pensions are still the same. But the act also provides for the payment of proportional pensions even if the pensioner's disability had been estimated to be less than 48 per cent.

Bill C-40 was heartily welcomed, even outside the country, because Canada is considered as having one of the world's most complete and most generous programs for veterans. In that sense, our program stands as a model. The government showed, with Bill C-40, its desire to improve the existing program. Honourable senators should be aware that other countries are not as advanced as Canada with regard to widows' pensions, as most of them only give a pension to widows when the pensioner died because of injuries sustained during military service.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

As I said, honourable senators, Bill C-40 was very much appreciated by veterans organizations. There remained, however, one not totally unjustified criticism. There was concern, as Senator Marshall indicated several times, over the waiting period before widows could be eligible for these new benefits. Because of a lack of funds, the government tried to introduce a phasing-in period. The implementation schedule covered six and a half years. The limit of eligibility would decrease each year so that by 1986 all survivors of pensioners whose disability was considered 5 per cent or more would receive proportionate pensions.

Members of our Committee on Health, Welfare and Science joined with others in expressing their concern over this length of time. Several proposals were made, for instance that widows of World War I veterans immediately receive benefits and that all widows be eligible as soon as they reach age 65. We were grateful for these suggestions, but finally the government decided not to change its schedule but rather to do away with it completely, so that by this bill all widows and survivors will become eligible as of July 1 of this year. Widows of pensioners whose disability was estimated at 33 per cent or more at the time of death now receive the benefits provided by Bill C-40. This amendment will result in 23,500 more eligible recipients. Honourable senators will recall that Bill C-40 did not quite meet the needs of widows. With an additional $184 million, 50,000 veterans allowance recipients were able to receive increased monthly benefits. The total cost of benefits made possible through Bill C-40 was $184 million.

● (1340)

[English]

Honourable senators, I know that the late Minister of Veterans Affairs, the Honourable Dan MacDonald, and the present acting minister, the Honourable Gilles Lamontagne, the sponsor of Bill C-40 in the House of Commons, had some misgivings over the waiting period, but were hopeful that once the principle of proportionate pensions was established further improvements could be obtained in the future. By this bill those hopes are realized.

The total cost of this change will be $41 million. The government is committing $16,800,000 in new money, and the additional funds required will be met out of savings on smaller than anticipated expenditures in other areas. Also, the Canadian Pension Commission is handling applications for widows' pensions with a minimum of delay. Unlike pension applications themselves, which, of course, require exhaustive medical and service investigation in some cases, the procedure here is quite straightforward, and the commission is ready to handle the surge in applications that is bound to result from this legislation.

There is, honourable senators, a way in which we can serve the persons who are intended to benefit under this bill. We should remember that before Bill C-40 no record was kept of the survivors of disability pensioners with an assessment of less than 48 per cent, because they did not qualify from the point of view of providing benefits to their widows. Since last July, by the efforts that have been made, it is hoped that all survivors of pensioners who died have been informed of the existence of proportionate pensions. But the information program is important. There has been, and will continue to be, a media campaign informing deceased pensioners' widows of these benefits, and I urge honourable senators, who have always been deeply interested in veterans' causes to assist in spreading the word.

The members of the House of Commons were urged to include the fact of the passage of this bill, and the resulting benefits, in their information to constituents. Mr. Stanley Knowles, speaking just a few moments ago in the other place, took advantage of the existence of the television service there to repeat the information, in the hope that anyone then watching, or anyone seeing clips or re-runs from it at a later time, perhaps on the news, would make known the fact that a number of widows who up to now have not been entitled to these benefits, will know that they now are or will be so entitled. Therefore, I ask honourable senators to do everything they can in their own regions to help with the spreading of this good word.

Honourable senators, much has been accomplished on behalf of veterans and their survivors in the past 12 months. Bill C-40, as I have mentioned, has been recognized as one of the most positive pieces of veterans' legislation enacted anywhere in recent years. The aging veterans' program which went into operation in April, is a pioneering program also of great potential. Its aim is to assist the most needy of our disability pensioners to live with convenience and comfort in their own familiar surroundings. The bill before us is further evidence of continuing concern for the well-being of those who served our country in war and the welfare of their families.

For these reasons, honourable senators, I heartily recommend second reading and ask for your positive response.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I simply want to say that I am in complete agreement with everything that has been said by the sponsor of the bill. I am sure it is gratifying to know that this is actually a follow-up to Bill C-40, which was the breakthrough at that time. I would also say that I wholly agree with him in the tribute that he paid to the late Daniel MacDonald, who was then Minister of Veterans Affairs. He was indeed a tremendous person and, I believe, perhaps one of our best Ministers of Veterans Affairs.

As was mentioned, there are perhaps an additional 23,500 widows and dependents who will become eligible for these benefits as of July 1 this year. The minister, in a news release, said that if Parliament approves the bill, these widows will have qualified for pensions on July 1 instead of having to wait for up to five-and-a-half years. That is quite correct, but I wish to emphasize this, that the minister said that they would qualify for it; not that they would get it in a month or two, or anything like that.

I think the weakness is not in this bill but in the Canadian Pension Commission, which is composed of seven members, if my memory serves me correctly. I remember, when Bill C-40 was passed, that I asked the sponsor at that time whether this Pension Commission was also going to handle these applications. The answer was yes. I asked as to the backlog of cases the Pension Commission had at that time, and was told it was something over 4,000 cases. The sponsor today mentioned that the Pension Commission was ready to take care of what might be a surge of applications coming on. I would like to know how they are going to do it. Already, with the same number of people on the commission it takes quite a long time to handle these cases. If they are going to handle additional cases, are they going to have to neglect the others?

I should like to mention an article which appeared in the Citizen of June 25, 1981, which dealt with evidence given before the Pension Commission by its chairman, A. O. Solomon. He mentioned the fact that the commission is getting a lot of applications now. He said that the veterans are "dredging the bottom of the barrel." He is saying, in other words, that a veteran of advanced age who has some disability may be trying to say that his disability is due to war service. The commission is spending a lot of time investigating this. The article reads, in part:

The chairman said . . . "We have to try, in effect, to play medical detective."

The detective work results in rejection of about two-thirds of the 6,000 applications each year on ground that old age, not military service, has caused the medical problems.

He added that this type of investigation is time-consuming. Most veterans currently must wait one to four years, depending on the number of appeals launched and the difficulty in obtaining medical records, from the time they apply for a disability pension until the first cheque arrives in the mail. It was pointed out by someone at the time that in the United States the veterans' affairs department takes 60 to 90 days to process an application.

● (1350)

The chairman is right, of course. The difficulties were compounded by the move of the department to Charlottetown. Some of the experienced staff did not want to move, and so on and so forth. But listen to what the article goes on to say:

As of March 31, there were 4,956 applications for pensions awaiting hearings by the commission, 1,929 appeals from commission decisions waiting to be heard by entitlement boards and 1,960 appeals from assessment and entitlement board decisions waiting to be heard by the pension review board.

The auditor-general reported last year that the average time for the commission to rule on an initial application takes 11 months. Two to three years ago, this process took about five months, Solomon said.

In other words, honourable senators, adding all those together, there are 8,845 applications of one kind or another waiting to be heard. Now I am concerned about what will happen to those old applications if there is a flood of new applications under the new legislation.

I am wholly in agreement that we should get these things done as soon as possible, but at the same time I say that we can't put aside these 8,845 applications just to take care of the new ones.

We all know it is a difficult problem. Certainly, the government is doing everything it can. It is changing the act; it is providing the money; all it has to do is get that money to the people who are qualified to receive it. But I do not think the government can achieve that in a reasonable time under the present setup. The Pension Commission should be enlarged, at least temporarily, in order to take care of all these applications.

Honourable senators, I am pleased to commend the government for introducing this bill. After the splendid exposition of the bill given by the sponsor, I do not see why we cannot give it third reading immediately.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Florence B. Bird: Honourable senators, following your instructions, the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science has been studying the Statute Law (Military and Civilian War Pensions Compensation and Allowances) Amendment Act, 1980. We expect that our report will be tabled when we return in the autumn. It is a good report and certainly deserves to be debated.

The amendment proposed in Bill C-82 is right in line with our thinking and our recommendation, although we have gone somewhat further than the bill goes.

When the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs appeared before us, not only did we ask him questions, but we made it quite clear that we think that the spouses should be paid immediately. We think that, because most of the surviving spouses are widows who are in their seventies and eighties, and so many of them will not be able to enjoy the benefits by 1986. Many of them are undoubtedly in need of the money now.

Your committee can claim some credit for this amendment, because we were very outspoken with the minister, and he certainly listened to us with sympathy. The Honourable Gilles Lamontagne did more than listen. He acted.

I am awfully sorry that Senator Marshall is not here today, because he made a great contribution to the committee's work. He is, as you know, very knowledgeable and insistent in this matter, and our report has certainly benefited by the information he gave us and by the quality of his questioning.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Bird: As Senator Frith has mentioned, there is something more that everyone in this chamber can do besides passing the amendment. The committee was told that half as many eligible widows as estimated by the department have applied for proportionate pensions. There seemed to be two reasons for that. First, many of these old women feel that they would be asking for charity, for welfare. Of course, this is not a matter of charity. These women have earned the proportionate pension because they have looked after disabled men for a great many years. It is theirs by right and that should be explained to them.

[Senator Macdonald.]

The second reason, we are told, is that, in spite of the efforts of the Department of Veterans Affairs and the veterans' associations, many eligible widows are being missed because they have moved elsewhere or have been lost track of, or they are just not aware of their rights. So, I think, as Senator Frith has suggested, that everyone in this house should spread the word.

If Bill C-82 had come to us earlier and if there had been more time, we might have made further amendments as recommended by the committee. For years, honourable senators, I have inveighed against receiving important legislation during the dying hours and minutes of a session. We are now right back to where we were last year when we received Bill C-40—Plus ça change, plus c'est la même chose.

I am not happy about this. It is not the best way to legislate. But, under the circumstances, I agree that it would be less than generous, and we would be lacking in compassion, if we failed to pass this bill at once.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, if Senator Frith speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Macdonald and Senator Bird for their comments. If I may, I will make one further observation. I agree with Senator Macdonald that the backlog of pension applications is a serious problem. As the honourable senator pointed out, the new surge in applications will only aggravate the problem. However, I do wish to emphasize that plans are being devised to deal with these particular pension applications by widows.

Of course, the detective work involved in the widow pension applications will be simpler than the detective work involved in the other applications to which Senator Macdonald referred, and, therefore, they should be handled more expeditiously. Of course, as Senator Macdonald also pointed out, the danger is that there may be some delay in dealing with other applications caused by widow pension applications. I hope that this will not happen. Certainly, I intend to make the department aware of Senator Macdonald's observations here today, because he, like Senator Marshall, is very experienced and knowledgeable in the field, and has been a champion of the rights of veterans and their families for many years. Those are my remarks and, again, I support the motion for the second reading of this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): With leave, now honourable senators.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

RIDEAU HALL
OTTAWA
GOVERNMENT HOUSE

July 10, 1981

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Brian Dickson, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 10th day of July, at 2.15 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Edmond Joly de Lotbinière,
Administrative Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT MOTION

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Wednesday, October 14, 1981, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon. Honourable senators, Monday that week is Thanksgiving; Tuesday will be a day for travel; so resuming on the Wednesday, I think we should sit at 2 o'clock in the afternoon rather than at 8 o'clock in the evening.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Perreault, P.C., that when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Wednesday, October 14, 1981, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Honourable senators, since we are right on schedule, I would ask that, rather than adjourn to the call of the bell, we just adjourn to await the arrival of the Deputy Governor General.

Before I so move, the leader informs me that he has just received some information he promised to furnish with regard to the postal strike, so, with leave, he could furnish that material and then we could adjourn to await the arrival of the Deputy Governor General.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): It is my understanding that Her Honour has put the motion for adjournment, but that it has not yet been adopted.

Senator Frith: I thought Her honour had.

Senator Flynn: In any event, I would ask leave to put a question or two to the deputy leader on the motion which may have been adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Flynn: My first question is: Why are we coming back on the same day as the House of Commons or the day after? Will there be any business coming to us from the other place?

My second question is: Are we coming back to continue the session or for the opening of a new session?

Does the deputy leader have some information with regard to these matters?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, on the first point, there are a couple of items on our order paper that will give us work to do that week, even if we do not receive legislation from the other place. I am thinking of the report of the Special Joint Committee on Official Languages and the order respecting offshore resources. Therefore, I think we will have good reason to be here. However, I am glad my honourable friend asked the question.

On the second point, my information is that we are not proroguing; we are simply adjourning until that date.

Senator Flynn: The question is whether we are adjourning, to prorogue immediately upon returning. As I understand it, the answer is no, that the session will continue for a while.

Senator Frith: As far as I know, we will not adjourn to prorogue immediately upon our return, but we will adjourn and find out about prorogation then.

Hon. Jack Austin: Does the deputy leader have any information with respect to whether the other place will continue to sit while we are adjourned?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the information I have is that they still intend to continue to talk in order to ask that the postal strike be dealt with. I understand that the government is taking the position that if they come back next week they will go into the report stage of Bill C-48. They may or may not continue. They may get something settled this afternoon.

Senator Flynn: In any event, whatever they do in the other place, unless they pass legislation, we need not be here, so I do not think it affects us.

Now, since we will shortly adjourn until October 14, I think it propitious to say that this session has gone on so long—it started at the beginning of April last year—that it is a well-needed rest we plan to take. It is not so much that we want to have nothing to do, but we want and need a change of perspective for a few months. I think we will enjoy each other's company better when we return.

I think this is the right occasion to thank the clerks at the table, the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod and the pages for their help, and to wish them and all honourable senators an enjoyable summer.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, all of us join in the sentiments expressed so well by the Leader of the Opposition.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

POST OFFICE

DISRUPTION OF SERVICE

Leave having been given to revert to Question Period:

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do feel an obligation to relate the last report available on the subject of the Post Office dispute.

The Honourable Donald Johnston spoke with Mr. Parrot over the telephone twice yesterday, July 9. Mr. Johnston offered the services of the most senior staff of Treasury Board, Mr. George Orser, in an attempt to unblock negotiations.

Apparently, the postal workers have rejected this offer. Mr. Parrot has sent Treasury Board a letter and a press release this morning that said nothing about Mr. Orser. Instead, Mr. Parrot again insisted upon having Mr. Michael Warren. Treasury Board has not accepted this proposal for two reasons: first, they are hesitant because this is a Treasury Board matter and Treasury Board is, therefore, responsible for the conduct of negotiations; and, secondly, Mr. Parrot has not outlined the precise role that he would like Mr. Warren to play. Treasury Board wants to get back to the negotiating table. The Honourable Donald Johnston is using every effort to get the talks started in order that Canadians may enjoy postal services as soon as possible.

ENERGY

NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AND GOVERNMENT OF ALBERTA

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Roblin on July 6, 1981, concerning the terms and conditions of the loan made to Imperial Oil Ltd. for the Cold Lake project. Rather than take the time now to read it, I ask permission for that answer to be taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

The $40 million loan is the result of an agreement between Petro-Canada and Imperial Oil. Petro-Canada agreed to make available to Imperial Oil up to $40 million between January 1 and June 30, 1981. The payment was made on the direction of the Governor in Council.

If the Cold Lake project proceeds before July 1, 1982, which, of course, requires the concurrence of the project sponsors, the Alberta government and the federal government, the $40 million loan will be repaid by Imperial Oil Ltd. to the Government of Canada.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

THE BUDGET—IMPACT ON LOW INCOME FAMILIES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Balfour on November 18, 1980, concerning the details of the calculation employed to arrive at a differential of $40 billion between the cost of oil and gas to consumers under the national energy plan and the cost of oil and gas under the Conservative budget. May I have permission to have that answer also taken as read?

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Under the national energy plan report tabled in late October, estimates were made of oil and gas requirements under the national energy plan. These were valued at the wholesale prices of oil and gas from Toronto.

These were valued in terms of the NEP oil pricing proposals. Projections were made under the proposals for oil and gas to 1984.

Under the National Energy Program, the cost to consumers of oil and gas to the year 1984 would be $40 billion, less than would have been the case under the P.C. budget of December 1979. It should be noted, however, that this does not take into consideration the extra cost of importing crude oil as a result of the Alberta government's action to cut back on deliveries of crude oil to eastern Canada. When this is considered, the differential would be somewhat less. It also does not take into consideration the cost of acquiring Petrofina Oil Co. However, the difference in favour of the present energy policy still remains large.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

ATTEMPTED TAKEOVER OF CANADA PERMANENT MORTGAGE CORPORATION BY GENSTAR CORPORATION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have one final delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Haidasz on July 8, 1981, concerning the possible investigation of the attempted takeover of Canada Permanent Mortgage Corporation by Genstar Corporation.

Honourable senators, no federal government agency or ministry is presently investigating the attempted takeover. However, Consumer and Corporate Affairs is monitoring the situation.

An Act to revive Ontario News Company, Limited and to provide for its continuance under the Canada Business Corporations Act.

An Act to revive G.A. Barber & Sons Limited and to provide for its continuance under the Canada Business Corporations Act.

An Act to revive Eastern Diversified Company Ltd. and to provide for its continuance under the Canada Business Corporations Act.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Wednesday, October 14, 1981, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before moving the adjournment, I wish to associate myself with the comments of the Leader of the Opposition in thanking all of the Senate staff, particularly, on this occasion, the staff who serve us directly here in the chamber. In saying that, I do not wish to take anything away from the staff who serve us outside the chamber. They are an efficient, courteous and very effective group, and I say sincerely that it is a great pleasure to be associated with them. I should mention particularly the work of the Clerk and the Clerk Assistant, and of the pages, who certainly add a good deal to the enjoyment of our sittings.

May I say also that I believe this has been a very productive session. The greater part of my responsibilities here might be called preoccupation with routine, but, because of that, such co-operation is deeply appreciated.

Apart from gratitude for the assistance, help and advice that I have received from all honourable senators, I wish particularly to thank the Leader of the Opposition. I believe there has been an attempt to co-operate in expediting Senate business, while giving full attention to the duties we all have as members of the Senate of Canada.

Senator Olson, on behalf of the government, might wish to add to the thanks that I have expressed to honourable senators for what I consider to have been a very productive session.

● (1415)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, before the motion to adjourn is put and agreed to, I do want to express my appreciation to all of my colleagues, particularly on this side, and specially my colleagues who are members of the cabinet, who have discussed with me a number of the matters that have been introduced under the legislative program for this session.

You will recognize that this is the first session in what is normally a four-session Parliament. We have looked very

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Brian Dickson, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Deputy Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act to amend the Diplomatic and Consular Privileges and Immunities Act.

An Act to amend the Official Residences Act.

An Act to amend the Pension Act and the Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act.

An Act to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act, the Salaries Act, the Parliamentary Secretaries Act and the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act.

An Act to amend the Veterans' Land Act and to amend the Veterans Benefit Act in consequence thereof.

An Act to amend the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act.

carefully at the commitments that were made in the Speech from the Throne, and while subject to some different interpretations, it is a fact that almost every one of them has been kept by bringing in legislation that has been dealt with by both this and the other house.

I know that during the course of the relevant debates, particularly during Question Period, it is the duty of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition in this place to put probing questions to the ministers. I have been trying to cover what I suppose is a rather broad field, and I want to thank my honourable friends opposite for the nature of their questions. While I have not always been able to respond immediately, I hope that they have found my responses to be a source of useful information. I can see that they do not quite agree with that, but, seriously, honourable senators, if you look back at the record of the session—if this is, indeed, to be the last day before the summer recess—you will see that it has been highly productive in terms of correcting a number of matters that needed to be corrected in the interests of the people of Canada. I would like to express my appreciation to senators on both sides of the house, on behalf of the government, for attending to those things in the manner in which that has been done.

The Senate adjourned until Wednesday, October 14, 1981, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government):

Honourable senators, before I proceed with the tabling of documents, may I say how encouraging it is to see all honourable senators back in such apparent good health and excellent spirits. May I express the hope that, aside from attending to their public responsibilities, all honourable senators have enjoyed a summer of relaxation and contemplation. May I also express the hope that all of us are prepared to resume our work in what could be a very historic parliamentary session. I know that we can look forward to the close co-operation of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition in all our endeavours, and that they will bring their usual constructive, although, at times innovative, approach to both policy and the interpretation of the rules. We look forward to working with them.

[Translation]

I should like to extend the warmest welcome to all honourable senators upon their return from their summer holiday.

I hope they are now fully rested and ready to tackle their assignments vigorously and constructively.

[English]

Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the following documents:

Memorandum of Agreement between the Government of Canada and the Government of Alberta, dated September 1, 1981, relating to energy pricing and taxation, and the joint statement by the Prime Minister and the Premier of British Columbia, dated September 24, 1981, relating to oil and gas pricing and related fiscal matters, issued by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Reports on operations under the Regional Development Incentives Act for the months of April, May, June and July 1981, pursuant to section 16 of the said Act, Chapter R-3, R.S.C., 1970.

QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

THE MINISTRY

MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY OF HON. JACK AUSTIN, P.C. IN THE SENATE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before I put a question to the Leader of the Government, I should like to tell him that we appreciate his acknowledging that the official opposition has always been most willing to carry out the business of this house without being party to certain sinister steps taken by this government. He can expect the same behaviour from us during what will be, I hope, the latter part of this long session which began last May, more than 16 or 17 months ago. We hope that the government will soon decide to call a second session of this Parliament unless it decides for various reasons given here and there to dissolve Parliament and call a general election in order to allow the Canadian people to judge its record.

I am quite pleased, as we all are on this side of the house, to find all our colleagues in such good health, even Senator Graham who, we understand, spent some time in hospital; but he looks quite well and he has probably recovered as quickly from his illness as from the results of the election in Nova Scotia! Anyhow, he cannot be held responsible for them, it is rather Mr. MacEachen.

[Senator Perrault.]

We are also pleased to note the major cabinet shuffle with the appointment of a fourth member from the Senate. I see that Senator Austin is in the second row, since there is no room for him on the front benches at the moment. I do not know whether it means anything, but we would like the Leader of the Government to tell us precisely what are Senator Austin's responsibilities. It seems that he will look after the interests of British Columbia. I ask the Leader of the Government to what extent he will be relieved of responsibilities that will be assigned to Senator Austin? It is essential for us that his role be defined and that we know whether to put a question to Senator Perrault or to Senator Austin.

• (1410)

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, all of us have always been touched by the continuing concern for la belle province de l'Ouest, British Columbia, shown by the Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Flynn: Of course.

Senator Perrault: With respect to Senator Austin's responsibilities, I would invite the honourable senator himself to describe them for honourable senators. Suffice it to say, we are good friends and we have worked very closely together for over twenty years. His appointment is recognition of his talents and abilities and of the great importance, the emerging importance of western Canada in this nation, of which British Columbia is a growing and thriving part.

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State): Honourable senators, I want to thank the Leader of the Opposition for his question. I am as anxious to explain my role to the Senate as I am sure he is to listen to my explanation. I thank him for his good wishes also.

• (1415)

I do not have as much legislative experience as the Leader of the Opposition and many others in this chamber. However, I assure all honourable senators that I approach my new assignment and responsibilities in responding to your questions with the greatest of sensitivity and the greatest of desire to serve this chamber—as well as, of course, to serve the government of which I am now a member.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Austin: I have joined the government in the hope that the presence of a second member of cabinet from British Columbia will enhance the federal presence in British Columbia, in particular, and the west, the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, in general. I have been asked to work with Senator Perrault and other ministers to ensure that federal programs are better understood in western Canada and northern Canada and, in addition, to assist cabinet ministers who have specific portfolio responsibilities in the discharge of those responsibilities as they affect British Columbia, in particular, and western Canada and northern Canada generally.

I have been specifically asked by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and so designated by the Prime Minister, to assist with issues relating to the evolution of government in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories and also to assist in constitutional discussions as they relate to the role of the aboriginal peoples.

In summary, honourable senators, I presume that my role is not very different from that which Senator Flynn himself had when he was Minister of Justice in the Clark government. I hope that my relationship with Senator Perrault will be as close as that which existed between Senator Flynn and Senator Asselin when they were colleagues in the cabinet.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I fail to understand the comparison of Senator Austin's role with mine when I was Minister of Justice and Leader of the Government in the Senate. I had no specific responsibilities with regard to the province of Quebec, simply because two ministers in the other place were appointed to handle such responsibilities. However I remember the criticism levelled by the other side over the appointment of three members of the Senate to the Clark cabinet. Now we have four ministers in this chamber.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Oh, no, we never criticized that.

Senator Flynn: Not you?

Senator Olson: Never.

Senator Flynn: I am sure that the senator never dreamed that he himself would become a minister while a member of the Senate.

Senator Steuart: Neither did you.

Senator Flynn: No, that is right, but it did not last for long, in any event, so I did not become as boring as is the case with some others.

Senator Austin has not given a clear explanation as to what questions we should direct to him and what questions we should direct to Senator Perrault.

Hon. Jack Marshall: How about VIA Rail and double tracking?

Senator Flynn: For example, if I were to ask about problems with regard to the Port of Prince Rupert, should my question be directed to Senator Perrault or to Senator Austin? I believe this is a typical example of what I wish to have clarified.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I apologize to Senator Flynn for assuming that he had a larger responsibility in terms of the province of Quebec than he indeed had.

Senator Flynn: A larger responsibility embracing the whole of Canada.

Senator Austin: Yes, each minister has responsibilities embracing the whole of Canada, but they also have particular responsibilities, and my particular interest and responsibility lies with the matters which I have already described.

With regard to answering questions on specific issues relating to the province of British Columbia, I can only advise the Leader of the Opposition at this time that Senator Perrault and I are in the process of arranging our activities with regard to that province, and I will do my utmost to define them for him when they have been more clearly arranged.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I hope that we will receive an answer to this question sooner than we received answers to questions asked for the purpose of assessing the responsibilities of the various ministers here who were appointed when the government was formed. We have yet to receive answers to those questions.

● (1420)

Senator Olson: We never received an answer from the previous government.

Senator Flynn: You did get an answer. You entirely forget what happened at that time. You received answers from the Leader of the Government, from Senator de Cotret and from Senator Asselin concerning matters within their respective fields. At that time there was not the misunderstanding or confusion we have been witnessing since last May.

Senator Olson: But you never really knew where you stood.

Senator Flynn: In any event, we will leave that for the time being. We will have ample opportunity to come back to the matter.

Senator Perrault: I am sure.

THE CONSTITUTION

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL NEGOTIATIONS—MEETING BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND PREMIER OF BRITISH COLUMBIA

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Does the Leader of the Government have anything to report, in addition to what has been published in the press, regarding the meeting between the Prime Minister and Premier Bennett, the chairman of the dissenting premiers on the constitutional issue?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, of course, I can confirm that, in fact, last night the Premier of British Columbia and the Prime Minister had a very congenial meeting. Both parties agreed that there would be no comment on the substance of the meeting until Premier Bennett, as chairman of the premiers' committee, had been able to contact the other provincial premiers to obtain their views on the subject and to exchange views on the ideas advanced from both sides at the meeting last night. As soon as information is available, honourable senators, it will be brought to this chamber.

YUKON TERRITORY

EVOLUTION OF TERRITORIAL GOVERNMENT

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honorable senators, I have a question for Senator Austin. In asking it, I hasten to add my personal congratulations to the senator on his appointment to the cabinet.

Has the minister discussed, or does he plan to discuss, the subject of the governmental evolution of the Yukon with the leader of the Yukon government, Mr. Pearson?

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State): I thank the honourable senator for his question. I have not yet had such discussions, although Senator Lucier has been endeavouring to arrange a meeting for me with Mr. Pearson, the Government Leader in the Yukon, and I look forward to such a meeting in due course.

FEDERAL NEGOTIATIONS WITH COUNCIL OF YUKON INDIANS

Hon. R. James Balfour: Is the minister's appointment to this position in any way an indication of the federal government's view that negotiations between the Council of Yukon Indians and the federal team led by Mr. Dennis O'Connor have not been proceeding satisfactorily?

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State): Not at all.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Not directly.

Senator Austin: So far as I know, those negotiations have been proceeding quite well from the point of view of all the parties. It will not be my role to be directly involved in negotiations with respect to land claims or with respect to economic programs.

THE ECONOMY

INFLATION—INTEREST RATES

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I have a question for Senator Olson, Minister of State for Economic Development. The opposition is most anxious to know what the minister did during his holidays. We have been away since July and we have heard absolutely nothing from him since. Interest rates have escalated beyond 20 per cent. Inflation has now reached 13 per cent. Mortgage rates are prohibitive. In fact, the Canadian economy is in terrible shape; everyone agrees on that.

We, of the opposition, thought that as soon as Parliament reconvened, the minister would jump up from his seat and tell us: Now, this is what I have to suggest as a cure for all the woes of Canadians. I imagine the minister is just burning with impatience to rise and tell us: This is the policy we shall adopt with regard to interest rates, or mortgage rates, inflation and unemployment, which has increased considerably in the last month.

I should like to know what the minister did about all that during the summer break.

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I could give a long and detailed report on what I have done since the recess began in July; however, the question seems to focus more clearly on some of the economic performance indicators.

[Senator Balfour.]

● (1425)

I can tell the honourable senator, without equivocation, that there were a large number of ministers in Ottawa during the entire recess, with the exception of—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): The Prime Minister.

Senator Olson:—perhaps two or three weeks in August, which is normal because that is the way governments have tried to arrange their affairs during that period of time.

I do not believe the honourable senator would like me to take the time now to repeat all of the measures that the Minister of Finance has indicated are the options available in dealing with the matter of interest rates. The honourable senator knows that the Minister of Finance has indicated that he will be bringing down a budget before the end of this month, and that that is the proper time to deal with any new initiatives or changes to the existing programs.

Because he also has been in cabinet, he knows that it is highly improper for other ministers to speculate on the contents of the budget just a few days before it is brought down.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I have a supplementary question. As Minister of State for Economic Development, can he tell us whether he will bring some relief in the interest rates so that people can at least hope to keep their home or their business? Can the minister tell us whether he has found solutions? This is not a matter of saying what another minister thinks. I am asking him to say what he himself thinks of those important questions and whether he has found remedies for them during the holidays.

[English]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that is exactly what I was getting at a minute ago. If you want to have a long discourse on that before the budget debate begins, then, of course, what responsible, intelligent people do is examine the alternatives and options available, and also describe in some detail the positive and negative factors associated with those options. That we will no doubt get into before very long. I do not believe that there is sufficient time now to reply to a question dealing with those options because they are rather complex. One cannot give the extreme, simplistic answers that my honourable friend is asking for, but I certainly will be participating in that kind of discussion.

The other question the honourable senator asked had to do with the prospects for the Canadian economy, and I would be happy to make a long, medium or short speech on that, because they are all very good speeches. I think it is about time we started being positive about the prospects—

Senator Flynn: Long, medium or short, it would be the same.

Senator Olson: We are a richly endowed country, both in natural and human resources, but we do live in an international financial community, and my honourable friend knows as well as I do what the consequences are of trying to withdraw from the freedom of movement of capital and trade in that international situation. If he wants an answer in great detail, he can have it whenever time is available.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: The minister has a clear conscience. He is trying to hide the problems which Canadians are facing. I would point out to you that that is not what the electors in Spadina and Joliette were thinking when they voted in August. They voted against a government which has done nothing to solve the economic problems. The minister should remember that. I hope that the government will take concrete steps and come up with solutions and say to Canadians: Here is what we have found to try to bring you some relief and lessen your difficulties. I hope the minister has learned the lesson. But since the minister is saying that he has no answer I can only sit down and say that I did not get an answer.

[English]

Senator Olson: If the honourable senator wants to try to bring in an isolated reason, or a general and not specific reason for the results of a by-election in Joliette, Spadina or any other place, he knows that he will get into a rather lengthy discussion with me, because we have seen the consequences of by-elections before, when one party or another was in office, provincially or federally. They never get reduced to the simplicity that he is trying to explain.

● (1430)

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary to Senator Asselin's question. In light of this glowing report, could the minister explain how Canada has gone from second place—in 1969 or, roughly, when the Trudeau government first took power—to twelfth or thirteenth place in per capita income?

Senator Olson: Yes, that is explainable—and in terms that even my honourable friend will understand clearly. First of all, we would like to see those figures and the assumptions that go into the calculation of those figures. If he is talking about the standard of living, we are not in twelfth position or anywhere near it.

Senator Charbonneau: I believe those figures come from the OECD.

Senator Olson: That is right, and they are relative to a lot of other assumptions that are contained in the calculation of those figures.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary. The minister mentioned previously in one of his answers that we are rich in human resources. During the recess, did he or any of his colleagues come up with any cure for the disillusionment and the deterioration of morale of our young people who are threatened with losing their homes because of high interest rates and because of the usury and gouging of the banks, and did they come up with an answer that will prevent the destruction of these Canadian human resources?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the Minister of Finance has already indicated that he is prepared to give serious consideration to the inclusion of an announcement at the time of the budget of some relief for some of the more difficult situations. The Minister of Finance has not waited until budget day; he already has had some discussions with the banks and others who hold those mortgages, and has asked them to take into account these kinds of situations. Although I do not know the detail of what the banks' response was, my understanding is that it was rather positive.

UNEMPLOYMENT RATE

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, bearing in mind the various economic problems that have been outlined, could the Minister of State for Economic Development tell us what steps the government intends taking to alleviate the problem of the 101,000 Canadians who were added to the unemployment rolls in the last report? I notice that the unemployment rate in Newfoundland has now jumped to nearly 18 per cent.

Senator Asselin: Shame.

Senator Doody: It is up in every province in Canada. Could the minister tell us what priority the government intends to give this matter?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, the matter of unemployment rates having changed rather dramatically in the last month, of course, relates to a number of things. For example, there were 126,000 new jobs created in the year ending in September, and that is over the 1980 levels for adults and especially for young people. But there is another problem, and that is that the participation rate has gone up rather dramatically for two reasons. The first is that there are about 20,000 young people who, by previous experience, would have come off the unemployment rolls because they would have gone back to university in September. However, that figure was down by that amount. The other reason is, as has been the case for some time, a higher and higher participation rate by women in the work force.

Senator Doody: Is the minister telling us that the government's answer to the 891,000 Canadians looking for work is an explanation of the participation rate term? That is scant consolation to those people in the marketplace who are desperately trying to find a way to make a living. Surely there has to be a better answer than that.

● (1435)

Senator Olson: The senator can change his question, if he wishes. He asked, firstly, for an explanation of recent figures, and I gave him that. If he requires further explanation, or wishes to change his question, that is fine, but I would advise him that a number of studies have been undertaken and we have good reason to expect that from 550,000 to 700,000 jobs will be created in western Canada alone in the next few years and there will have to be an acceleration of some types of technical training to meet the shortage of manpower to fill those jobs.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration is now actively involved in trying to make better use—

An Hon. Senator: How?

Senator Olson:—of the funds that are used for the purpose of training and retraining people to fill those jobs. There have been discussions with the provinces, and with industry and labour all across the country, seeking co-operation in bringing the right skills to the right places at the right time.

I can say with some optimism that the problem is recognized by both business and the labour unions, and we must find a way of increasing the proficiency level of technical skills in the work place to a greater extent than has been done in the past. In other words, it is no longer sufficient to believe that jobs will be filled from the various institutions at the same level of proficiency that was required in the past, nor will they be filled by way of immigration to the extent that was done in the past. There is a great need for trained people with the right kind of skills, and the government accepts the responsibility of trying to rearrange the programs, the structure and the funding necessary to meet the job requirements of the present decade.

Hon. G. I. Smith: That is a big “if”.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary. Could the minister tell us what the magic number of unemployed is that brings the government to a realization of its responsibilities in terms of retraining and placement?

Senator Olson: Whatever that number may be, it is behind us, because we recognized that responsibility long ago.

FISHERIES

CLOSURE OF FISH PROCESSING PLANTS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development concerning fisheries. In view of the fact that in recent months approximately 4,000 fishermen, and those working in fish processing plants, have been laid off following the closure of 18 fish plants, and in view of the fact that plant authorities claim the closures and layoffs were the result of the federal government's policy on quotas and interest rates, can the minister advise what action the Minister of Fisheries is taking to relieve the problem and to get those people back to work?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): The honourable senator, who represents Newfoundland, will know better than I that there is some ongoing disagreement on quotas that should be set for offshore and inshore fisheries. According to the processing companies, the problem has some relationship to the tonnages needed during the season, and related matters. It is not a problem that will be solved by unanimous agreement, even though the government has tried to provide some leadership through the Minister of Fisheries to find a satisfactory balance between the interests of all parties concerned. However, I will refer the question to the Minister of Fisheries and will endeavour to obtain an update on the situation. The difficulty involves interests that are not exactly the same, and a compromise has to be found to relieve the situation.

POLLUTION OF FISH SPAWNING GROUNDS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Could the minister, when speaking to the Minister of Fisheries, ask for his opinion on the alarming news received today that pollution has become so widespread that it has reached the continental shelf and the spawning grounds where most of the fish are located? That is most alarming when the future is considered. Could the minister advise the Senate if the Minister of Fisheries is aware, as I am sure he is, that although the authorities do not wish to spread undue alarm, a warning has been sounded for the future, and that therefore an investigation should be held immediately? I should like to know what is being done within the Department of Fisheries.

● (1440)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I will refer that question, and seek a reply for tomorrow, or as soon as possible.

THE ECONOMY

INCREASE IN BUSINESS BANKRUPTCIES

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, my question is addressed to the Minister of State for Economic Development.

Before I begin, I would just like to tell the minister that I am enjoying tremendously the gallant way in which he is endeavouring to keep up the pretence that all is well with the Canadian economy. All the indications I see are that Canadians have lost confidence in the competence of the Liberal Party to deal with our economic problems—

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): That is an old Clark speech you are reading from.

Senator Donahoe: If it is an old Clark speech it is right on the point now, whatever it was when Mr. Clark delivered it. However, as a matter of fact, it did not come from Mr. Clark. I dreamed it up all by myself, and I did so by seeing what is going on in the country today.

My question, however, is a simple, straightforward one, and I do not want to hear it answered as the minister answered Senator Doody's question. What is the government going to do about business bankruptcies in this country, the value of which, according to the most recent statistics, is 33 per cent more than that for the corresponding period last year?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, there are a number of proposals before Parliament. One deals with small business development bonds, with the object of expanding that service.

It is the same old story. It is not up to the government as to when legislation gets passed. The government proposes but the opposition disposes, and if they would get down to those things and pass them, along with several other bills, it would help.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): It all depends on the disposition of the government.

Senator Olson: It depends on the disposition of the opposition, as to whether they want to put up stumbling blocks or road blocks. Never mind that, however. Senator Flynn and I discuss that once in a while.

The other point that needs to be made in this regard is this. I hope the statistics that Senator Donahoe has just given me—and I do not have them in front of me—are more reliable than the accusations made by members of the opposition during the recess to the effect that there has been a very large increase in foreclosures on house mortgages. The fact of the matter is that the number of foreclosures is down compared to last year. That, of course, needs to be qualified to the extent that it takes about three months to effect a foreclosure, and I cannot say that the figure is going to be down for a long time. I would, however, like to check those figures out. I think the honourable senator said there was an increase of something like 33½ per cent. I would like to have hard numbers, and not the speculation of some reporter.

Senator Donahoe: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question I want to ask.

Is the minister prepared to agree with the Economic Council of Canada's report, released only today, suggesting that the government's high interest rate policy is in itself a major contributor to inflation?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am sure that Senator Donahoe has again exercised one of his great talents. He has attributed something to the Economic Council of Canada which they did not say—

Senator Flynn: What about what Senator Lamontagne said?

Senator Olson:—and that is that it is government policy to have high interest rates. The honourable Minister of Finance has said over and over again, in Parliament and out of it, in this country and out of it, that he does not believe that the exigencies of the existing economic situation require interest rates to be as high as they are. He has said that to the International Monetary Fund, for example, and in many other places.

I come back to the honourable senator's point that high interest rates are government policy. It is government policy to have freedom of trade and freedom of movement of capital in the international market. As long as we have that, we have to remember to live with that kind of situation.

If the honourable senators opposite are suggesting by the groans they are making that they are ready to put on international exchange controls and all the consequences that go with them, why do they not say it straight out?

Hon. G. I. Smith: Because that is not what they are saying.

INFLATION—INTEREST RATES—UNEMPLOYMENT—BANKRUPTCIES

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I am always happy to yield to Senator Donahoe. If we could only transplant some of his talents to the honourable gentleman who has just taken his seat, it would be wonderful.

Honourable senators, my questions are related to those posed by Senator Doody and Senator Asselin.

The honourable minister gets up and says, "We have created 126,000 jobs."

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I never did that.

Senator Muir: Oh, you are not taking credit for that? That is fine. I am glad you are so modest. Anyhow, that is the figure you give with regard to new jobs. Then you say that there are 891,000 unemployed. Well, the honourable the minister has spent long enough in the House of Commons and around the Hill generally to know that if the statistics say there are 891,000 unemployed in this country, that means that there are over a million in fact, because men and women get fed up, utterly disgusted, and sick and tired of going to Manpower offices without results. I do not blame the men and women who work behind the counters of those offices, for they have nothing to provide, but people get fed up with going there, and after a certain period of time their card is drawn and they are no longer classified as unemployed.

Let us now get down to basic bread-and-butter issues. First, jobs. We hear a lot of high-falutin' stuff about the trouble being due to international forces, and this and that, but you cannot blame Idi Amin this time, because he is not around, and you cannot blame certain other countries. May I therefore ask the honourable the minister what the government has done, apart from what may be in the budget, and what he has done, along with his colleagues, since the house adjourned for the summer, for those Canadians who are losing their homes and for those Canadians who cannot find employment?

Such a wonderfully rosy picture is constantly painted by this minister. It is hard to believe that he is in a dream world to the extent that he thinks things are as wonderful as he suggests. I can take him to places where people are being kicked out of their homes because they cannot pay their mortgages, and, as has been mentioned by Senator Asselin and Senator Doody, some people are starving.

Is the minister proud of that, in the first place? And, in the second place, what has he done, apart from saying that it is due to international forces that we can do nothing about because we have no control over them, and that the answers are all going to be in the budget? People cannot wait month after month, you know.

Senator Olson: It should hardly be necessary for me to repeat to the honourable senator what I said a few minutes ago.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You have done it before.

Senator Olson: However, there were a few things I said that I did not elaborate on.

The economy in Canada, for example, has grown, over the last nine months, at an annual rate of 6 per cent, which is a very strong growth rate indeed, compared to almost any other country. In the United States, for example, it was about 3.2 per cent over that same period. Furthermore, we continued to enjoy strong growth in exports, in investments and in inventories in the second quarter.

I should point out that there are many positive factors in this situation. The honourable senator wants to pretend, I guess, that 1981 was the only year in which there were any foreclosures because people had either not paid their loans or their mortgages, and that sort of thing. That is just not the case, however; the real world is a little different from that. Such things happen even in prosperous times to some people.

This government has expressed, and taken action to extend, more sympathy to people in those difficult circumstances than any other government, over time. My honourable friend should advise his colleagues that that is the reason why we have been in office more than they have.

Hon. G. I. Smith: I would not brag too much about that.

Senator Muir: May I suggest to the honourable the minister, with regard to his reference to 6 per cent growth and all those other things, that if everything has been so wonderful, why do we have 1 million unemployed, people losing their homes, and all the people who cannot afford to heat their homes? Why do we have all these problems? Is the honourable gentleman suggesting to me that the number of bankruptcies has not increased in the last couple of years?

● (1450)

Senator Olson: The total number of bankruptcies is down.

Senator Muir: I still have the floor, and I think the honourable the minister knows the rules of this house, just as he knows those of the other place. I am asking him to wait until I have finished asking my question.

Now, wee Davie; you cool it, wee Davie.

It seems to me that the honourable the minister is simply not living in the real world; he is not coming down to earth. Surely we are going to have to call upon the new minister to assist this minister to realize that there are some problems, some serious problems, in this country. However, it is damned cold comfort to the millions of unemployed in this country to listen to him get up and say, "This is wonderful; that is wonderful; we are living in the greatest country in the world." Yes, we are living in the greatest country in the world, but it is in spite of his actions, his faux pas and the problems his government has created.

[Senator Muir.]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have listened to that good though inaccurate comment, but I fail to find a question.

Senator Muir: My question to you, sir, is: Can you stand up in this chamber, in all decency and honour, and say—

I wish Senator Steuart would get up and make a speech. They threw him out of Saskatchewan, and they will have to throw him out of here some day. He chirps and chirps from what brains he has down in that part of his anatomy. I just wish he would relax, contain himself and not get too excited. Perhaps I could see one of the doctors in the chamber and get some Valium for him.

Returning to my question: Is this minister, in all sincerity, saying that everything in this country is wonderful, when we have over a million unemployed and all of these other problems? That is the question. Are you proud of that? What is going to be done about it?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I do not want to add anything to what I have already said, except to say that these problems are of concern to the government. This government has, over the years, demonstrated greater concern for the problems of the people than any other government that has been in office, and we intend to continue to do so.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Playing politics again, are you?

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: You are—

Senator Muir: Senator Hicks, if I wish to speak in this chamber, I shall do so without your heckling.

Senator Hicks: You are supposed to be asking a question.

Senator Muir: I may not be an academic but I shall speak in this chamber whether I have long hair, short hair, no hair at all, or whether I have degrees or no degrees. Now, contain yourself.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: What is your question?

Senator Muir: I have almost forgotten it now. I am asking the honourable gentleman if he intends to continue to throw figures around that have no effect on the basic problems that are affecting this country and the people of this country. Does he intend to do that, or will he get some assistance from Senator Austin? Not only the people in British Columbia, but people all across this country are looking for great things from Senator Austin in trying to assist Senator Olson.

Senator Olson: I join with those who are looking for great things from Senator Austin in his new responsibilities, because I believe that he will deliver.

Senator Flynn: At long last there will be one.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I do not want to add to the other comments made by my honourable friend. When he and I sat in opposition in the other place, we both practised putting that type of question together, but we knew very well what the result would be.

Senator Muir: Honourable senators, I protest that statement. I have framed questions for many years, no matter what government was in place, whether it was that of Diefenbaker, Pearson or whoever, and I did not care whether it bothered the government of the day. The minister knows that; he can check the record. I am still doing the same thing today on behalf of the people in whom I am interested, and I am glad to see him indicating he agrees with me.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, I am reluctant to trouble the troubled Minister of State for Economic Development, but it may be that he would like to continue his performance of diminishing merit, so I will give him the opportunity to do so.

We have already discussed, to some extent, high interest rates and mortgages, which do not seem to me to be as easy upon people as it seems to him. It certainly did not seem so easy to the angry people in Ottawa who faced the Minister of Housing on the matter some time ago. I understand that, despite the reference to the banks—which seemed just as much an effort to blame them as it is an effort to get any help from them—there is a proposal being made by a portion of the financial community which I hope the government is considering seriously. That is the suggestion that Registered Retirement Saving Plans might be used by financial institutions who are concerned with particular mortgages to relieve, somewhat, the high burden of interest to the owners of those RRSPs. This has been suggested to the government, as I am sure the minister is aware.

I wish to ask him whether the government has been considering giving its consent to the proposal to use RRSPs in alleviation of the problem of interest rates for those who are fortunate enough to have RRSPs.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will defer that question to the Minister of Finance. I know that the suggestion has been made, and I will, hopefully, get an indication from him as to the stage it has reached.

However, I would like to correct what I believe was an erroneous comment made in the preamble to the question, which is that I was critical of the banks. On many occasions over the past 25 years I have been critical of the banks, but not in this instance, with respect to the efforts made to find some genuine relief for people who are in difficulty. As a matter of fact, the Canadian Bankers' Association has indicated that the banks would—and I think I can quote—"lean over backwards" in dealing with individual customers, particularly in the areas of housing, small businesses and farms. The Royal Bank has announced a special mortgage renewal program that will relieve some of the pressure. The Bank of Montreal has announced special measures to assist businessmen and farmers with the difficulties incurred as a result of higher interest rates.

I just want to make clear, in response to this question, that the comment that I have criticized the banks was not an accurate one.

Senator Smith: I thank the honourable gentleman for his correction. If I conveyed to him the impression that I thought this matter of criticizing the banks had arisen out of his comments of a few minutes ago, perhaps he would allow me to correct him. That is not what I meant at all. What I meant—and I trust I conveyed it—was that the request for the banks to do something or other seemed to me to be rather an attempt to blame the banks as being responsible for the high interest rates rather than the government accepting the responsibility itself.

Senator Olson: No, I do not think that was the indication by the Minister of Finance. However, I accept that correction. If that is your view, I suppose you are entitled to it. That is not our view.

Senator Smith: I do not think I made a correction; I think I explained what the minister did not hear.

INDUSTRIAL STRATEGY—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT ON FORMULATION

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: I have a supplementary to all of the questions of my colleagues. The Minister of State for Economic Development, who was, by the way, described in the Globe and Mail feature yesterday as a "cabinet giant"—and we are very proud to have a giant in our midst—

• (1500)

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): In a cabinet of pygmies a midget can be king.

Senator Charbonneau: In any case, honourable senators, the minister has been labouring for 18 months or longer to formulate an industrial strategy, or at least to publish it. I hope it is not a big mouse of an industrial strategy, but I would ask the minister to give us a progress report and tell us when we can expect this strategy. Or perhaps he could tell us if, in its contentment with the way its current economic policies are working, the government has decided to delay further before proclaiming that strategy.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I think one word in that question ought to be changed slightly. Senator Charbonneau suggested that I have been working on an "industrial" strategy, and he has asked what stage we are at with respect to that "industrial" strategy. That, of course, is the primary responsibility of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

I do have some responsibility for an ongoing strategy with respect to economic development. An economic development strategy is much broader than an industrial strategy because it, of course, includes the primary resources in many sectors with which we are so richly endowed. I could send my honourable friend some of the speeches I have been making across the country, in case he has not already seen them, because they do deal with the various opportunities. Indeed, there is one speech that deals with the eight constraints that we see with respect to our maximizing or optimizing the opportunities that are ours as Canadians.

No doubt, however, more will be said, and perhaps in even more specific and precise terms, about what is involved in meeting those constraints to enable Canada to enjoy the highest level of benefits from its potential, which is very high indeed.

Senator Charbonneau: If I may ask another supplementary question, is the minister telling us that this strategy will be divulged through speeches of the minister across the country? Furthermore, is he saying that it is to be a piecemeal type of strategy? The minister did indicate to us earlier that he would have an overall strategy worked out with all the departments under his economic development portfolio and would have a real strategy, an overall strategy, and not a piecemeal strategy, which I gather has been the case so far.

Senator Olson: Well, honourable senators, I suppose that in the context of that question and the reply to it you would have to separate or distinguish between macro- and micro-economic policies, both of which are extremely important, whether described by sectors or, indeed, by regions.

However, I can tell my honourable friend that we have indicated to a great degree what the prospects are. We have identified the constraints, which is what I was talking about a moment ago. It is not something we are trying to put together behind the in-camera position of the cabinet which we will then, all of a sudden, come out with. I have already indicated a great deal of that, and there will be a great deal more.

The other part of the senator's question related to the strategic overview which is done annually by all the departments, and that leads up to the priorities that will be applied to various programs, whether they are new or are changing the level of priority for various economic programs across the country. I am not sure whether my honourable friend is aware or not, but that is a very serious exercise we go through, the conclusion of which, of course, comes in the speech of the Minister of Finance when he brings down his budget.

UNITED NATIONS

RELIEF AND WORKS AGENCY—POSSIBILITY OF SPECIAL CONTRIBUTION BY CANADA

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, my question is not for the giant, but for the leader, and it has to do with a matter of international affairs. My question is prompted by the very sad event, which shocked all of us, and, in particular, by the response to that event by the Prime Minister of this country, who, in reference to the tragic assassination of President Sadat, said that perhaps we are all responsible in that we should have done more.

I ask the minister in reference specifically and particularly to an appeal by the Commissioner General of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency, Mr. Rydbeck, to the effect that there is now nearly $50 million indebtedness there and that there is the grave possibility that over 300 schools for the dispossessed Palestinian children may have to be closed.

Can the leader indicate whether Canada has been asked for a special contribution in the face of this emergency—and I frankly could not believe that Canada has not been. If so, is the Government of Canada prepared to make a special contribution, as has already been made by Saudi Arabia, Libya, the United States and Japan?

[Senator Olson.]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question is important. The Honourable Senator Macquarrie has a detailed knowledge of this particular field. At one time I served as the Canadian representative on the Palestinian Refugee Committee of the United Nations, and I know how serious the matter of refugees is.

As the Honourable Senator Macquarrie is aware, some of the nations who speak in such prolonged and emotional terms about the plight of refugees are absent at the pledging sessions of the United Nations, when they are required to state in specific terms what they will do to support the programs to assist refugees.

With respect to Canada, we have consistently, for the past 20 or 30 years, been in the top half dozen nations in aid to refugees in the Middle East. That is a record of which all Canadians, regardless of political persuasion, can be most proud.

I do not have the specific information which Senator Macquarrie has requested, but I will ask for that material and it will be brought here tomorrow, if possible.

THE ENVIRONMENT

NIAGARA RIVER—DUMPING OF NOXIOUS LIQUIDS

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government. In the last few days a great deal of attention has been focused on the noxious liquids that have been dumped in the Niagara River and the ill effects such dumping will have on the environment.

Can the leader inform the Senate as to the arrangements that have been made to stop this dumping of noxious liquids? Can he bring us up to date on any negotiations that have been taking place with the United States?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Niagara River continues to be a priority question for the government. Specific concerns come from many directions. There is, for instance, the continued malfunctioning of the Niagara Falls waste water treatment plant. There are discharges into the river from SCA Chemical, and there are proposals for the clean up of waste disposal sites, among others.

The urgency of the situation has been conveyed to the U.S. government on a number of occasions. Bilateral meetings have been held as recently as July to try to determine the most effective means of controlling and improving the condition of the river.

I can inform honourable senators today that we intend to request that the United States take immediate remedial action, particularly with respect to the Niagara Falls waste water treatment facility, and we propose to develop with them a mechanism to ensure ongoing consultation and co-operation in the entire Niagara River area.

Hon. Robert Muir: I should like to commend Senator Bosa for asking that question. By way of supplementary, may I ask the Leader of the Government if the statement is correct that was issued by the Ontario government officials in charge of that situation to the effect that: "It is no problem. You can drink this water. Drink it. It won't do you any harm."—despite a report that has come out recently? Is the statement correct when they say they are complying with federal regulations?

If the leader does not have that information handy, will he check into it and see if they are complying with federal regulations on the quality of this water, and will he ascertain whether the statements coming out of Queen's Park are in accordance with what has been taking place?

● (1510)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the honourable senator has asked whether Canadian authorities, officials and companies are complying with the regulations. Of course, in this case with regard to the Niagara Peninsula, it is possible that some of the pollution in that water originated in the United States. However, that information will be requested.

Senator Muir: Honourable senators, I do not wish to mislead the Leader of the Government, but Senator Bosa has raised a very important point. This water is very badly polluted with PCBs and so on, and it is used for drinking. The Ontario government is saying that there is no problem and that everybody is complying with the federal government regulations as to testing and so on. I wish to find out whether or not the parties concerned are in fact complying with these regulations.

AUDITOR GENERAL

RETIREMENT TESTIMONIAL DINNER

Question No. 25 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

1. Who sponsored the testimonial dinner for Canada's retiring Auditor General?

2. What was the total cost of the dinner?

3. Which members of the Senate and of the House of Commons were invited, and under what protocol?

Reply by the President of the Treasury Board:

1. The testimonial dinner for Canada's retiring Auditor General was sponsored by the Honourable Donald J. Johnston, President of the Treasury Board of Canada.

2. The total cost of the dinner was $2,721.60.

3. Members of the House of Commons who were invited included current members of the Finance Committee and the Public Accounts Committee, former Presidents of the Treasury Board, Party Leaders, and other MPs either actively involved or interested in the affairs of the Public Accounts Committee.

Most of these people were invited on the basis of their direct involvement in the Public Accounts Committee; others out of respect for their positions.

Also invited were Auditors-General from the provinces, members of the press (basically financial press reporters), businessmen, and associates of the Auditor General.

The following members of the House of Commons were invited:

Mr. Doug Anguish, M.P.

Mr. Harvie Andre, M.P.

Honourable Walter Baker, Q.C., P.C., M.P.

Mr. David Berger, M.P.

Mr. Ed Broadbent, M.P.

Honourable Judd Buchanan, P.C., M.P.

Honourable Jean Chrétien, P.C., M.P.

Right Honourable Joe Clark, P.C., M.P.

Mr. Bill Clarke, M.P.

Mr. Bob Corbett, M.P.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse, M.P.

Mr. Yves Demers, M.P.

Mr. Pierre Deniger, M.P.

Mr. Louis-R. Desmarais, M.P.

Mr. Maurice Dupras, M.P.

Mr. John Evans, M.P.

Mr. Scott Fennell, M.P.

Mr. Lloyd Francis, Deputy Speaker

Mr. John Gamble, M.P.

Mr. Alain Garant, M.P.

Dr. Bruce Halliday, M.P.

Mr. Jim Hawkes, M.P.

Mr. H. T. Herbert, M.P.

Mr. Stan Hovdebo, M.P.

Honourable Ron Huntington, P.C., M.P.

Mr. Serge Joyal, M.P.

Honourable Stanley Knowles, P.C., M.P.

Mr. Peter Lang, M.P.

Mr. Norman Lapointe, M.P.

Honourable Allan Lawrence, Q.C., P.C., M.P.

Mr. Tom Lefebvre, M.P.

Mr. Al MacBain, Q.C., M.P.

Honourable Flora MacDonald, P.C., M.P.

Honourable Allan MacEachen, P.C., M.P.

Mr. Jack Murta M.P.

Miss Aileen Nicholson, M.P.

Mr. Jim Peterson, M.P.

Honourable Yvon Pinard, P.C., M.P.

Mr. Bob Rae, M.P.

Honourable Jeanne Sauvé, P.C., Speaker

Mr. Tom Siddon, M.P.

Honourable Sinclair Stevens, Q.C., P.C., M.P.

Mr. Gordon Towers, M.P.

Honourable Michael Wilson, P.C., M.P.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

IRAN—CANADIAN EMBASSY—MONETARY OBLIGATIONS

Question No. 66 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

With regard to the closing of the Canadian Embassy in Iran, are any monetary obligations in default to Canada and, if so, (i) what is the amount (ii) what are the details of monies owed?

Reply by the Secretary of State for External Affairs:

A sum of $9,606 is considered to be owing to the Government of Canada as a direct result of the closure of the Embassy. The money represents payment of rent on a villa which had been rented until December 9, 1980 but on which the lease had been cancelled effective August 9, 1980 in accordance with the conditions of the lease. The rent, however, had been paid in advance for the term of the lease, that is, until December 9, 1980 in accordance with customary practice in Iran. The landlord, on the pretext of the difficult conditions in Iran, has refused to refund the unused portion of the rent which is 600,000 rials (150,000 monthly \times 4 months) or $9,606.

CUBA—CANADIAN GOVERNMENT-ASSISTED PROGRAMS

Question No. 67 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Heath Macquarrie:

1. When and for what reasons did C.I.D.A. terminate its programs with the Republic of Cuba?
2. Since 1962 what other Canadian organizations have carried on programs in Cuba?
3. What was the nature and cost of such programs?
4. Are any of these programs still operating?
5. With what other countries have C.I.D.A., C.U.S.O. or other government-assisted programs been terminated?

Reply by the Secretary of State for External Affairs:

Insofar as the Canadian International Development Agency is concerned, the answer is as follows:

1. In response to Cuban adventurism in Africa, the Government decided in reviewing overall Canadian relations with the Republic of Cuba in 1978 that the $14.4 million CIDA bilateral aid program would not be renewed when the projects terminated but that support funding for the CUSO projects could continue. Last September, the Government decided that continued support of CUSO operations in Cuba was not deemed appropriate in view of the previous decisions. Canadian Official Development Assistance in support of the CUSO projects in Cuba would therefore not be made available after fiscal year 1980-1981.

2. CIDA only has information about the two organizations whose programs in Cuba it has supported, namely, (a) CUSO and (b) Cystic Fibrosis Association.

3. (a) CUSO

CUSO has since 1971 conducted a small and highly specialized program in the agricultural and health fields which comprised short-term technical assistance visits using personnel recruited in cooperation with Agriculture Canada, the New Brunswick and Ontario Departments of Agriculture and several Canadian universities and hospitals. This program offered reciprocal benefits to Canada in that it provided Canadians with knowledge of areas such as waste-recycling for the porcine industry. The amounts of funding provided for this program averaged $70,000 annually over the 10-year period.

(b) Canadian Cystic Fibrosis Association

This project was to assist the Cuban medical profession to develop a diagnostic and treatment program for cystic fibrosis patients. CIDA provided a total of $22,500 in 1974-1975.

4. CIDA is no longer supporting either of the above programs.

5. CIDA is no longer assisting projects or programs in six countries, viz. Laos, Vietnam, Afghanistan, Kampuchea, Iran and Libya.

As for countries where CUSO has terminated its program, it can be said that due to the changing nature of requests made by developing countries and the evolution of CUSO's own programming priorities, there have been a number of cases in which CUSO, not CIDA, decided to close down its regular volunteer program in certain countries, e.g. India, Tonga.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Austin, seconded by the Honourable Senator Goldenberg, for the second reading of the Bill S-11, entitled: "An Act to amend the Canada Elections Act".—(Honourable Senator Macquarrie).

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, although I am vicariously ennobled by the elevation of the mover, nevertheless, I would ask that this order stand.

Order stands.

LABOUR RELATIONS

MOTION TO APPOINT SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Deschatelets, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator McIlraith, P.C.:

That a special committee of the Senate, to be composed of seven members, be appointed to inquire into and report upon

(a) any matter relating to labour relations in Canada with particular reference to problems concerning the free collective bargaining process and the constructive settlement of disputes; and

(b) any proposals for a more orderly and less disruptive exercise of the right to strike;

That the Committee have power to engage the services of such technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purposes of the inquiry; and

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, to report from time to time, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee.—(Honourable Senator Macdonald).

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, I believe that this motion is more justified today than it was a few months ago. However, if honourable senators do not agree with some of its terms—for example, the limitation of the committee to seven members—it is not important to me if they are amended. What is important, in my view, is that a committee be formed to look into labour relations.

I will accept any amendment concerning the details of my motion, and if either the government leader or the deputy government leader wishes to introduce a motion which respects the principles of my motion, I shall be glad to withdraw my motion, with the permission of the Senate. I hope I have made myself clear, so that all honourable senators who wish to participate in this debate may do so, having in mind the fact that I shall agree to any amendment.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think that we should thank Senator Deschatelets for that suggestion and its manifestation of flexibility. But, speaking objectively, if I understand correctly, Senator Lawson has already intervened on this order, and he took issue with the principle of the motion and as to whether or not it would be helpful. He did not speak against an interest of the Senate in labour relations, but he felt that a Senate committee study at this time would not be helpful.

Senator Deschatelets: Honourable senators, if I may correct my honourable friend, I do not think that what he described was the case at all. If I remember correctly, Senator Lawson said that he had some doubts about the motion and as to whether a committee investigating this topic would arrive at any useful solutions. I believe that at the time Senator Lawson was not opposed to the principle.

Senator Frith: Then, perhaps, the word is not “opposed”. Perhaps it is appropriate to say that his reservations related to the principle of the motion, not its wording. For that reason, I think that we should take notice of what Senator Deschatelets has suggested and await the reaction of other senators. I believe there are some senators who share Senator Lawson’s reservations. Senator Deschatelets has offered to change the wording of his motion, if the changes relate only to wording as opposed to principle. We should await the reaction of honourable senators after they have had a chance to consider what Senator Deschatelets has said.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

LAW OF THE SEA

THIRD CONFERENCE—REVISION OF DRAFT CONVENTION— DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Thériault, seconded by the Honourable Senator Marshall:

That the Senate reaffirm the support given by the Canadian people to the basic objectives of the Third Conference on the Law of the Sea and urge the United States administration to undertake forthwith the revision of the draft Convention in order to increase the chances of concluding the work of the Conference when the Tenth Session resumes in Geneva in August, 1981.—(Honourable Senator Marshall).

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, in view of the fact that the Tenth Session of the Third Law of the Sea Conference took place in Geneva in August, which was during the summer recess, and notwithstanding the fact that I fully support the motion of my good friend, Senator Thériault, I feel that it would be superfluous to speak to this motion at this time. I wish to withdraw, but I would like the Senate to affirm its support of the motion put by Senator Thériault.

On motion of Senator Thériault, debate adjourned.

CHILDHOOD EXPERIENCES AS CAUSES OF CRIMINAL BEHAVIOUR

REPORT OF HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE COMMITTEE— ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, entitled: “Child at Risk”, tabled in the Senate on 16th October, 1980.—(Honourable Senator Bell).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as I recall the situation before we adjourned, Senator Bell wanted to hold this matter open for debate by other honourable senators who may wish to speak. Perhaps the order should stand for the time being.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on a point of order, would the deputy leader indicate at this time what is in store for us tomorrow?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we do not expect to have any legislation from the other place. Therefore, tomorrow we shall have the Question Period, and perhaps debate on some of the items on the Order Paper if the corresponding senators wish to proceed.

Hon. G. I. Smith: There is Senator Riley's motion.

Senator Frith: Yes, Senator Riley will be moving a motion in which, of course, Senator Smith, as chairman of the committee to which Senator Riley wishes the matter referred, is particularly interested.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, October 15, 1981

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Reports of expenditures and administration in connection with the Unemployment Assistance Act for the fiscal years ended March 31, 1979, 1980 and 1981, pursuant to section 8 of the said Act, Chapter U-1, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the President of the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1981, pursuant to section 21 of the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council Act, Part I of Chapter 24, Statutes of Canada, 1976-77.

CANADA-UNITED STATES INTER-PARLIAMENTARY GROUP

TWENTY-SECOND MEETING—REPORT OF CANADIAN DELEGATION PRINTED AS AN APPENDIX

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, the 20th of October, 1981, I will call the attention of the Senate to the twenty-second meeting of the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group held at Halifax, Nova Scotia, from the 22nd to the 26th of May, 1981.

Honourable senators, I should like to ask that the report of the Canadian delegation on the twenty-second meeting of the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group held at Halifax, Nova Scotia, from the 22nd to the 26th of May, 1981, be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate and the Debates of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see appendix, p. 2808.)

REGULATION OF OIL AND GAS INTERESTS

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MAKE STUDY

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to examine and consider the subject matter of the Bill C-48, intituled: "An Act to regulate oil and gas interests in Canada lands and to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act," in advance of the said bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

[Translation]

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT MOTION

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, October 20, 1981, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Just for the record, could the deputy leader tell us why we are coming back next week?

Senator Frith: With pleasure, honourable senators. We do not expect to receive many bills next week from the other place, although some have reached a fairly advanced stage. As a matter of fact, perhaps I should use the singular, because we expect to receive only one. A number of committee meetings are also scheduled for next week. Some inquiries and other orders will probably be ready, so that we are, so to speak, clearing the deck in anticipation of the work we will be expecting concerning the Constitution and the budget.

Senator Flynn: You sound very convincing!

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

THE CONSTITUTION

PROPOSED FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE—POSSIBLE IMPLICATION OF NATIVE GROUPS

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the leader of the Government concerning precisely the constitutional issue. Could the leader advise us whether a final date has been set for the federal-provincial meeting or conference after the dissenting provincial premiers get together next week? The Prime Minister said that it might be held on the 25th, 26th or 27th of October; has a decision now been made concerning one of these dates?

● (1410)

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, as of this morning the date of a possible meeting between the Prime Minister and the first ministers was still a matter of negotiation. As soon as a date has been established, that information will be brought to the Senate.

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, on a supplementary. Has the Prime Minister considered involving native groups in these discussions? I am given to understand that these groups have made representations to the effect that they should be involved in some way, perhaps not in the same way as the premiers, but they would like to have the opportunity to express their views. Has their request been considered? Has a decision been taken? If not, will the Prime Minister give it special attention?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, at this time I am not in a position to delineate the subjects and the initiatives which have been proposed for the meeting involving the Right Honourable the Prime Minister and the premiers.

INDIAN ACT

PROPOSED AMENDMENT—CONSULTATION BETWEEN FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AND INDIAN ORGANIZATIONS

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I would like to direct a question to the new Minister of State, who has said that he is responsible for constitutional discussions concerning the rights of the aboriginal peoples. Would the minister inform us as to whether the government is committed to submitting proposed changes in the Indian Act to the people they affect, and to full consultation with Indian organizations prior to the introduction of those changes in Parliament?

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State): Honourable senators, the government is maintaining an ongoing dialogue with major groups representing native peoples in Canada, but I shall have to obtain more specific information before I can respond to the rest of the honourable senator's question.

● (1415)

Senator Flynn: Is the minister now involved in these discussions and consultations? Has he already started something?

Senator Austin: I am being briefed about the constitutional role of natives and I have met, in an introductory way, with some of the native groups.

YUKON TERRITORY

BILL C-48—CONCERNS OF TERRITORIAL GOVERNMENT AND NATIVE PEOPLES

Hon. R. James Balfour: I have a question for Senator Austin. I am sure the minister is aware that both the Yukon government and the northern aboriginal peoples have expressed deep concerns with respect to the various provisions of Bill C-48.

Will the minister undertake to meet forthwith with both the Yukon government and the representatives of the northern aboriginal peoples, and thereafter undertake to introduce amendments to Bill C-48 designed to meet the concerns which these groups have expressed?

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State): In response to Senator Balfour, I want to emphasize what I said yesterday about my responsibilities to back up the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in terms of his roles relating to governmental evolution in the Yukon and Northwest Territories and with respect to the constitutional role of the native peoples.

I give no undertaking of any kind to Senator Balfour during this Question Period, but I would advise him that the Honourable John Munro, Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, is having talks in Whitehorse at this moment.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): He does not need any back-up at this time.

AGRICULTURE

IMPACT OF HIGH INTEREST RATES ON FARMERS—ROLE OF FARM CREDIT CORPORATION

Hon. Cyril B. Sherwood: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. The Minister of Agriculture has said that if he cannot get low-interest loans for financially-troubled farmers he will resign "within a few weeks", to use his words.

Would the minister inform farmers, through the Senate, what is the government's definition of "within a few weeks"? Would he also tell those farmers if he agrees with the Minister of Agriculture that, at this time, financial assistance to farmers is of secondary importance to the constitutional package?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I will convey that inquiry to the Minister of Agriculture who may or may not wish to furnish a clearer and more specific explanation of what is meant by "a few weeks."

I can tell the honourable senator now that the Canadian government regards the difficulties of many Canadians, not only those in the agricultural sector, as a result of high interest rates, to be a matter of primary importance, and it is not fair or accurate for him to indicate that we can only do one thing at a time on this side. We can address the constitutional problem and some of the economic problems at the same time.

Hon. G. I. Smith: One thing at a time seems to be one too many.

Senator Sherwood: I have a supplementary question, honourable senators. While Mr. Whelan was making either this threat or promise to resign—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Promise.

Senator Sherwood: —the Farm Credit Corporation raised its interest rate from 14 per cent to 16.75 per cent. Does the government intend to encourage the Farm Credit Corporation to borrow on the international market in the hope that, as a result, it may be able to offer lower interest rates?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I think Senator Sherwood will understand that the procedure followed by the Farm Credit Corporation is in accordance with the law passed by the Parliament of Canada. One of the regulations affecting the rate at which the Farm Credit Corporation lends money is based on the six-month average on medium-term Canadian bonds. Therefore, until the regulations are changed, that, of course, is what is required. The interest rate of 16.75 per cent is the calculated average return on that type of bond between April and October.

● (1420)

The next question is whether or not the Farm Credit Corporation will have an opportunity to obtain funding other than that provided for in the act now. Of course, it is up to Parliament to pass an amendment to the act. I can say that at the moment the Farm Credit Corporation receives all of its primary funding from the Minister of Finance.

Senator Sherwood: Honourable senators, I was pleased to detect a measure of concern regarding the urgency of this matter, especially as it has to do with the financing of so many of our farms.

I know what hardship these high interest rates are imposing upon many farmers who are locked into Farm Credit Corporation loans. I am sure Senator Olson is also aware of that. I know that in my own community there is a danger that farms, which have been in the same families for five, six or seven generations, might be lost through bankruptcy. So, it is indeed a matter of great urgency.

I was reading just this morning that the budget of the Farm Credit Corporation for Ontario is $25 million less than what it was a year ago. I am wondering whether the government is going to increase the amount of money it will make available to the Farm Credit Corporation as a consequence of its high interest rate policy.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, while I am looking up these figures I can tell the honourable senator that he is using the wrong description when he calls it the "high interest rate policy of the government." I explained that to him yesterday in some detail.

Senator Smith: That was no explanation.

Senator Olson: If I was unable to convey the message, I will probably have to go through it again so that there will be no misunderstanding.

Senator Smith: You had better straighten it up, then.

Senator Olson: For 1981-82, the Farm Credit Corporation budgeted for $405.8 million in net loan commitments. This amount includes, by the way, $302.8 million on the allocation, if you want to call it that, from the Minister of Finance, and $103 million of projected repayments by farmers. So, the amount of $405.8 million translates into something like $463.5 million in gross loan approvals. Of course, there is some refinancing of some of the loans, and this causes overlaps from one year to the next.

This, in total, is somewhat below the total amount of new loans that the Farm Credit Corporation was able to make because there was, for example, a slowdown in repayments due to a number of factors. As a matter of fact, there were fewer repayments of loans. That was the practice in the past. The reason for that is very obvious—the rate of 14 per cent is substantially lower than that which could be obtained on any term deposit or almost all other financial instruments.

I think all of those things have to be taken into account. It is not accurate to say that there has been a reduction in the financial commitment by the government to the Farm Credit Corporation. In fact, that went up from about $279 million for the previous fiscal year to $302.8 million for this fiscal year, if my memory serves me correctly.

Senator Sherwood: Honourable senators, my question was whether there would be a further increase in the amount of money made available through the Farm Credit Corporation by the government.

Senator Olson: That, of course, is a decision that must be made by the cabinet as a whole. I alone cannot answer that question.

Senator Flynn: I have a supplementary question. The minister said that we should not speak of the high interest rate policy of the government.

Senator Olson: That is the wrong description.

● (1425)

Senator Flynn: Did I understand the minister to say that the rate of interest charged by the Farm Credit Corporation is determined by the regulations? Couldn't those regulations be changed by the government to meet the special circumstances of the day? If the government does not change the regulations, can it not be said to approve of the high rate of interest?

Senator Olson: The Leader of the Opposition has to understand that what I was giving was the fact.

Senator Smith: For a change.

Senator Olson: The fact is that the rate at which the Farm Credit Corporation lends is determined on the basis of the average rate of return on medium-term government bonds for the immediately preceding six months, and that is what that percentage is.

Senator Flynn: The government could change the regulations.

Senator Olson: That is another matter.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a question arising out of the answer given by Senator Olson. I understood him to say that the Farm Credit Corporation was looking to foreign countries and other sources for additional funds. Has the Farm Credit Corporation had a look at Petro-

Can, a crown corporation, which seems to have an excessive amount of money and is passing it out interest-free to certain individuals? Perhaps then the farmers could receive a lower rate of interest, probably on the same terms as the executive assistants?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, at the present time, and until the Farm Credit Act is amended by Parliament, I think it accurate to say that the funding for the Farm Credit Corporation must come from the Minister of Finance.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

BOARD OF DIRECTORS—REGIONAL REPRESENTATION

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, my question is to the Leader of the Government and has to do with the release from the office of the Prime Minister announcing the appointment of a ten-member board of directors to the new Canada Post Corporation. Of the ten appointments, three are from Ontario, two are from Quebec, one is from British Columbia, one is from Saskatchewan, one is from New Brunswick, one is from the Northwest Territories, and one is from Nova Scotia; but none is from Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, Manitoba or Alberta. Why is there not representation from across the country?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if the honourable senator has a name or names to propose, I would be glad to convey those suggestions to the office of the Prime Minister. Certainly, the honourable senator's representations will be made known to the Prime Minister.

Senator Marshall: I would not put anybody in Newfoundland to the chore of sitting on a board having anything to do with the Post Office.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): That answers your question.

Senator Perrault: There may be others who disagree with you.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Maybe you could give us a list of your enemies.

Senator Marshall: I understand that, to mark the transformation of the Post Office into a crown corporation, two letters are going to be mailed to the Prime Minister tomorrow, one from the Honourable Mr. Ouellet and one from the new president, Mr. Warren. For the historical record, if the letters do arrive, may we be told how long they take to arrive and which of the two arrives first?

Senator Perrault: I am certain honourable senators can anticipate both letters arriving with blinding speed.

Senator Flynn: As usual.

[Senator Phillips.]

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

PROPOSED MULTILATERAL TRADE TALKS—INCLUSION OF CANADA

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, may I direct a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development? Is it correct that the minister's colleague, Mr. Herb Gray, at his recent meeting with United States Commerce Secretary Baldrige, requested that Canada be included in U.S. proposed trade talks with other major industrial countries, and, if so, what was the response of the U.S. officials?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I want to check that more carefully because I am not sure that I was informed directly of the number of things that the Honourable Herb Gray put on the agenda, but I will ask him. Generally, it seems to me that there was in fact a press conference after the meeting at which that was indicated.

Senator Balfour: I have a supplementary, in light of the minister's response. Can we assume that published reports, to the effect that Mr. Gray's request was rebuffed by the officials, are incorrect?

Senator Olson: No, I do not think you should assume that or anything else until I receive a more direct report.

GRAIN

CROWSNEST RATES—EXPANSION OF RAIL TRANSPORTATION IN WESTERN CANADA

Hon. Martha P. Bielish: Honourable senators, I have a question for Senator Olson, in the hope that in his position as a non-protagonist he will be able to enlighten us on the government's current thinking with regard to the Crow rate and rail expansion in the west.

● (1430)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, there has been a good deal of debate, and we are now nearer to a consensus than we were six months or a year ago. The problem concerning Crow rates is a contentious one, as I am sure the honourable senator appreciates, and it would be well for us to do what the Prime Minister indicated some months ago, namely, to have a consensus and agreement by those who are directly affected before any overt action is taken.

I do not believe that the honourable senator should assume, as some people have, that we will be unable to provide sufficient railway capacity until and unless we settle the so-called Crow rate issue.

Senator Bielish: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary. I agree that discussions have been proceeding at great length. However, a great deal of dissension has developed over this matter. Would the minister clear the air by at least telling us if and when the government expects to arrive at a consensus, or should farmers and the railways prepare themselves for a further period of this circus?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am sure the honourable senator understands clearly the pitfalls of attempting to predict when people will agree with each other.

Senator Bielish: I have a further supplementary. Will that agreement take one year, two years or 10 years, while the grain remains in railway cars, elevators and grain bins?

Senator Olson: I am sure the honourable senator recognizes that during the crop year that closed July 31, 1981, there was provided an opportunity for almost every grain producer in western Canada to sell all the grain that he or she wanted to deliver to the elevator. I know there were many delivery points where there was space left at the end of the year, and, indeed, the total delivery at the end of the year was higher than in any previous year. Therefore, it is not fair to say that there is any pile-up or build-up.

The projections are that during the 1981-82 crop year we shall again be in a position to have an all-time record delivery through the system. Therefore, the assumption contained in the question is not only incorrect but is, to a certain extent, irresponsible because it does not comply with the facts.

We should also take into account what is currently being done to increase the capacity of the railway system serving the grain-producing areas and to improve the export position.

If the honourable senator looks into the situation, as I am sure she has, she will find that there has been a great deal done to increase the capacity, particularly on the CN line passing through the central part of Canada to both Prince Rupert and the lower mainland. Indeed, there has been substantial improvement made to the Canadian Pacific line farther south, although we are aware of the bottleneck respecting the Beaver Tunnel.

Therefore, it is unfair to say that nothing is being done, because a great deal is being done and is projected to be done from now until the time when additional tonnages in grain, coal, potash, sulphur and other products, will be offered to the railways.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

REFUGEES FROM EASTERN EUROPE—ADMISSION TO CANADA—
POSSIBLE INCREASE IN QUOTA—ECONOMIC AID TO POLAND

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, would the Leader of the Government inform us whether the 1981 quota of 5,000 will be increased for refugees and self-exiles from eastern Europe? I ask this question because in Austria alone there are at present an estimated 21,000 refugees, mostly from Poland, and the Austrian government has appealed to the international community to relieve it of its burden.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is anticipated that in 1981 Canada will admit from Austria approximately 3,000 eastern European refugees, which is three times the number originally planned. Eighty per cent of the refugees now in Austria are, of course, from Poland, attempting to leave the difficult situation there.

The increase is mainly due to a special task force sent to Vienna in mid-September for one month. This substantial response reflects our traditional humanitarian concern for refugees, and, in this case, eastern European refugees. The overall Canadian intake of eastern European refugees in 1981 will be about 5,000. The government will give full and sympathetic consideration to this situation in setting its 1982 levels.

As far as another aspect of immigration is concerned, since the government began a concerted effort in the 1970s to deal with the serious humanitarian problem of the reunification of families considerable progress has been achieved. Most of the old backlog of cases has been cleared up so that representation lists submitted to eastern European governments have been reduced from the hundreds of cases that were outstanding a few years ago to just a few dozen in the Soviet Union, Romania and Poland, together with an occasional new case in the other countries of eastern Europe. This does not mean, of course, that the basic problem has been resolved. The government is continuing to direct its efforts at Madrid towards finding a satisfactory solution, in the spirit of the Helsinki Final Act, to this problem and to other humanitarian problems that are of particular concern to Canada.

The general question of aid for Poland has occupied a good deal of the attention of the government in recent weeks and months, and quite properly so. There may indeed be additional initiatives in the near future, but I think it will be of interest to honourable senators to know the present facts. Canada has provided the following official economic assistance to Poland.

There will be a postponement for five months of 70 per cent of the principal amounts due to the Canadian Wheat Board in the period March 15 to June 30, 1981, which amount to approximately Cdn $25 million.

Canada has assured Poland that it will continue to be a major source of grain under the provisions of an agreement which provides for the supply of 1.5 million tonnes of grain annually during the period 1980 to 1982. Barring any dramatic deterioration in the Polish situation, Canada will continue to provide the credit necessary to finance these shipments. This will require approximately Cdn $400 million in 1981.

The Export Development Corporation has extended an additional $7 million of industrial credits in connection with the Kwidzyn pulp and paper project. It will also disburse $42.2 million of previously agreed Kwidzyn project credits.

Canada is a party to the multilateral rescheduling agreement concluded in Paris on April 27 between Poland and 15 western creditor states. The agreement provides for the rescheduling of 90 per cent of the principal and interest maturing between May 1 and December 3, 1981. The repayment will be rescheduled over eight years including a four-year grace period. In Canada's case this will mean the rescheduling of approximately $105 million in the last eight months of 1981. The agreement also stipulates that the rescheduling of Poland's 1982 and 1983 debt service will be considered sympathetically.

The Department of Fisheries has agreed to reduce the level of Poland's fish purchase commitments—that is, obligations to purchase Canadian fish products in return for fishing rights in Canadian waters—from $8 million to $5 million for both 1980 and 1981.

We have also granted Poland a special fish allocation of 8,000 metric tonnes in addition to the 12,000 metric tonnes already allotted for 1981.

The Treasury Board has agreed to grant $100,000 to Poland.

• (1440)

These are facts, honourable senators, which should be put on the record because they are of interest to all Canadians, particularly to those of Polish descent or those with a special interest in Poland. They do provide rather convincing proof of the government's very positive efforts to assist this nation at a time of great trial and vicissitude.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, I thank the government leader for this information and I thank the government for this economic assistance to Poland. I should like, however, to ask the government leader: What is the government's response to requests from many quarters to waive the existing onerous regulation requiring Polish exiles already in Canada to make the long and costly trip to Vienna just to formally present themselves to a Canadian immigration official when they have already filled out an application in Canada and have undergone a medical examination here?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that information will be sought in more detailed form from the Minister of Immigration. However, the adjudication of immigration cases has been a continuing problem, not only during the life of this government but during that of the preceding government. If Canada were to admit all of those who wish to come to this country without establishing some rules for the admission of these people, many of whom claim to be refugees, our whole immigration system could break down.

Honourable senators will recall that a few years ago there were serious abuses of the system whereby, for example, certain charter flights from various countries would land in Canada's principal cities, ostensibly with groups of vacationers. I recall one group which came into the country. Some of its members said that they had come to attend one of our leading national fairs. Yet when the charter flight was ready to leave Canada many of them were not at the airport; they had decided to remain in Canada. Clearly, there was an attempt by some of them to circumvent existing immigration regulations.

Some of these immigration decisions are agonizing; some of these decisions are very difficult to make. One question on the west coast, for example, now involves approximately 100 sailors from Poland. They arrived in the port of Vancouver, and they decided to remain when their ships departed. Now several of them seek refugee status; others, political asylum.

Some cases are obviously deserving ones. Yet traditional government policy—which goes beyond the life of this government—requires an obligation on the part of such people to demonstrate that they are truly refugees or that they will, in fact, suffer political persecution if they return to their homes.

If we were to allow entry to all of those who come to our ports on ships and who claim to be refugees, and if there were no admittance requirements applied, the whole immigration system could be threatened.

Obviously, honourable senators, these are difficult decisions for the minister and his officials to make. I believe that most Canadians are supportive of a policy which does require certain obligations on the part of those seeking entry into this country as landed immigrants.

Hon. Jack Marshall: I have a supplementary question for the government leader. Could he state whether different rules apply when the National Hockey League wants to bring a foreign hockey player into our country? Does it have to abide by the same rules and regulations as are applied to these poor refugees?

Hon. Martial Asselin: A good question.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, of course, good government policy should be even-handed, regardless of the economic background of the people who wish to obtain entry into this country. That is the only way I will reply to that question.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, may I ask a supplementary question of the government leader? Admitting, as I do, the difficulties attendant upon questions of immigration and the procedures which he has just described to us, I do not see how it helps the situation at all to require people to go out of the country in order to have a decision made when ultimately the decisions are made here. Why is it necessary, as Senator Haidasz has said, that these persons return to their country of origin, or some consulate or embassy of Canada in another country, in order to have their applications considered?

I could cite many examples where this has caused undue hardship; where the situation was straightforward, where the entry into Canada was almost an automatic requirement, but still these people were put to the expense and time loss of absenting themselves from Canada to go to Boston or some other place for a number of days, and sometimes to be kept waiting by officers whose attitude, perhaps, was more arbitrary than it ought to have been.

Therefore, I ask the minister, when he seeks the information in relation to the Polish refugees requested by Senator Haidasz, to broaden his search by including a question relating to this whole matter, which seems to me to contribute nothing to the efficiency of our immigration procedure.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, let me provide an analogy for you. We will say that there is a queue for a bus. We will say there are 100 people in that queue and somebody at the very end of the queue states, "Look, I just want to go on the bus for a few minutes to say goodbye to my maiden aunt." He says to the bus driver, "Just let me on briefly. I want to say goodbye and I will get off the bus immediately." But he refuses to leave that bus, and takes a seat, which could be occupied by someone in the queue. That is comparable, in a sense, to the situation of somebody who comes to Canada saying, "I want to visit the Canadian National Exhibition," or, "I want to visit a relative," or, "I am coming into the country for a wedding." Yet after they arrive, some say, in effect, "I like it here and I want to stay. It makes no sense at all for me to have to go back to Europe or Asia, or to another continent, to apply through normal and established channels." Honourable senators, when you have a situation where the government gives its legal blessing and actual priority to somebody who moves well ahead of the "queue," in this fashion, ahead of all the people who have gone through all of the official procedures, who have been waiting, whose files have been processed through the system, who follow the rules established by Parliament, then I think a strong case could be made by those people at the back of the "queue." That case is: "Why are these visitors, these new arrivals, being given priority over me? I have obeyed all of the laws. I am waiting patiently for my turn. I have followed all of the obligations established by Parliament, yet"—to return to the analogy—"this person who hoped to the front of the queue to say goodbye to his maiden aunt is allowed to take a seat on that bus and I must lose my place to him and am left waiting."

That is a little simplistic, but it is the essential nature of one problem relating to immigration. Do we have procedures or do we not have procedures? Are we going to have a system whereby everyone who can afford to get to the shores of this country is allowed to remain, yet those people who apply, go through the proper procedures, are interviewed and have a determination made with respect to the skills they may bring to this country, are accorded second-class status? Yes, these are tough decisions which must be made by the Minister of Immigration.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. First, I should like to say that when I was on the Immigration Committee we spent five months looking into the situation which had existed before, when immigrants were allowed to apply here. We saw how much that system was abused—terribly abused—for years. We appreciated why the government was therefore forced to bring in these other rules. I should like to ask the leader, when he is looking into this entire question, to look into that aspect of it, too.

Senator Perrault: Yes, and I very much appreciate the intervention made by Senator Godfrey. The situation was utterly chaotic before Parliament, in its wisdom, suggested that there had to be some minimum rules established in order to bring order out of that chaos.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

SALE OF CANDU REACTORS TO KOREA

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I would like to pose a question to the brilliant Leader of the Government in the Senate. I realize he has a computerized memory bank, yet I would not expect him to have the answer to this question today. Would he, at his convenience—which may be the first time we sit next week—bring in a report on the Prime Minister's visit to Korea and the negotiations relating to the possible sale of another one or two Candu reactors? What does the problem seem to be? What are the difficulties in this regard?

I am sure the leader knows that it would mean a great deal to Canada if these sales could be made. We know only what we read in the papers, but even the Globe and Mail—which seems to be the Koran, the Talmud and the Bible to a lot of illiterates in this country—does not always write the entire truth or set out the real facts on everything. I would appreciate having a report.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall be pleased to request that report. It will be presented as soon as it arrives.

THE ECONOMY

INFLATION—INTEREST RATES

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. Yesterday, in answer to my quoting OECD figures showing that the per capita income of Canadians had gone from second highest in the world in 1969 to twelfth in 1980, the minister mentioned something about the criteria used to arrive at such figures. Would he explain, then, which criteria were used by the OECD to arrive at such figures and, if he is not satisfied with them, which criteria he thinks should be used to evaluate the per capita income of the country?

● (1450)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I was not dissatisfied with the assumptions made by the OECD in arriving at those figures. The reason for that is simple. I did not know what they were. I am looking into it, however. But I was dissatisfied with the assumption made by the honourable senator that this had automatically changed the standard of living, which is really the important thing with respect to what income is used for by the average citizen of any country.

I will have that looked into and perhaps I will be able to give him a more elaborate reply. But I am sure he knows very well, for example, that there are some small countries that have benefited greatly from the activities of OPEC, which may have changed the income of those particular countries. However, when that income is divided by the population and a high per capita amount obtained, that does not necessarily reflect an increase in the standard of living in those countries. That is why I was concerned. However, perhaps I shall have a more complete reply to that analysis early next week.

Senator Charbonneau: I might add that most of the countries which have passed Canada in terms of income are western European countries. I can name Denmark, France and quite a few others. They are not necessarily OPEC countries.

Senator Olson: My honourable friend would also have to take into account the CPI in those countries related to that income in order to get to the standard of living based on it.

SMALL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BONDS—EVALUATION OF PROGRAM

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. Has an evaluation recently been made of the performance and effectiveness of the small business development bond program? If not, would the minister consider having such an evaluation made and report on it to the Senate?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I think we could have some investigation—I guess “discussion” is a better word than “investigation”—as to the effectiveness of those bonds.

I am advised by the honourable leader, who has these things right at hand, that they will more than double the lending under the small business development bond program, from approximately $800 million at the present time to $1.6 billion by the end of the year. I am further advised that there are a number of other advantages that could be spelled out.

I would be the first to acknowledge, of course, that there are some complaints from some communities to the effect that they do not believe that both the intent and the spirit—or spirit and intent, whichever way you wish to put it—of those are being carried out in those communities. We should have some reports about that, and I am sure that the Minister of Finance will be only too happy to have any individual incidents checked out to determine the reasons.

Senator Bosa: My question was prompted by some statistics recently made available attesting to the fact that the banks have experienced practically no losses in lending these moneys, a fact which would indicate to me that they are not lending to the most needy but only to the most financially viable small businesses. I can only conclude that that is not the intent of the act.

Senator Olson: Well, I guess you can make that argument. One could also make the argument that it was intended to make small businesses viable, and, if that in fact has been the result, then, of course, there would not be any great losses.

ENERGY

QUEBEC AND MARITIMES PIPELINE—REVERSIBILITY

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. Perhaps he would permit a preliminary observation to the effect that we in the Atlantic provinces were very pleased that he found time to visit us a little over a month ago.

Hon. Jack Marshall: That is why you won the election.

Senator Smith: That is an interesting thought, but whatever the reason was, the honourable gentleman knows that the Conservative government there was returned with an increased majority. However, that was not the observation I intended to make. The observation was that we were very glad that the minister found time to come and see what we are like down there.

[Senator Olson.]

Those of us from Nova Scotia who are interested in the proposed gas pipeline and in the potential of offshore gas in Nova Scotia were pleased to know that the minister expressed the opinion that he thought the proposed gas pipeline ought to be reversible. At least, that is what he is reported as having said, and since such an opinion very much coincides with what we would like to hear him say, we tend to believe the report. But I would like to have his assurance now that, in fact, he did express that opinion and that it is still his opinion, namely, that the pipeline proposed to be built through the maritime provinces ought to be reversible.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I want to say, first, that I enjoyed my visit to the maritime provinces a little over a month ago. I regret that I was unable to visit more places than Cape Breton and Saint John, New Brunswick.

Hon. Robert Muir: You were in the best spot, anyhow.

Senator Olson: Yes, I could go on for a long while describing the pleasant and favourable impressions I received from being in the part of Cape Breton Island I visited; but I should also say how impressed I was with the economic activity taking place in and around Saint John, which was the other place I had an opportunity to visit briefly.

With respect to the substantive part of the question, I have always been of the view that the distribution system of the pipeline ought to take into account the possibility of some Sable Island gas, for example. There might also be some other discoveries to be found in the maritime provinces which would be put into that distribution system.

However, I must advise my honourable friend that I am not the one who will make the decision on the economic cost and, therefore, the viability of the initial installation. There are, of course, some costs involved in the telescoping nature of a pipeline, whichever way the gas flows. But it seems to me that the position of the companies and, indeed, the position of the financial support from the federal government for that line must be taken into account as well, and, obviously, that also has to correspond with the time frame in which it could reasonably be predicted that some of that gas will be brought on shore.

Senator Smith: Perhaps the honourable gentleman will permit me to observe that he seems to be doing his best to decrease the satisfaction with which the people in our area heard, or heard of, his previous comment. May I ask if he is of the opinion now that it would be desirable and proper, from his point of view, to have that pipeline built as a reversible pipeline?

Senator Olson: Well, honourable senators, I don't think I should add anything. I gave an explanation just a minute ago that seemed clear to me. I am sure that Senator Smith will find, on reflection, when he reads the reply in detail tomorrow, that what I have said does not require repeating. I said that some accommodation ought to be made, but that there are some cost factors that have to be taken into account too.

Senator Smith: I take it, then, that the honourable gentleman is saying that, if he expressed an opinion such as I indicated he was reported as having expressed, he was simply speaking for himself and not pronouncing on government policy.

Senator Olson: And the reason for that is quite simple. Neither I nor any other single person has that decision to make. It has to be taken into account as well as the costs that are related to it, but I believe that the prospects of significant commercial quantities of gas being available within the reasonably near future are such that it ought to be considered. I hope that is helpful to my honourable friend.

● (1500)

Senator Smith: Certainly, it is helpful to know that one who has been described in the glowing terms in which the honourable gentleman has had the good fortune to be described, as to his influence upon government policy, thinks in those terms. I am glad to be assured that he does, and I trust that he will do his best to cause those views to be accepted by his colleagues as a whole and the decision to be made accordingly.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

THE BUDGET—IMPACT ON LOW INCOME FAMILIES

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer to a question put by Senator Marshall on November 18, 1980, almost one year ago. There is an explanation as to why it has taken so long to produce this answer, but I cannot guarantee that it will be accepted as completely adequate. The question can be found in Senate Hansard at page 1245, and it asks for clarification of a statement that I made on November 18, which can be found at page 1240 and which reads in part:

—over the next several years, expenditures on social development and social support by the government will increase to $33 billion.

Senator Marshall then asked for a breakdown of the number of years involved and the definitive departmental headings involved. The latter aspect took some time because a large number of departments were involved.

Rather than take the time to read the answer, which includes mathematical tables—it also took some time to collate them because they were furnished to us separately and I wanted them included so that anyone reading this information would not have to refer to supplementary documents—I ask that the answer be taken as read. The answer and the tables may then be studied, and that may lead to supplementary questions.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

In the document entitled The Government Expenditure Plan, Part I 1981-82 Estimates, tabled in the House of Commons on February 26, 1981 and the Senate on March 2, 1981, at pages 22 and 27, tables 3.5 and 3.7 outline the figures for the expenditure plans for the Social Affairs envelope and for the Justice and Legal envelope, respectively, in the years 1980-81 through 1983-84.

TABLE 3.5

The expenditure plan figures indicate that "over the next several years, expenditures on social development and social support by the government will increase to $33 billion," as I stated at page 1240 of Senate Hansard of November 18, 1980, in 1983-84 the expenditure plan for Social Affairs, in table 3.5, being $31,556 million, plus Justice and Legal, in table 3.7, being $1,620 million, for a total of $33,176 million.

In 1980-81, the expenditure plan for Social Affairs plus Justice and Legal totals $26,050 million.

In 1981-82, the expenditure plan for Social Affairs plus Justice and Legal totals $28,944 million.

To achieve a further breakdown of these figures, for 1983-84, the expenditure plan amounts are projected figures and therefore a further breakdown is not available at this time.

However, for the years 1980-81 and 1981-82, tables 3.6 and 3.8 give detailed breakdowns of the portions of the expenditure plans included in the main estimates for Social Affairs and for Justice and Legal, respectively.

Honourable senators, I also point out that in answer to the requests by Senator Marshall on November 19, 1980, as indicated in Debates of the Senate at page 1245, and by Senator Balfour on November 20, 1980, at pages 1252 and 1253, for clarification of my statement of November 18, 1980, at page 1240, concerning the details of the calculation to arrive at the differential of $40 billion between the cost of oil and gas to consumers under the National Energy Program and under the Conservative budget, the answer was given by Senator Perrault and can be found in the Debates of the Senate of July 10, 1981, at page 2778. I make that reference in case either Senator Balfour or Senator Marshall would like to check back to determine whether or not I am correct that that response answers the question they had asked earlier.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Austin, seconded by the Honourable Senator Goldenberg, for the second reading of the Bill S-11, entitled: "An Act to amend the Canada Elections Act".—(Honourable Senator Macquarrie).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with the permission of Senator Macquarrie, may this order stand until November 17, 1981?

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: That is quite agreeable. Order stands.

VIA RAIL CANADA INC.

MOTION TO INSTRUCT TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS COMMITTEE TO MAKE STUDY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Daniel Riley, pursuant to notice, moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications be instructed to inquire into and report upon the national rail passenger service provided to Canadians by VIA Rail Canada Inc. and, in particular, to examine

(a) the Federal Government's plans for reorganizing Canada's passenger train services announced by Transport Minister Jean-Luc Pepin on July 27, 1981;

(b) the changes in passenger train services effected by Order in Council P.C. 1981-2171, dated August 6, 1981, made pursuant to subsection 64(1) of the National Transportation Act; and

(c) the procedure followed by way of Order in Council P.C. 1981-2171 in varying the Canadian Transport Commission's Orders and Decisions respecting Canada's passenger train services.

He said: Honourable senators, it is not my intention at this time to elaborate in great detail upon the reasons for this motion. I think that most honourable senators are aware of its significance and its necessity. Nor shall I go into the structure of the establishment of the Senate, other than to say that, as we all know, the Senate was structured in order to give the then four regions of Canada sufficient representation in this house to protect the rights of the public in those regions. Since that time, with the coming into effect of Confederation with Newfoundland and, of course, with the addition of senators from the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, the number of senators has increased.

I only want to point out that Order in Council P.C. 1981-2171, dated August 6, 1981, was received by the public—and I refer particularly to the region of Canada which I represent as a senator, the maritime provinces—first with disbelief, then with resentment, and finally with growing outrage. Numerous are the representations being received by members of the other place and by us here in the Senate vigorously protesting the method used to implement, or intending to implement, the discontinuance and abandonment of certain rail passenger services.

Not only is the general public incensed—and, once again, I refer particularly to my region—but, in particular, so are thousands of senior citizens who neither wish nor can afford to use the air services as an alternative means of transportation. I would refer also to students, many of whom cannot afford the higher cost of air travel between their homes and the universities in the maritimes or to take advantage of travelling during their mid-term breaks, and also to those students in the lower grades who rely on rail passenger service during their mid-term breaks.

● (1510)

It is significant that the order in council in question was passed just a short time after the summer adjournment of Parliament, despite the fact that it is quite obvious, from its make-up and content, that it was carefully prepared and planned long before the adjournment. Passed pursuant to subsection 64(1) of the National Transportation Act, there is some question, in legal circles as to the validity of this order in council.

After serious consideration by the Railway Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission, most of the routes were confirmed or extended. These decisions were accepted by the public and resulted in the increased use of this means of transportation. We are now told that the losses incurred by VIA Rail Canada Inc. require the discontinuance and abandonment of many of these routes.

My concern lies more particularly with the Atlantic route. I know others are concerned with routes in eastern and western Canada, but I am particularly interested in the so-called "Atlantic run" from Halifax to Montreal. Since its establishment, this run has brought in increased revenues and has enjoyed increased passenger use.

It is quite obvious from the last figure I received that there may be some truth to the allegations of mismanagement by, or inefficiency of, senior officials of VIA Rail in not curtailing annual losses.

[Senator Riley.]

I would refer to the revenues for the month of September at the Saint John railway ticket office. In planning for its 1981-82 budget, that ticket office set a figure of $85,000 as of September 30, 1981. The actual sales amounted to $96,582. The goal was exceeded by $11,582. In percentage figures, there was an excess over the 1980 revenue for the same period of 37 per cent and the monthly goal was exceeded by 13 per cent.

This hardly indicates that VIA Rail is losing much money on the Atlantic run. In fact, it indicates increased passenger usage of this run from Halifax, resulting in increased revenues. In September 1980 the net revenue for sales from the Saint John ticket office was $70,484 compared to $96,582 in September 1981. This indicates that people are increasing their use of this service.

I would point out that the train which leaves Saint John station at 7.05 in the evening is usually fully occupied. As a matter of fact, Mr. Harry Bruce, in a recent article in Maclean's magazine, stated that the overall operation between Halifax and Montreal had an average occupancy rate of 75 per cent. Since the train is usually filled, it requires two sittings in the dining car. I am aware of this since I have used the service quite frequently. The train arrives in Montreal at 7 o'clock in the morning, giving passengers a full day in Montreal in order to conduct business. Returning to Saint John, passengers board the train at 6.30 in the evening and arrive at their destination at around 8 o'clock in the morning.

Restricting my comments to the problems of New Brunswick, as a senator representing that province, I should like to point out that Fredericton, the capital of the province of New Brunswick, will not have this service to Montreal. Saint John, the industrial centre of the maritime provinces is going to lose its service.

It is true that one can go to Moncton and pick up the Ocean Limited. By that route, passengers would lose five to six hours along the circuitous route to Montreal. Lord knows what the time schedules will be. The Ocean Limited out of Halifax is usually pretty fully occupied by passengers year round.

As set down by the Canadian Transport Commission, the "Ocean Limited" engine is allowed to haul only so many cars, perhaps 12 or 16. If the "Atlantic" run is abandoned, then the "Ocean Limited" will have to increase its car-carrying capacity, since the "Atlantic" run normally had the capacity to carry between 12 and 16 cars. To the "Ocean Limited" this would mean an extra run between Halifax and Montreal which, to me, seems ridiculous, having regard to the elimination of the convenience of the service to the people of not only Saint John, the industrial centre of the maritimes, but Fredericton, the capital of the province of New Brunswick. It would also affect passengers boarding at intermediate stops along the way. The town of McAdam will be killed since it relies almost completely on the passenger rail service.

● (1520)

I am not going to go into great detail at the moment, but I do think that this is an urgent matter and that it should be studied by the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications. If the Senate decides to refer this matter to that committee, then I think our speeches should be restricted to save time so that witnesses may be heard before that committee.

On motion of Senator Charbonneau, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, October 20, 1981, at 8 p.m.

CANADA-UNITED STATES INTER-PARLIAMENTARY GROUP

TWENTY-SECOND MEETING, HALIFAX, NOVA SCOTIA

MAY 22-26, 1981

REPORT OF THE CANADIAN DELEGATION

Delegations to the 1981 annual meeting of the Canada-United States Inter-parliamentary Group, held in Halifax, Nova Scotia, included Canadian Senators and M.P.s and Members of the US House of Representatives and the U.S. Senate. Proceedings began with an opening plenary, after which delegates dispersed into three Committees for discussions organized as follows:

Committee I —Trade and economics

Committee II —Energy

Committee III—Environment and fisheries

At the conclusion of the Committee discussions, the Group resumed plenary session for two multilateral questions and comments on the North American 'accord'.

The list of delegates was as follows:

The United States Delegation:

The Senate: Hon. Ted Stevens (Rep., Alaska), Co-Chairman
Hon. Edward Zorinsky (Dem., Nebraska)
Hon. James McClure (Rep., Idaho)
Hon. Mark Andrews (Rep., North Dakota)

The House of Representatives:

Hon. Dante B. Fascell (Dem., Florida),
Co-Chairman
Hon. Sam Gibbons (Dem., Florida)
Hon. James L. Oberstar (Dem., Minnesota)
Hon. Michael D. Barnes (Dem., Maryland)
Hon. Dennis E. Eckart (Dem., Ohio)
Hon. Larry Winn, Jr. (Rep., Kansas)
Hon. Bill Frenzel (Rep., Minnesota)
Hon. Donald J. Mitchell (Rep., New York)
Hon. David Martin (Rep., New York)
Hon. Robert Davis (Rep., Michigan)
Hon. James Scheurer (Dem., New York)

The Canadian Delegation:

The Senate: Hon. Hartland de M. Molson (Ind., Quebec)
Co-Chairman
Hon. Guy Charbonneau (P.C., Quebec)
Hon. Paul Lafond (Lib., Quebec)
Hon. Daniel Lang (Lib., Ontario)
Hon. Charles McElman (Lib., New Brunswick)
Hon. Duff Roblin, P.C. (P.C., Manitoba)

Hon. George van Roggen (Lib., British Columbia)

The House of Commons:

Mr. Ian Watson (Lib., Quebec) Co-Chairman
Hon. Walter Baker, P.C. (P.C., Ontario)
Mr. Herb Breau (Lib., New Brunswick)
Miss Coline Campbell (Lib., Nova Scotia)
Mr. Howard Crosby (P.C., Nova Scotia)
Mr. Ian Deans (NDP, Ontario)
Mr. Jim Fulton (NDP, British Columbia)
Mr. Fred McCain (P.C., New Brunswick)
Mr. Jack Murta (P.C., Manitoba)
Mr. Frank Oberle (P.C., British Columbia)
Hon. John Reid, P.C. (Lib.-Labour, Ontario)
Mr. John Thomson (P.C., Alberta)
Mr. Henri Tousignant (Lib., Quebec)
Mr. David Weatherhead (Lib., Ontario)
Hon. Michael Wilson P.C. (P.C., Ontario)

Opening Plenary

At the request of the American delegation, the opening plenary was devoted to the Canadian Constitutional situation. A Canadian Senator and an M.P. reviewed for the Americans the key elements of the problem from an historical perspective and from the point of view of more recent political developments. A number of U.S. participants asked questions and several Canadian delegates added comments. The Members of the Group then began discussions in the three separate Committees.

COMMITTEE I—TRADE AND ECONOMICS

AGENDA

1. Appropriate monetary and fiscal policies for current economic conditions in Canada and the United States.
2. Problems of the North American auto industry.
3. National preferential arrangements in Canada and the United States; 'Buy national' policies and legislation; trade and investment aspects of Canada's proposed National Energy Program, Canada's proposed new import policy; restrictions on foreign investment.
4. The tax treaty; border broadcasting issues including possible "mirror" legislation.

5. Exporter co-operation in grain sales.
6. Specific trade problems
 - (a) Canadian potato exports to Maine
 - (b) UPS
 - (c) Cross-border cement trade
 - (d) Canadian surcharge on U.S. tomato imports.

Appropriate monetary and fiscal policies

The discussions on the appropriate monetary and fiscal policies for the current economic conditions in Canada and the United States revealed some similarities of approach as well as certain differences. Topics discussed included the causes of the high inflation rates, reactions to President Reagan's economic policies, the efficacy of wage and price controls, the compatibility of increased military expenditures with social program cutbacks and the impact of the U.S. monetary policies and interest rates on Canada and on the Canadian exchange rate. In general, an underlying optimism was expressed by American delegates that the current situation was manageable and would show improvement due to the basic strength of the U.S. economy and the consensus of support behind the Reagan measures.

Introducing the subject, a Canadian delegate outlined the current inflationary situation. In Canada, the sudden surge in growth rates, of 8 percent in the fourth quarter of 1980 and from 4 to 6 percent in the first quarter of 1981, had resulted in a strong demand for credit which in turn had put upward pressure on interest rates. The rates, which now reached 19½ percent for prime rates and over 18 percent for mortgage rates, could go even higher, this spokesman predicted. Assessing the measures taken to fight the inflation, he was critical that there had been too great a reliance on monetarism coupled with an inadequate commitment to fiscal restraint in Canada. Pressure had been added by an overcrowding by governments in the financial markets and "somewhat erratic policy changes" in the United States had also caused problems for Canada.

In addition, inflationary pressures were being increased by higher wage settlements which, at 14 to 15 percent, were in excess of the current inflation rate. The prevalence of an inflationary psychology with its attendant doubts of the government's ability to control the inflation was also having an unfortunate impact. In major Canadian centres there had been an enormous 25 to 50 percent increase in housing prices in the year and food prices were moving ahead of the inflation rate.

This spokesman considered that prices and income controls were a real possibility in Canada as a political response to public pressure for some action. Another possible policy reaction could be a wholesale reliance on indexing such as was happening in South American countries. This he characterized as a "throwing in the towel" reaction, an admission by governments of inability to control inflation.

The approach to the problem of inflation by the American delegates, several of whom were members of the House Ways and Means Committee, was generally optimistic and nonpartisan. The first spokesman underlined the stronger-than-expected-position of the U.S. economy. He thought that even with an inflation rate of 11 to 12 percent, the U.S. economic problems were being overstated and he believed the Reagan economic policies would work. There was a broad consensus in the country for cuts in government expenditures. While the cuts in social programs (probably amounting to $9 billion) would be particularly difficult, this delegate predicted that Reagan's popular image would see him through. He acknowledged that the proposed tax cuts (up to $60 billion for 1982) could also cause difficulties by creating high demand in capital markets. In respect to unemployment he remarked that the fast rising fuel costs and the consequences of the baby boom had had a direct impact in the past decade on capital expenditures and he predicted that since the population is now levelling off, unemployment will begin to drop. By the year 2000 there could be an insufficient work force.

Another U.S. participant agreed that there was a consensus both in the country and in Congress supporting the Reagan program. The United States has been alarmed at the decline of its productivity and has had to make changes in order to stimulate the economy. The tax cuts were designed to encourage savings and investment although there was some concern that these cuts could put pressure on the monetarist lever attempting to control inflation.

In response to a Canadian query as to how the tax cuts would be implemented and how the funds thereby released could be enticed into savings, the American side outlined the President's "market" approach which was essentially to reduce gradually the high (70 percent) tax bracket to 50 percent believing this would go into investment or savings and not into stronger consumer demand. There were others in the United States, however, who advocated immediate tax reductions, as well as the elimination of the "tax shelter game" which this spokesman described as being not only costly and unproductive but the cause of bad economic decisions. There was also an advocacy for reducing the marriage "tax penalty" whereby married working couples are penalized about $3,000 to $4,000 a year. It was recognized that there could be problems in rebuilding capital in the United States where the savings rate was currently only one-half that in Canada. U.S. delegates predicted the budget bill when finally passed would include some incentives for savings—such measures as encouragements to purchase tax-exempt certificates issued by banks and credit unions which would pay interest at a rate of 70 percent of the U.S. bill rate; interest retirement funds schemes similar to the Canadian RRSP's; and the insuring of all savings accounts up to $100,000.

Referring to the earlier suggestion of the possible imposition of a wage and price control program in Canada, a U.S. participant commented that this was a crude set of instruments for inflation-fighting. In the United States, the post-control period had resulted in a big jump in inflation. What had happened in Canada? The Canadian spokesman replied that by the time the Canadian wage and price control program was instituted, the situation had already begun to improve although the control program may have hastened the process. Controls had resulted in inadequate investment and in inefficiencies in running businesses and he tended to view such controls as a crutch to allow the government to say they had acted. He observed that the Canadian federal deficit had deepened gradually from $3½ billion in 1975 to over $10 billion at present. The Canadian spokesman then inquired how the Reagan cutbacks in social programs will be accepted in the United States and how they could be reconciled with the simultaneous large increase in military expenditures.

On the subject of social programs cutbacks, some differences of opinion were evident on the U.S. side. Problems were foreseen in the dropping of the school lunch program, in the handling by the state legislatures of the reduced funding and in the possibility that the cuts might need to be very much deeper than predicted in order to reach the desired 1983 budget objectives. On the other hand, other delegates defended the cuts for social programs on the grounds that they involved a slowing down of the increase of spending rather than sudden, drastic slashes; that social-oriented organizations at the district level would be able to keep their programs alive while they regrouped; and that the dispersal of funds direct to state governments would result in needed spending economies.

Regarding the proposed increases in military expenditures, one U.S. participant suggested that such spending, while assisting unemployment, could put pressure on prices which would rise as a result of procurement programs and ensuing shortages. Another delegate added that he doubted that President Reagan would permit his budgetary program to be undermined by the military expenditure program. A third delegate explained the need for such expenditures on the basis that the United States had fallen behind in its military weaponry and in essential defence-based R & D.

A brief discussion of the huge cost increases in housing in both the United States and Canada drew observations from both sides on the distorting effect of the present generation's inflated expectations for large, luxurious housing on large suburban lots.

Several delegates challenged the earlier statement by a U.S. Congressman that by the year 2000 there would be a scarcity of labour. They asked how this could be so in the face of the growing trend to robotics which would produce more goods with less people and in the face of the ever-growing flow of illegal immigrants into American cities. The American spokesman held his ground asserting that demographic studies showed workers would be in short supply despite robotics. For one thing the United States was becoming increasingly a service-oriented rather than a manufacturing society. Furthermore, there was a maturing of the population and a drop-off in the birth rate.

A Canadian participant described the impact which the American inflationary, high-interest-rate situation had on Canada, citing in particular the immediate effect of U.S. interest rates. He explained that in order to encourage capital inflows, Canada was obliged to sustain higher short and long term interest rates than those of the United States. If Canada lowered its interest rates, there would be an immediate capital outflow resulting in a 75-cent dollar. Inflation rates would mount swiftly, although he acknowledged that Canadian exports would have an advantage in selling to the U.S. market. Canada, he concluded, was obliged to respond on a weekly basis to the Federal Reserve interest rate policies.

A U.S. delegate spokesman endorsed the floating exchange rate and said that it should involve no capacity to devalue. Already the 83-cent Canadian dollar was causing some concern but a 75-cent Canadian dollar, would cause consternation in the United States and would probably elicit U.S. protectionist moves, including an increase in Buy American measures of which he himself disapproved. He said Canada should not intervene to manipulate the exchange rate or to cause the dollar to drop but should allow a free float. In reply, the Canadian delegate pointed out that the Canadian dollar could drop further by itself. Another Canadian wondered what a free float really was. He said he took seriously the warning that competitive devaluation by Canada would cause problems in the United States, but he asserted that a widening inflation rate differential between the two countries could cause a sliding Canadian dollar. He asserted that the United States should not look only at the dollar levels but other economic factors as well.

The answer, concluded several U.S. delegates, was increased Canada-United States consultations in the area of monetary policies.

Problems in the North American auto industry

Noting the highly integrated structure of the Canadian and U.S. auto industry, the first Canadian spokesman pointed to the attitude of the Japanese auto industry which was reluctant to establish plants outside of Japan. On the other hand, Canada and U.S. car manufacturers made no commitment to source parts in North America and in fact seemed keen to source transmissions in Japan. This delegate emphasized the benefits of the Canada-U.S. auto pact to each country but wondered whether the pact would withstand the strains of the necessary massive reinvestment problems and technological changes. The large imbalance in parts trade with Canada was also noted. This delegate inquired about the recent agreement between the United States and Japan whereby the Japanese agreed to cut back car exports in the face of U.S. pressure.

The U.S. spokesman was strongly critical of the American car manufacturers. Both workers and executives have been overpaid; they have produced inferior, sloppy products; they have put their prices up much too high and now they are "reaping what they have sowed". With the current move to world-wide sourcing and world cars, he predicted only 4 or 5 major car manufacturers would exist world-wide within 10 years, with perhaps some electric cars. General Motors would survive, Ford might survive due to its overseas operations, but Chrysler would disappear or merge, another delegate added. Neither side expressed support for the governmental loan guarantees provided to Chrysler.

U.S. participants made it clear that the restraint agreement with Japan had been important in heading off much more drastic trade restrictive measures in Congress. While several delegates regretted even this departure from market discipline, they explained that the President needed Congressional support for his budget proposals. He will continue to have to resist increased protectionist pressures, it was predicted.

A mid-West Senator stated that in general the public is in favour of the Japanese small car imports and the only complaints in his district had been from the dealers, and even they were broadening their franchises. However, because of the Japanese non-tariff barrier restrictions in other areas, including against agricultural products, there was a certain support for the restraints.

A Canadian Senator said he was relieved there had been no stronger U.S. legislative action. Western Canada with its favourable trade balance with Japan disapproved of restrictions on Japanese car imports and did not want to expose Canada to Japanese retaliatory measures. However he considered that the Japanese should be non-discriminatory in their restraint so there would not be an unfairly heavy surge of cars into Canada. Another Canadian participant noted the psychological impact on purchasing patterns of the public's perception that U.S. and Canadian cars were not as good as Japanese cars.

Several U.S. delegates voiced concern that the Japanese, in the wake of the restraints agreement, will now unnecessarily upgrade their cars, putting on more value-added, increasing prices but exporting fewer cars. The public will continue to buy them and the Japanese will look as if they are doing something. A 7.7 per cent decline in Japanese imports into the United States is predicted for 1981.

In the discussion as to what could be done to revive the North American industry, some delegates noted the irresponsible approach of labour which was described as ranging from happy-go-lucky attitudes to outright vandalism on the assembly lines. Incentives were needed to correct this situation, and a Congressman said that the current U.S. tax bill would incorporate this idea.

The suggestion for increased labour participation in industry drew varying reactions with some delegates supporting the employee-stock ownership programs and incentive measures leading to voluntary wage restraints and productivity increases while other participants were dubious that such programs would measure up to expectations or would be viable except in high technology growth industries.

The Canadian spokesman also raised the problem of the competitive bidding for location of new plants between the two countries involving both state, provincial and federal governments. A U.S. delegate deplored this situation which he said, distorted the market and simply moved jobs from one place to another without counting the huge infrastructure costs of new schools, roads and services or the increased unemployment insurance required in the abandoned location. Congress could control the situation but lacked sufficient intestinal fortitude to do so.

National preferential arrangements

Three U.S. delegates began the discussions on this topic with strongly worded criticisms of what they perceived to be an escalation of Canadian preferential arrangements which restricted trade or investment and distorted the free workings of the market. Each said he was reflecting U.S. concerns on these issues.

Fundamentally differing approaches were evident in the two sides during the discussions with the U.S. delegation arguing on economic grounds for the principles of the free enterprise system and governmental non-intervention while the Canadian delegates frequently defended the Canadian position in terms of a commitment to equalization principles and to the protection of "have-not" areas of the country. In general, the U.S. delegates complained that Canadian preferences were not as transparent as those of the United States and that they involved too much Ministerial discretion or not enough "due process", situations which left the United States unsure of what the Canadian rules actually were.

Specifically the first U.S. spokesman expressed the United States' concern that Canadian regulations under the Foreign Investment Review Agency (FIRA) were becoming increasingly stringent and that the Canadian content requirement in government procurement was mounting, becoming a new and sophisticated non-tariff barrier of a type being imitated by such countries as Mexico and Brazil and resulting in further restrictions of trade. A second U.S. delegate said the United States was very concerned about the "basic price system" in Canada's proposed new import policy which would result in an aborting of regular anti-dumping procedure. Based solely on bureaucratic decisions as opposed to the normal quasi-judicial anti-dumping process, he said there was not enough "due process" in the procedure. Provisional duties could be imposed after as little as 90 days with no right of appeal. Other GATT partners were equally disturbed by the Canadian proposals.

A third U.S. delegate said the United States took a very serious view of the national preferential aspects of Canada's National Energy Program (NEP). In its approach to investment and procurement, Canada was implementing policies of national treatment and intervening directly in acquisitions, actions which amounted to nationalization. While there had been a recent positive modification of the policy providing for compensation for past exploration costs in the government's retroactive claim in companies' oil and gas rights on Canada lands, there was still the major problem of $15 billion in procurement which was being withheld from fair competitive bidding by U.S. traditional suppliers he said.

Replying to the three critics, a Canadian spokesman gave what he termed a philosophical rather than an economic defence of the Canadian position. With its small economy, Canada was vulnerable because 25 per cent of its GNP involved trade and 65 per cent of this trade was with the United States. Most sectors of its economy were dominated by U.S. investments. Moreover, there was in Canada support for the idea of equalization, in contrast to the more rigorous free market, non-interventionist approach of the United States.

From Canada's perspective, he countered, it was increasing U.S. protectionism which was worrying Canadians, particularly the proliferation of federal and state procurement restrictions. For example, New York was dealing with a potentially damaging new bill restricting foreign steel while the Buy America regulations now applied to the Surface Transportation Assistance Act meant that Canadian firms could only sell urban transit equipment to state or municipal authorities if they established plants within the United States. While he acknowledged Canada's procurement restrictions, this spokesman pointed out that a recent study had shown that 30 percent of purchases by the Canadian federal government were made in the United States and he doubted the U.S. government could match that.

In respect to the sale of urban mass transit vehicles to the United States, another Canadian member added that the Buy America regulations now required not only 50 percent U.S. content but that final assembly be done within the U.S.A. Canadian manufacturers of these products already start with about 75 percent U.S. content in the components of their products and the additional requirement to assemble in the United States means that the Canadian operation is eliminated. This is a case where Canada is unfairly and inadvertently hit by U.S. protectionist moves against European and other producers. Specialty steels regulations aimed primarily at the Japanese were another case in point. He asked how could such restrictions be made fairer as far as Canada was concerned. Several American delegates responded that the Buy America provisions applying to urban mass transit projects were indeed unfortunate and they themselves had lobbied and voted against this development which they viewed as a mistaken initiative by a fellow Congressman.

As for FIRA, the first Canadian spokesman continued, far from being a vicious watchdog, it has allowed 92 percent of all the American applications for new businesses as well as 89 percent of U.S. takeover applications. While he acknowledged the United States would have some cause for concern regarding additional restrictive measures proposed by the government, these appeared to be in limbo at the moment. He himself considered that while there had been possible defence for Canada's foreign direct investment restrictions vis-à-vis the strong U.S. economy, he wondered if they were needed any longer and certainly he doubted that new more stringent rules were required.

As for the NEP, the Canadian spokesman made the point that the program involved Canadianization of the oil and gas industry, not nationalization as had been mentioned earlier by the American Congressman. In fact, he continued there is a strong opinion in Canada in support of reducing the percentage of foreign ownership and control in this industry which until recently had been as high as 90 percent. While he understood that the program was bound to be perceived in the United States as discriminatory, this participant thought that the Canadian government would be well advised to proceed by suasion to encourage Canadian investors and purchasers to increase the Canadian share of the oil and gas sector, rather than by measures to discourage U.S. corporations or by intervening itself. In respect to the Buy Canada aspects of the NEP, he explained that the Energy Minister's latest modifications were designed to ensure that a "fair but competitive" opportunity was provided for Canadian companies to be considered as possible sources of the necessary components for Canada's energy megaprojects whose managers automatically tended to source their goods from U.S. firms. The change should ensure there would be no discrimination against non-Canadian suppliers.

As for the "basic price system" of the proposed Canadian import policy, it was likened by the Canadian participant to the U.S. trigger price mechanism for steel. This statement drew an immediate criticism of the U.S. mechanism from a Congressman who described it as costly and unnecessary, and predicted that it would be eliminated. Another Canadian delegate acknowledged that the Canadian proposed import legislation has been criticized as overly protectionist by some GATT trading partners, but he maintained that it was not contrary to the GATT code. Under the new proposals, Canadian authorities were seeking to speed up procedures dealing with injurious imports and the major change involved would be that no material injury need be shown before establishing basic prices against which dumping is assessed. This delegate agreed that there was not enough "due process" in the procedure in dealing with possible dumped imports. However he stated that the Canadian government was now taking a close second look at this proposal. As evidence he quoted a recent ministerial statement in committee which cautioned that "careful consideration will need to be given as to whether it is advisable to implement such a proposal". The proposal and similar schemes had been the subject of recent GATT discussions which had focused on whether an understanding should be reached to limit or eliminate altogether the use of all such measures. The Minister's statement recognized the danger that other trading partners might respond with similar protective mechanisms, a fact which had resulted in reconsideration of the policy.

On this point, two of the U.S. participants, both members of the House Ways and Means Committee said that they had been responsible for insisting that the United States remove from the table the proposal to legitimize the basic price system when Canada, the European Community and the United States had been discussing it at the GATT. Such a device would, in their view, only produce a "protectionist cabal" and lead to a lower standing of living for consumers.

A U.S. delegate also criticized the slowness of Canada's adherence to the GATT system of customs valuation procedures. Canada should not make any changes in bound tariffs he said and should move to the transactional value system as a basis for duty rather than the traditional Canadian system.

In response a Canadian spokesman said that because full adherence to the GATT agreement will require major changes in Canadian legislation and regulations, the responsible Minister had asked the opinion of the Tariff Board as to the suitability of proposed legislation as well as for an assessment of the impact of such legislation on Canadian industry. The Board had already reported and had generally accepted the draft legislation, an indication that Canada is moving forward on this matter.

A Canadian member stated that in understanding FIRA, the NEP and the import policy proposals, it was important that the Americans take into account the very worrying trade deficit of about $18 billion which Canada was running currently in manufactured products trade. Consequently, in respect to the sourcing of high technology goods under the NEP, all Canadian political parties agreed that it was necessary to give a little push to the companies involved to look beyond their traditional suppliers in the United States and to help broaden the Canadian industrial base in such products. As far as FIRA was concerned it was important to remember that the book value of U.S. controlled investment in Canada in 1977 was over $37 billion, whereas Canadian controlled investment in the United States amounted to $7 billion. While he was not in favour of the proposed new FIRA measures which would involve monitoring all foreign investment in the country, this delegate said there would be a public outcry in Canada if the present regulations were diminished.

A Congressman retorted that in his view FIRA regulations left would-be U.S. investors "uncertain and confused"; that they went far beyond the screening process; and that the high number of allowed applications did not include those applications which were not made or were withdrawn in face of a too-costly or too-time-consuming procedure. He urged Canadians not to prop up dying industries and gave the illustration of Massachusetts' textile factories which had moved to the sun belt but were now being supplanted, to Massachusetts' benefit, by an influx of highly skilled electronics industries. Several Canadian delegates raised the question of where textile, shoe or furniture plants or workers could go in Canada. Unlike the United States, there was no sun belt so there had to be some propping up. DREE assistance to Nova Scotia firms was given as an example. Another Canadian member pointed out that in terms of GATT concessions, Canada had already gone a long way and many Canadian industries were now calling for the sort of protection the proposed import policy was contemplating.

A Canadian delegate remarked that there were differing perceptions within Canada of the protectionist measures of FIRA, NEP and the proposed import policy, and internal discussions were currently going on. Certainly Western Canada was anti-protectionist and that region was going to become increasingly dominant as the centre of economic power was moving quickly westward. Further, anti-protectionist viewpoints were in evidence in a report of a committee of the Canadian Senate which had recommended free trade with the United States. This participant mentioned the recent modifications of the Bank Act in Canada which permitted the entry of foreign banks. He expressed the hope there would be no retaliatory U.S. moves to Canadian measures perceived as protectionist. This would only serve to nullify GATT and would have an enormous economic impact on Canada.

Another aspect of foreign direct investment in Canada was raised by a Canadian participant who described the move to global product mandating. In the post-GATT trading environment, small foreign-owned subsidiaries, originally established behind high tariff walls to produce for the Canadian domestic market, could no longer compete efficiently with lower cost imports. Current economic conditions called for cross-border plant rationalization by the U.S. multinationals, giving the subsidiary sole rights to specialize in a product from the R & D stage right through its marketing on world markets. As a recent study and existing examples have shown, such mandating results in longer, efficient, lower-cost production runs and benefits the U.S. multinational as well as the Canadian subsidiary.

U.S. delegates concluded the discussions on this topic on a strong free trade, non-interventionist note by commenting that measures and barriers such as Canada was using would only lead to more inflation and a lower standard of living. One Congressman referred to certain South American countries which had distorted their economies by propping up everything. Several Americans remarked that they had found it interesting that there was a strong emotional commitment by all the Canadian delegates on the Committee to the principle of equalization, of support for the less well-off regions of the country and of the necessity for some degree of governmental intervention.

The tax treaty and border broadcasting issues

A U.S. Senator reported to the Committee that just prior to his departure from Washington, Senator Percy, the Chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee had spoken to him concerning the Canada-U.S. tax treaty which required Senate approval for ratification. Senator Percy said he intended to bring the treaty before the Committee as soon as possible after the recess. A Congressman added that as the Administration was very anxious to have it passed, he foresaw no difficulties. A Canadian member of the Committee outlined the objectives of the treaty and the Canadian side expressed its approval of the U.S. intentions to expedite the matter in Congress.

A brief discussion on border broadcasting issues was opened by a Canadian participant who reviewed briefly the problems for Canada. He drew attention to the disproportionate size of the markets and the revenues generated on either side of the border. He expressed Canada's satisfaction that the earlier linkage of this issue with the deduction of convention expenses was no longer an irritant due to passage of U.S. legislation. He noted the powerful border broadcasting lobby in the United States which is not only seeking "mirror" legislation to prevent U.S. advertisers from making use of Canadian border TV stations to beam messages back to large U.S. border cities, but may seek to link their complaint to trade sanctions in other fields as well. While Canada could not legitimately complain of the "mirror" legislation, the spokesman urged that linkage should not extend to other areas. U.S. participants commented that the broadcasters were indeed a powerful and persistent lobby group and they tended to try to link issues. The "mirror" legislation might be the easiest way to "get the issue off the table", delegates concluded.

Exporter co-operation in grain sales

To a certain extent, discussions under this topic were a continuation of a one-day meeting on grain marketing held in Ottawa in July 1980 between delegations from the U.S. Congress and the Canadian Parliament under the auspices of the Canada-United States Inter-parliamentary Group. The Halifax discussions covered not only the question of exporter co-operation—short and long-term-demand outlook, the increased costs of production, the role of reserves, and the development of export markets—but also involved a philosophical dialogue, mainly within one delegation, as to whether the agricultural sector should not face the same non-intervention, free market disciplines which were advocated for the manufacturing sector.

Opening the discussions, a U.S. Senator urged greater co-operation between Canada and the United States in grain sales even though the two countries had quite different marketing systems. In the face of rising production costs, measures should be taken to raise prices. He mentioned an expanded grain reserve program by Canada as a possible mechanism as well as greater co-operation in developing export markets. A second U.S. Senator agreed that Canada, Australia and Argentina should establish large reserve stocks and not leave the United States as the only major stock-holder. In making the case for higher grain prices, this delegate outlined the current high production costs for agricultural products. The farmer was faced with inflation on all sides resulting in large debt loads and serious cash flow problems. He was the largest user of energy. Fertilizer, fuel and machinery prices had all risen sharply. Yet the net return on his investment was pitifully low at about 3 per cent. The U.S. delegate said that the Canadian and American people needed to be re-educated away from the "cheap food policy" of the past. Whereas the U.S. deficit on oil imports used to be about equal to its surplus on agricultural exports, now the current $80 billion oil deficit was more than double the almost $40 billion agricultural trade surplus. This delegate said he had been against the USSR embargo and suggested that the loan rates to farmers should have been increased instead and everyone would have benefited. New export markets should be developed. He supported the case for increased farm assistance by pointing to the large farm subsidies given by European governments which considered that their whole economy was the beneficiary. Moreover, both the Japanese and shipping ports such as Rotterdam were profiting from low-priced North American wheat by adding their own surcharges. Japan makes a profit of $21 a bushel on American wheat. The USSR, he maintained, was buying North American wheat at below the cost of production. There needed to be some price protection plans.

A Canadian delegate, speaking of the proposals made at the July 1980 meeting for a joint Canadian-American Wheat Export Co-ordinating Commission, reported that the responsible Canadian Minister was in general agreement with the thrust of the proposals which could become the basis for a working document. Of particular interest to Canada was the proposal for co-operation in developing markets and sharing the cost. Australia and Argentina would like to be included in any agreement reached, he said.

Speaking of the short-term outlook for prices this delegate predicted they could be somewhat depressed due to the likely build-up of stocks from the sizeable winter wheat sowings. It was particularly important for exporting countries to come to an agreement not to undercut each other's markets at such a time, he urged. This applied also to Argentina and Australia. However for the longer term, the demand outlook for the 1980s was very favourable and Canadian exports of $35 billion were predicted by 1985. A large grain sale was currently under negotiation with the Soviet Union.

It was at this point that proponents of non-intervention by governments in the workings of the market place challenged the arguments of those who were pressing for measures to bring about higher grain prices. One U.S. delegate, while acknowledging that an artificially cheap food policy was not good, asked why the free enterprise system should not work in the agricultural sector. Suggestions to raise grain prices through controlling production or supply sounded like a cartel to him, he said. Further, he was nervous of subsidizing farm production and the effect it might have on entrepreneurship. Commenting on the rising farm production costs he questioned the requirement for the enormously costly but under-utilized farm machinery which added so much to production costs.

A U.S. Senator emphasized the importance of the agricultural sector to the U.S. economy. Over 65 percent of production is exported; the farmers with their utilization of farm machinery are major consumers of steel; for every billion tons of wheat exported, 50,000 jobs are created off the farm in other sectors of the economy. The U.S. farm employs few workers and requires a high degree of mechanization. Despite agriculture's central role and rising production costs, prices remain too low.

A Canadian delegate said that when costs go up but prices do not, farmers have only one alternative, that is to produce more. He noted that even though the agricultural segment of the population in the two countries was very small, there had been remarkable increases in efficiency and quantity of production. Another Canadian answering the earlier question of why the free market mechanism did not produce an adequate price level in agriculture said it was excess grain supplies on the margin ("slop-over supply" an American delegate called it) which created the price fluctuations. He noted that the United States had been increasing its share of the world market while Canada's share had been static—probably its own fault, he said. In respect to production controls, they were probably not suitable to the U.S. system. In Canada, however, some control already existed in that the Wheat Board could forward only that amount which it could sell. Production controls meant market sharing and this could bring forth surprising amounts of grain from unexpected sources. In such cases, how could the price be controlled, this delegate asked.

Specific trade problems

a) Canadian potato exports to the United States

This topic had been originally suggested for discussion by a delegate from Maine who was subsequently unable to attend. However a Canadian delegate from the area most concerned explained the problems involved and the Canadian viewpoint. In potato trade Canada suffered from a major disadvantage—the fact that the United States with an earlier crop enjoyed a seasonal advantage, given the consumer preference for 'new' potatoes. The Maine/New Brunswick border was a particularly 'tender' spot, along the border. The U.S. producers are complaining that after the U.S. tariff rate quota for table potatoes is filled, Canadian seed potatoes come in under the larger seed quota but are eaten as table potatoes. The Canadian delegate maintained that Canadian seed potatoes are of a superior grade to their U.S. counterparts. It was noted that, by 1987, under the terms of the GATT Tokyo Round, quotas on potatoes would be phased out and the tariffs of the two countries would be harmonized. The Canadian delegate pointed out that due to the later growing season, other fruit and vegetable crops in Canada are just coming to maturity as the U.S. producers are anxious to get rid of the last of their crop, often at reduced prices. For this reason a special seasonal fruit and vegetable tariff is required to protect Canadian growers.

b) U.P.S. (United Parcel Service)

An American delegate explained that this large private parcel delivery company is having serious difficulties in providing prompt service to Canadian consignees because of procedures in Canadian Customs clearance which can delay shipments for up to three days instead of allowing same-day service which the company would like to offer. The problem appears to stem from the Canadian Customs regulations which require that before shipments can be cleared, a Customs broker acting with a power of attorney from the importer must submit the required entry form. In contrast, Canadian parcels entering the United States are granted immediate release by U.S. Customs with the proviso that an entry form be submitted later within a specified time period. The Canadian regulations were severely constraining the company's Canadian operations, the U.S. delegate said.

In reply the Canadian spokesman predicted that if the U.P.S. were able to obtain the Customs release for shipments within one day, it would soon be carrying 8,000 shipments a day into Canada.

However, until new legislation is passed, the power of attorney requirement for the Customs broker cannot be changed. The draft legislation includes administrative relief in this respect but it has been delayed for other reasons including a controversial mail-opening issue, which will have to be settled first. If the Act passes, it will open the private parcel market up for air carriers as well. However, a lengthy Committee study of this legislation was predicted. The spokesman undertook to make inquiries on the situation and to report back to the concerned U.S. delegate.

A remark by an American delegate on the value of encouraging competition in order to improve the postal service led to a brief discussion of the two countries' postal services and how the often-unreliable and lengthy service could be corrected.

c) Cross-border cement trade

The inability of a large U.S. cement firm to compete with a low-priced Canadian competitor crossing the border into his State was raised by a border-state Congressman. Although he thought that dumping was probably not involved, he wondered what was causing this situation. A request had been made to the U.S. authorities to reinstate the tariff on cement, he said.

A Canadian spokesman said that as Canada had duty-free entry for cement, the Canadian industry was not operating behind a protective tariff wall. In the free trade situation it appeared that the exchange rate, favourable for Canadian exports, was the important factor in the Canadian firm's ability to compete with the local U.S. firm. Delegates remarked on the degree of cross-border purchasing which exists both ways across the border. Currently the gas retail outlets on the Canadian side were doing a booming business but for years it has been the normal practice for Canadians to make shopping forays to nearby U.S. cities. Probably the Canadian cement company used U.S.-made trucks and perhaps the competing U.S. company should buy its rock for cement in Canada to increase its competitiveness, it was suggested.

d) Canadian surcharge on U.S. tomato imports

A U.S. delegate raised the issue of a new Canadian surcharge which was hitting Florida tomatoes and which would double the price to Canadians. This was a major trading barrier for U.S. growers. In reply a Canadian delegate said that the new charge, 15 percent up to 2½¢, was directed against Mexican tomatoes which were coming into Canada at extremely low prices and threatening to wipe out the Canadian hothouse tomato industry. The U.S. delegate said that U.S. growers too were threatened by the Mexican growers, but as a proponent of free trade he thought no country should support industries it cannot compete in, even food industries, although he recognized there was an emotional attachment here. Another Canadian spoke of the importance of protecting the Canadian fruit and vegetable industry. Already the tomato processing industry had been wiped out. Questioned as to whether he would agree to Taiwan wiping out the U.S. textile industry, the American delegate responded that it would mostly disappear with the United States retaining only the fibre industry. The Canadian side then asked whether the United States would let its shipbuilding industry decline, but U.S. participants admitted this was classed as a 'national security' industry. A Canadian member said this could apply to other products as well, even textiles if trouble with Taiwan developed. This delegate spoke of the social costs of not taking certain protective action.

Several members of the United States side reiterated their strong bias in favour of the free competitive workings of the market and the inadvisability of propping up weak industries. The American worker, they maintained, is not in favour of subsidizing the Chrysler worker at 2½ times his own salary, for example. They drew attention to the poor economic situation in the European Community which was constantly subsidizing inefficient industries and which was now running a huge trade deficit with the United States and other major Western trading nations.

COMMITTEE II—ENERGY

AGENDA

1. Impact of national energy programs

- (a) Impact of United States' deregulation policy on supply, pricing, coal conversion

- (b) Canada's proposed National Energy Program—policies on Canadianization and incentives; Canadian pricing policy for oil and gas

2. Bilateral energy co-operation

- (a) natural gas—prospects for additional Canadian supply and sales

- Alaska Highway Gas Pipeline situation

- LNG—future prospects

- (b) oil—transportation of Alaska oil

- (c) electricity questions

- (i) hydro

- (ii) nuclear

3. International oil question—IEA commitments, Persian Gulf supply; USSR and Eastern bloc position; North-South implications

Even though the agenda for Committee II was limited to energy questions, the time available was taken up fully with discussion of recent developments and bilateral problems in the energy field. There was insufficient time to consider international energy issues.

Impact of De-regulation in the United States

Noting that oil consumption in 1981 was running 7 per cent less than the previous year, and imports of oil were down by 20 per cent, United States speakers gave some credit to deregulation of oil prices and controls, including the advancing of the final stage by President Reagan on assuming office. The price of gasoline had gone up in January and February by 10 cents a gallon, but this increase represented in some part a reaction to reduced Iranian and Iraqi exports. However, with large inventories in the United States and abroad and demand remaining low, the market, in fact, caused some subsequent reduction in the price of gasoline in the spring. Inventories were continuing to grow and the Administration was also purchasing oil to add to the strategic reserve.

Then there was some difference of emphasis among United States participants with regard to future oil production. One delegate thought that within five years, the United States would no longer be vulnerable to OPEC action as a result of several developments: Mr. Anschutz's new discoveries in Wyoming in very deep new structures, good prospects in Alaska east of Prudhoe Bay and in states adjacent to Wyoming, and progress likely to be made in securing oil from oil shale. Other United States participants were more sceptical of the prospects for oil shale conversion, and one delegate doubted that production of synthetic fuels would exceed two million barrels a day by the year 2000, because of the very high costs involved.

While U.S. participants generally supported de-regulation, or as a minimum, were prepared to acquiesce in it, there was a feeling that future improvements in domestic oil production would to some degree affect factors other than price: more drilling rigs available because of the Canadian National Energy Program; increased federal leasing of lands; the exemption from the windfall profits tax of synthetic fuels and of oil produced from new North Slope drilling; and some imaginative new drilling projects, a couple of which had produced encouraging results. In the field of synthetic conversion, the United States side acknowledged that there was a need for government-financed enticements, including direct federal investment.

On windfall profits, it was indicated that large United States oil companies had not been unhappy to see their profits limited. The multinationals had profitable distribution systems which were still bringing significant revenue. These were being amplified by the condemnation prices received for the takeover facilities abroad. As a result, there was no pressure from industry for relief from the windfall profits tax.

There was evidence of different party positions on the principle of de-regulation. A Democrat stated that a majority of his party remained opposed to decontrol. But he acknowledged that his party was on the defensive and there was no question of trying to turn the clock back. All U.S. participants were agreed that natural gas de-regulation would not be speeded up. Current plans called for that process to be completed by 1985, but the rate of inflation and prices cited in the authorizing legislation were being overtaken by events. As a result, Congress would, in due course, have to make a further determination in this matter. The Reagan Administration was unlikely to move to de-regulate faster until after the 1982 election, in part because the Democratic party retained the power in the House to block action, and in part because the Administration did not want to be vulnerable in the 1982 election to the charge that it was responsible for raising the price of natural gas. There was, in fact, no political pressure to act so as to raise the price of natural gas. Income from gas was currently not subject to the windfall profits tax, and the pipeline transmission companies shared the interest of the consumer in keeping prices down.

The prevailing view among U.S. participants was that the gas bubble which now existed in the United States was not easily explained, but had not been much affected by the movement toward de-regulation. Its existence was, in fact, exerting some downward pressure on the price of natural gas.

One United States participant expressed concern about the price impact of competitive bidding for offshore leases. Such leases were now costing industry $6 billion a year. These expenses were being treated as a budgeted item and would inevitably be reflected in the price of oil produced.

A Canadian participant expressed a personal worry about the lack of action by the Administration on programs to reduce United States dependence on foreign supply, in particular through the development of synthetic fuels. It was acknowledged from this perspective that Canada's success in developing oil sands and heavy oil deposits was superior to that of the United States.

Canada's National Energy Program

The Canadian spokesman asked the U.S. participants to take account of several special factors relating to energy policy:

(a) Canada faces a revenue-sharing problem, since almost all hydrocarbon production is concentrated in one province and the province's own natural resources. Under the revenue-sharing arrangement which has prevailed in recent years, Alberta gains 45 per cent of the price of a barrel of oil, while the federal government receives only 10 per cent. If the price were raised without a new agreement on revenue sharing, the discrepancy would be further magnified.

(b) About 70 per cent of oil and gas production in Canada is controlled by foreign-owned companies. Energy is the dynamic sector of the economy and most likely to grow.

(c) Canada is in the overall a net exporter of energy.

(d) Alberta's production of converted oil was declining and might fall to 100,000 barrels a day by the year 2,000, and perhaps earlier.

Alberta and the federal government had failed to reach a new agreement on oil prices. This stand-off had tragic consequences, with the federal government forced to import more oil to compensate for production cut-backs by Alberta and with major oil sands and heavy oil projects delayed. As a result, Canada was actually losing ground in the effort to achieve self-sufficiency in oil production. In spite of some encouraging prospects, frontier oil from the North or from off the East Coast was unlikely before the end of the decade.

Nor was it possible to hold out early hope for a resolution of the pricing dispute with Alberta. Alberta believed that the OPEC price represented a true world price and considered that it had already subsidized Canadian consumers in the amount of some thirty billion dollars. Moreover, Ontario would derive more revenue from its new oil tax from a gallon of gasoline sold at the pump than Alberta did. Although Alberta had been ready to accept 75 per cent of the world price in the last negotiations, the government claimed it was no longer bound by its offer. Much would depend on the outcome of provincial court challenges to some new taxes levied in the federal budget last autumn.

Several Canadian speakers asked the U.S. participants to think how they would feel if the level of foreign ownership in the United States was as high as it was in Canada. Canada was not opposed to foreign ownership in other areas; it has just opened the banking system to foreign competition and FIRA approved most applications by foreign firms. But the government considered it important to set a target of 50 per cent foreign control in the oil and gas industry by 1990, and had adopted some specific programs to promote this objective.

U.S. speakers did show understanding of the underlying Canadian concern and acknowledged that there was increasing worry in the United States regarding acquisitions by certain foreign nationals. However, they were also worried about the general thrust of Canadian policy, fearing that it could lead to pressure for reciprocal action in the United States. In the case of the Mineral Leasing Act of 1920, the conditions for reciprocal treatment were already spelled out in law. More serious, however, was the risk of pressure for minor legislation in other areas in this broad field, and in other areas ranging from real estate development through new mining ventures to fisheries regulations.

The basic Canadian argument regarding ownership was challenged by one Canadian participant, who claimed that ownership was of little importance in an industry which was totally regulated in Canada and where the rate of return to some foreign-owned companies had been very low. Other Canadians reacted by warning U.S. participants that the policy of Canadianization had strong support in most regions of the country, and noted as evidence for this opinion that the expressed intent of the Clark Conservative government to sell off Petro-Canada had cost numerous votes in the 1980 election.

A United States spokesman reviewed the U.S. objections to the National Energy Program in familiar terms, objecting to the violation of the OECD declaration on national treatment, the maintenance of an unfair competitive advantage through the artificially low price of oil and the actual retreat from the Summit commitment to seek maximum self-sufficiency.

Specifically in terms of policies under the National Energy Program, the principal U.S. objection was to the provision for a back-in by Petro-Canada to successful discoveries in the Canada lands. While it was appreciated that the principle of compensation had been accepted by the Canadian government in its recent amendments, objections were raised, first, that the federal government had no obligation to share the cost of unsuccessful exploration, secondly that the right to back-in remained retroactive, and thirdly, that the federal government might in cases of significant discovery acquire a large equity interest for modest compensation.

By contrast, the issue relating tax incentives to the extent of Canadian ownership did not arouse nearly as much objection. The principal complaint was that earlier discoveries under incentive programs introduced in the mid-1970's to encourage drilling in Canada might now be subject retroactively to a federal back-in, on terms different from those accepted when the exploration program was initiated.

Discussion of provisions relating to the purchase of goods and services, as clarified in the Minister's statement of May 14, was opened by a Canadian participant. He pointed out that all parties were agreed on regulation to ensure that Canadian manufacturers and suppliers had a fair competitive opportunity to bid, especially in areas which would require new technology to cope with northern conditions and ice-infested waters. The U.S. participants seemed to be satisfied that the Minister's clarification will not exclude them or place them at a disadvantage in this important $450,000,000 market in Canada.

U.S. participants listened carefully to Canadian accounts of special features affecting policy development in Canada. They did not raise objections to the Petro-Canada acquisition of Petrofina. They did, however, warn Canadians that they expected U.S. companies would be more careful about investing in Canada in future. And they encouraged the Canadian authorities to move cautiously to avoid generating pressures for reciprocal action by the United States.

Natural Gas and LNG

A Canadian spokesman reported that the supply situation in Canada with regard to natural gas would be clarified when the National Energy Board completed its current review. The expectation was for an exportable surplus to remain for one or two decades, and there were several applications for export permits pending. When frontier oil and gas was connected to the distribution system, Canada might agree to longer-term contracts than it now did.

Price was discussed. It was noted that applying the BTU equivalent for oil would lead to a price of about $6 a thousand cubic feet for natural gas, whereas the current price was $4.94. Even at this price, demand in the United States fell to 50 per cent of permitted volumes in 1980, and had risen only to 70 per cent in 1981. In future, the preferred market for Canadian gas was likely to be the mid-Western states and perhaps the north-Eastern states. There were complaints by some United States participants that Canada should charge the cost of production for natural gas, but other American participants asked why Canada should subsidize U.S. consumers.

In a discussion on the export price of gas, U.S. participants were surprised to learn that the U.S. side was resisting efforts by Canada to vary the price charged according to demand in regional markets in the United States. It was agreed to seek more information on this situation.

An American participant wondered whether the gas bubble in the United States was slowing down the conversion of power companies to coal. He commented that the volume and availability of Canadian gas would also influence the debate on coal conversion.

A Canadian spokesman described briefly the principal projects for moving northern natural gas by reinforced tankers or barges to southern markets. The most advanced proposal involved moving liquefied natural gas (LNG) down the east coast of Canada by ship. Although one or two ports in Eastern Canada were being considered for overland transmission by pipeline to Canadian markets and on to the United States, the alternative of shipping LNG to Western Europe was also being considered.

The United States had negotiated a right of first refusal on any northern LNG available from this project which was available for export. It was acknowledged that the price for this gas would be high (a price of $7.00 a thousand cubic feet was mentioned), and if sold in the United States, the price would have to be blended with domestic supplies. A U.S. participant thought that it would be in the interest of the West to see this LNG shipped to Europe, since it would help to reduce Europe's dependence on OPEC oil.

In the brief discussion of a more remote project for shipping Canadian northern LNG to Japan, it was noted that the United States might also be receiving LNG from Indonesia. Rather than paying the cost of LNG tankers travelling both ways across the Pacific, it was suggested that the alternative of Indonesian LNG going to Japan and Canadian LNG going to the Western United States should be examined.

Alaska Highway Gas Pipeline

A United States spokesman reported on the agreement reached among concerned companies on a package of proposals for the Alaska portion of the pipeline. A total of $30 billion needs to be raised, $21 billion for the pipeline, $6 billion for the conditioning plant and $3 billion as a contingency pool. $7.5 billion is in the form of equity and already committed, 30 per cent by the producing companies and 70 per cent by the transmitting companies. The pipeline should carry sufficient gas to displace 400,000 barrels of oil daily and could be in operation by 1986. All prices have been calculated in terms of 1986 dollars, with the gas to be delivered at a cost of between $11 and $13 a thousand cubic feet to the "lower 48". This price would be higher than conventional gas and would have to be rolled in.

The success of the proposal would depend initially on the response of the financial community. The proposal assumed a number of legislative waivers from requirements of U.S. federal law. While the spokesman expected some grumbling from the financial community and possibly an attempt to secure a federal financial guarantee which would not be forthcoming, he expected the first funds to fall in line by the early autumn. The critical threshold was the first $5 billion.

Several waivers were required and they would probably be presented jointly to the Congress by the President. They included permitting (1) the producing companies to own equity in the pipeline, and (2) recovery of the cost of gas conditioning from the consumer. While U.S. participants anticipated resistance in the Congress to these waivers, they expected to secure Congressional approval. The principal argument would be that the Prudhoe Bay gas pool represented a unique situation because of the distance from the market, and the fact that the pipeline was not a common carrier in the conventional sense of the word. Opponents could not delay Congressional consideration. However, such consideration would not begin until the financial community had found the necessary funds.

A question was asked regarding the reluctance of the provincial government of British Columbia to give a formal undertaking not to tax the construction of the pipeline. Canadian participants acknowledged the problem but assured the Americans that the federal government would do whatever was necessary to protect the pipeline from B.C. action should this be necessary.

Canadian participants wondered, in the event of an earlier completion and certification of the Canadian section of the line, whether payment to investors would begin before the gas started to flow. United States participants observed that this would require legislation, and implied that this would not be forthcoming. The possibility of pre-delivery of Alberta gas in this case was raised, paid for through subsequent swapping of Alaskan gas. While the idea was not rejected, past difficulties were referred to.

The U.S. Senators on the Committee reported that they had interceded with the White House, following the election of President Reagan, to argue for an exception to be made and for the Federal Inspector, Jack Rhett, to be retained in office. They thought that Mr. Rhett would remain in office until final approval and the beginning of construction. At that stage, they suggested that different skills would be required and that perhaps more than one person might be appointed in Mr. Rhett's place.

Transportation of Alaskan Oil

A Canadian participant summarized the current state of play in regard to the application of the two major contenders for shipping the residual Alaska oil which is now being trans-shipped across Panama to the Gulf of Mexico at some additional cost. While recognizing that the Northern Tier application was on a "fast track" as a result of President Carter's approval and therefore in a priority position, he wondered whether it was the best choice for the United States. The Northern Tier pipeline would require, in addition to the Alaskan surplus, some 500,000 barrels per day of imported oil from overseas, in order to be viable. From this perspective the Transmountain proposal looked more suitable since it was much less costly and required only about 300,000 barrels per day, which was approximately the current surplus of Alaska oil. From Canada's perspective, there was an additional environmental benefit, in that the pipeline would follow the shoreline of Puget Sound and could pick up the four U.S. Puget Sound refineries, reducing tanker traffic in those sensitive waters.

United States participants questioned this analysis. They were all agreed that, should the state of Washington approve the Northern Tier application, that pipeline would probably be built. They acknowledged the cogency of the Transmountain case, but pointed to the political power of the landlocked northern tier refineries, some of which are owned by farmer-owned co-operatives. To Canadian comments that adequate arrangements have been made to supply these refineries, they replied that the refineries are seeking diversified sources, and could only be reassured with feedstock guaranteed even in times of international shortage. Canadian participants pointed out in rebuttal that, should international developments cause some curtailment of offshore shipments, the land-locked refineries would be no less vulnerable if they were being supplied through the Northern Tier line than under the present swap arrangements.

The U.S. participants recognized that should the Northern Tier pipeline be built, the through-put would exceed the needs of the landlocked great plains refineries. They assumed that, in consequence, the Northern Tier pipeline might be extended as far east as Minneapolis.

The general impression conveyed by the U.S. side was that the political pressures generated by the Northern Tier promoters, supplemented by manufacturers of pipe and by the northern tier refineries, were such that the Northern Tier pipeline would be built, in spite of the excessive volume of oil which it would deliver and need and the higher cost involved. Only if supply from Canada could, in some way, be assured might this pressure be contained.

Electricity Exchanges

A United States participant from a region which buys substantial quantities of electricity from Canada voiced concern that the price is not calculated on the basis of the cost of production. A Canadian spokesman explained the criteria established by the National Energy Board for establishing price. Other Americans argued that from the United States perspective, the major problem is the lack of an assured price over time to permit long-term planning by U.S. utilities.

A Canadian participant claimed that it was in the national interest to export energy which was available in good supply. There was, in fact, competition among Canadian utilities for the U.S. market. He noted that British Columbia would soon have a source of cheap power in the form of a large volume of poor-quality coal which would have to be removed to expose fording coal for export to Japan and which could only be burned economically in situ.

There was some discussion over the benefit to Canada and the United States of building nuclear plants in Canada near the border with production dedicated to the United States. A Canadian advocate of this approach suggested that it might be necessary to provide assurances of an uninterrupted supply and a predictable price through a treaty between the two countries. Another Canadian participant strongly questioned whether Canadian provinces would accept federal involvement in this area of provincial jurisdiction. For his part, he was satisfied that competition among provincial utilities would assure U.S. purchasers a reliable supply.

COMMITTEE III—ENVIRONMENT AND FISHERIES

AGENDA

1. East coast fisheries and boundary issues
2. Water quality and toxic waste problems
 - (a) Great Lakes water pollution clean-up programs
 - (b) Toxic waste in the Niagara River including the Love Canal
 - (c) Problems facing authorities in the regulation and control of dumping sites for toxic wastes; transborder disposal siting questions
3. Air quality
 - (a) Impact of coal combustion on transboundary air pollution, especially acid rain
 - (b) Negotiation of a bilateral air quality agreement
4. Transborder environmental issues
 - (a) Garrison Diversion Unit
 - (b) Eastport Oil Refinery
 - (c) Poplar River
 - (d) Skagit Valley
 - (e) The closing of border crossing points—Quetico Park
5. Prospects for the Law of the Sea Treaty.

East Coast boundaries and fisheries

The Canadian side opened the discussion by reviewing in capsule form the years of negotiation leading to an agreement with the Carter Administration on East Coast boundaries and fisheries, the sending of the Treaty to the Senate for ratification, the failure of the Senate to ratify. Note was made of the decision of the Reagan Administration to withdraw the Treaty from Senate consideration, in order to pursue the matter as two separate questions: (1) boundaries, which would be referred to a third party; and (2) management of fish stocks. The U.S. delegation was informed that Canada had yet to decide upon its reaction to the idea of third party arbitration, but that a decision would be forthcoming in two to four weeks.

The Canadian side drew attention to the fact that the interim fisheries management arrangement had ceased to be applied over the whole range of stocks for the past two seasons, entailing some danger to the fishery. The Canadian position was stated as being that, with the failure of the United States to ratify the Treaty, there was no point in continuing management on one side if there was no management on the other—since the fish do not respect international boundaries.

The Canadian delegation asserted that the Agreement was well balanced and that both sides lost and gained. Canadian fishermen were circumscribed in their exploitation of scallops, squid, groundfish and lobster. It took considerable effort to persuade Canadian fishermen to accept these restrictions in return for a better managed fishery and, ultimately, higher yields. The failure of the United States to ratify the Treaty had meant that the offsetting benefits promised Canadian fishermen do not apply, resulting in great disappointment and massive frustration. It seems a shame, the spokesperson argued, to compromise the long-term viability of the entire fishery and to jeopardize the good relations between the two countries for the sake, in reality of one scallop bed (presently located off Flemish Cap). Scallop beds move, and scallops are even now being over-fished.

The U.S. spokesperson, in reply, expressed the great concern of American fishermen that the Canadians had received "too good a deal". The position of the United States government is that the boundary issue should first be settled because management issues are subordinate to boundary concerns. The United States believes that we should first learn in which countries fishing zone resources are located before deciding on how they should be managed. The spokesperson noted, with respect to who gained and who lost, that the U.S. fishermen would be forced to reduce their scallop take by 35 percent while Canada only suffered a 17 percent reduction, and that Canada could receive up to 73 percent of the scallop take on Georges Bank and never less than 50 percent. This, in the spokesperson's words, represents simply "too great a concession".

Nonetheless, the U.S. side indicated that they share with Canadians disappointment at the collapse of the agreement, and expressed the view that the best way to get back on track was to pursue the Reagan Administration's approach of first settling the boundary issues, while at the same time undertaking discussions with a view to developing an interim management arrangement. The spokesperson noted that the United States had adopted a number of steps to indicate their good intent, in a concrete fashion, such as instructing the U.S. Coast Guard not to enforce the 200-mile limit in disputed territory. The spokesperson concluded by saying: "Our fishermen feel, as yours do, that too much was given to the other side".

The Canadian side, in reply, disputed the statistics cited in the United States opening statement. It was claimed that Canadian fishermen historically accounted for 90 percent of the scallop take, and the Treaty reduced this to a maximum of 73 percent. It was also claimed that the Treaty reduced the historical percentage of the groundfish take accessible to Canadians. It was important, said a Canadian speaker, to decide whether the valid starting point for a statistical base should be founded on the last five years (when over-fishing had become a problem), or on the patterns established over the last 100 years.

In scallops, the U.S. catch had recently moved from 10 percent of the total, to 50 percent, while at the same time Canadian fishermen had become heavily regulated by their own government as to the size of the take. It was noted that licences are extremely hard to come by in Canada.

The Americans asked what the Canadians considered to be the maximum sustainable yield, and asked if both nations agreed on statistics with respect to maximum sustainable yield and share of take for scallops, haddock, halibut, redfish and other species.

The Canadian side replied that there probably was not complete agreement on statistics respecting share of take because each country was operating from a different set of premises with Canada looking at a different and longer time frame than the United States. As to the sustainable yield, the Canadian delegation did not have the figures on hand, but said they are available. The point, the Canadian side said, was that Canada had established quotas, and that the quotas accorded with both ICNAF and NAFO international quotas—quotas which, it was asserted, the United States is not respecting. While Canada enforces restrictions on her own fishermen, the U.S. effort has been growing, for the reason that the price has increased four to five-fold over the past 15 years, a Canadian speaker said. There is now some evidence that the stocks are decreasing.

A member of the American delegation confirmed that the period of time on which the statistics relating to the catch are based was in dispute, with Canada insisting on an historical base while the United States emphasized recent developments, and that there was danger that the sustainable yield concept would be lost by virtue of this argument. The question of the scallop fisheries, the Americans said, was the key. U.S. fishermen claim, the spokesperson said, that Canada subsidizes its scallop fishermen; has illegally imposed laws on U.S. territory, and that Canadian fishermen have moved into areas they have never before fished.

The Canadian side flatly denied that Canadian fishermen have moved into new areas, while admitting that there were subsidies of a sort to Canadian fishermen. A Canadian speaker noted that subsidies are simply a reflection of the fact that the fishery is much more important to Canada's GNP than it is to the United States'. Fifteen to twenty percent of the gross provincial product of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, for example, is fisheries-related it was argued. With respect to Canada enforcing its laws on U.S. territory, the Canadian side noted that the boundaries were in dispute. However, the area in dispute was fairly limited, and was related to Georges Bank. Canada has preferred to attempt to manage the resources, dispute notwithstanding, in the belief, that since scallop beds move, location is less important than the idea of the total catch and the percentage of that catch allocated to the fishermen of each nation. Despite the disadvantages, Canada has preferred to manage a resource "that dies periodically", and has actually reduced its scallop fleet on Georges Bank.

The Canadian side re-emphasized that Canadian fishermen had lost in the area of herring fishery; that Canadian fishermen had previously been commissioned by the United States to supply the U.S. herring industry, and would have lost that right, as well as others, under the Treaty; that Canada has given up some rights on squid, reduced its lobster catch and given up rights to some other stocks. Despite the demise of the Treaty permitting Canada to claim higher stocks, Canada continues to manage the fishery, a speaker said. Nonetheless, it was noted, the Canadian government is experiencing increasing pressure from East Coast fishermen who, seeing U.S. counterparts increasing their efforts, are becoming increasingly restive under Canadian quota restrictions. They are asking why they should be restricted in their take if U.S. fishermen are not.

A Canadian delegate from the West Coast suggested that the failure to ratify the Treaty could have a terribly adverse affect on the prospects for a treaty on the West Coast. Canadian fishermen there, he said, are frightened of getting into a process wherein Canada would make concessions only to have the United States abrogate the agreement. For example, Canada is already moving out of the West Coast halibut fishery. In light of the East Coast experience, can our negotiators now persuade Canadian fishermen to maintain that consideration and contemplate others, he asked.

The speaker also noted that if it took too long to reach agreements on both coasts, there would be nothing left for anyone to fish.

The U.S. side asked if there were any prospects of negotiating an interim management agreement while the boundary issue was being settled. The Canadians said that it would probably be wise, but there was no longer any assurance that Canadian fishermen could be persuaded to want one.

Another Canadian delegate suggested that focussing on the boundary issue could ultimately produce a fish war and that the management approach avoided boundary questions.

In an exchange on the boundary question itself, the Canadian side said Canada advocated an equidistant line, but in that regard the starting point for the line was in dispute. Is Machias Island Canadian or American? On the other hand, the Canadian side claimed the United States was arguing that boundaries should follow value, and suggested that Senator Pell's plan involved a zigzag line which took into account a single scallop bed.

The Canadian side warned that if the boundary agreement was settled prior to the management issues, and that if Canada won the boundary decision, there could be a reduced chance of the United States gaining concessions on the management side. A Canadian delegate said that the current situation had "dismayed" Canadians, and that Canadians have re-learned "something we knew but forgot—your (U.S.) system gives you two bites at the apple. This has resulted in some bitterness, and if we (Canada) have to re-negotiate, we are now re-educated and will quite likely adopt a different approach", he concluded.

The Garrison Diversion

The Canadian side represented the Garrison diversion as being a project for providing additional water for use in irrigation in North Dakota through the transfer of water from the Missouri system into the Hudson Bay watershed. Canadian concern about the scheme, it was explained, centred on the possibility of the transfer of foreign biota into Canadian waters with potential dangers to native species and consequential damage to the freshwater fishery in Canada.

Reference was made to the ruling of the U.S. Federal District Court on May 6 (Audubon Society vs. Department of the Interior) that no construction could proceed on the Garrison project until a new environmental impact statement had been prepared and Congress had re-authorized the plan. The Canadian side suggested that the decision seemed to leave the project in limbo and asked the American side for its impressions of the significance of the court decision.

In concluding the initial statement, the Canadian spokesperson emphasized that Canada had no objection to North Dakota making provision for irrigation and other demands on water supply so long as plans did not affect the Hudson's Bay watershed. It was noted that suggestions had been advanced for modifications to the project, such as scaling it down, which would accomplish this purpose and the hope was expressed that the suggestions could be pursued.

The American side drew to the attention of the Committee that the Governor of North Dakota and the Premier of Manitoba were meeting to attempt to achieve some resolution of the problem.

The May 6 court decision was classified by the American speaker as "a piece of nonsense". The implications of the decision were that every major project undertaken by the United States would have to be re-examined by each succeeding Congress—a patently unworkable prospect. Confidence was expressed that the decision would be reversed on appeal.

The problem, from the perspective of the American side, was that discussions were not taking place in a reasonable and calm atmosphere. Canadians, it was claimed, had been misguided by misinformation supplied by "professional trouble-makers" and U.S. interests opposed to the project. Garrison is not just an irrigation project. There are four or five cities in North Dakota which simply cannot survive without it. Some cities in North Dakota are now having to consider using tertiary sewage output as water supply. Future industrial growth is dependent upon improvements. The two major reasons for the project are, the spokesperson said:

- 1) to overcome chronic water supply shortages for both agricultural areas and cities; and
- 2) to improve water fowl stocks.

The project tends to be described largely in terms of its irrigation aspects because idiosyncracies in U.S. legislation governing the funding of the project make it necessary to talk in such terms. All of these considerations have been obscured by "a well-oiled propaganda machine".

The American spokesperson went on to say that the water to be used in the Garrison project comes from the Rocky Mountain trout streams of Montana and that it is better water than is now to be found in the Souris and the Red. As for biota transfer between the two systems, it has been going on for millennia, occurring "every time a duck moves".

The State of North Dakota, it was advanced, was also, at one time, worried about the implications of the project. The result was that the State began funding studies of the implications, setting up test areas, and now has the benefit of twenty-five years accumulated research and experience. The result is that the State is convinced that there will be no harmful side effects—a conclusion which the technical report of the I.J.C. supports, the speaker said.

Moreover, the U.S. side went on, the next stage of the project will not involve transfer of water into the Hudson's Bay watershed. Any irrigation will drain back into the Missouri system. The plan provides for a period of three to four years before the final stage of the project, which would drain into the Red and Souris, gets under way during which time Canadians and Americans can examine the results of the completed portions of the project. If there are no problems the project can then carry on to completion. There are eight or nine years grace before the Hudson's Bay watershed is affected. "Remember", the spokesperson said, "this water is to supply our own cities. Why would we poison our own people? Remember also that the Souris flows through the United States".

Concluding, the spokesperson said that at this point the United States only wished to proceed with those parts of the project where the return flow would stay in the United States but that in candour the most important part of the project was that which involved use of the Hudson's Bay watershed. Canadians are protected in that event by an international treaty of 1909 which prohibits the degradation of water quality to a point where it may be injurious when it flows across borders.

In reply, the Canadian side reiterated that it was hoped that the benefits of the project could be derived in significant measure without the implication of Canadian waters. Fears were expressed that so much money had already been spent on Garrison and so much projected that if it advanced any further towards completion it would become impossible to stop even if there were adverse findings. It would become "a self-fulfilling prophecy".

The American side stated that the cost benefit ratio for the project was very good and invited Canadian experts to study the effects of the Oaks area (the next stage) over the next four or five years and to examine existing reservoirs—"inspect them for dread disease". It was acknowledged that "propaganda" had convinced a majority of Manitobans that there would be deterioration of water quality and asserted that it was a "good faith effort" on the part of the United States to build the project in sections—concentrating first on those which would drain back into the United States—and to invite Canadians to inspect the results. Confidence was expressed that examination would show that no problem existed. Important measures (such as installing fish screens and providing for sand filtration and sewage treatment) have been adopted to mitigate any possible adverse effects, the spokesperson said. It was further noted that irrigation is not an irreversible process. It can be stopped if it is causing harm.

The Canadian side pressed for a response to the question: "If Canada does conduct studies and determines there is a problem, will the U.S. stop the project?" The U.S. side responded that the question was hypothetical; that they were convinced that studies would not reach such conclusions but that in such an unlikely event, yes, the United States would stop. After all, a twenty million acre project, about one-third of the total project, would be better than nothing.

Water Quality and Toxic Waste Problems

The Canadian spokesperson in introducing the subject expressed an intention to avoid focussing on specifics and, rather, to concentrate and advancing the principle that the introduction of new chemicals, materials and new processes should not be permitted until an acceptable means of disposing of their consequences had been demonstrated to be available.

The American respondent said that in this he and the Canadian speaker were "spiritually one" and that it was a splendid way to begin the discussion. The purpose of the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement was that of finding common ground. The questions are: "how?" and "what are we doing?". The history of the attempt to control phosphate pollution was reviewed in the course of which the American side noted that there was a divergence of opinion over each nation's share of acceptable phosphate loading, with Canadians claiming the split should be 50-50 and the Americans 85-15 because 50-50 implies markedly higher expenditures for the United States. The U.S. side conceded that Canada was doing a better job of complying with the terms of the Water Quality Agreement than was the United States with 89% of Canadian municipalities now in compliance and only 63% of those in the United States.

The Canadian side defended the Canadian position by pointing out that Canada possessed an equal amount of shoreline and that the adverse effects of pollution were not proportional to population distributions.

A discussion of United States' intentions ensued. The U.S. side pointed to the continuing existence of the "superfund" with $78 million available for 1981 and $200 million for 1982 (down $50 million from the Carter Administration's proposals). Beyond this, the U.S. side said there was no clear knowledge of the implications of the budget-cutting exercise for the superfund. In illustration it was observed that funds to be devoted to environmental matters generally would be reduced, it appeared, although increased amounts would be devoted to controlling acid rain. Depending upon circumstances, funding available for sewage clean-up could be $2.4 billion or nothing.

In a general exchange respecting where emphasis should be placed in the future, delegates from both sides advanced ideas without firm positions being adopted or conclusions reached. Three distinct problem areas were identified:

- 1) cleaning up the backlog of accumulated pollutants
- 2) reducing current pollution
- 3) anticipating and avoiding future additions.

During the exchange reference was made to the Love Canal situation. The U.S. informed Canadians that total costs for the clean-up were variously estimated at between $12 and $40 billion with industry being assessed about $300 million of the total. One bit of good, it was suggested, had been a product of the tragic situation in that it provided the catalyst for taking the first step in resolving the problem of Federal-State co-operation in such activities.

The Canadian side pointed out that Love Canal had demonstrated the need for the provision of proper and safe dumping sites, transportation for toxic wastes, and means of disposal—but that no one wanted a dump site for toxic wastes, however safe, located near them. U.S. delegates confirmed that experience in the United States was similar and that the average American “doesn’t understand the problem, doesn’t believe in the need and certainly doesn’t want to be anywhere near one (dump site)”.

There was general agreement that more media exposure of the issues was required in order to provoke and permit governments to allocate the resources necessary to resolve this set of problems.

Acid Rain

The spokesman for the Canadian side defined acid rain as being caused by emissions of sulphur dioxide and oxides of nitrogen which are released into the atmosphere, chiefly by thermal generating plants and smelters, but also by vehicles and other sources. The chemicals go far aloft, undergo chemical changes and come down hundreds or thousands of miles away in the form of sulphate or nitrate, both of which are highly acidic. (Ironically, earlier efforts to clean up the local consequences of industrial emissions by building higher stacks, it was later discovered, exacerbated the problems of acid rain.) Falling in areas such as the Canadian Shield which are not naturally buffered against the effects of acid, the cumulative effects are devastating, the speaker said. Hundreds of Canadian lakes are now demonstrably “dead”. In the neighbourhood of 40,000 more stand in risk of dying. In addition, there has been a 3 to 4 per cent reduction of forest growth. As ten per cent of the Canadian labour force is employed in forest related industries, this single factor provides adequate cause for concern, he added.

The Canadian side indicated its awareness that revisions to the U.S. Clean Air Act were under consideration and expressed no intention to make suggestions as to its ideal form and content beyond saying that it should ensure no adverse impacts on Canada.

That Canada has been making substantial contributions to its own problems was readily admitted. However, it was noted, Canada has already introduced several reform measures. Among them are:

- 1) The recent amendment of the Clean Air Act by unanimous vote in both the Senate and the House of Commons to ensure that the authority exists to deal with the problem;
- 2) The single largest emitter of sulphur dioxide, the INCO smelter in Sudbury, has been served with a non-appealable Ontario government order which will result in significant reduction in emissions;
- 3) Ontario Hydro will reduce emission, notwithstanding increased generation of electricity, by over 40% by 1990;
- 4) Plans for converting oil generating plants to coal in Eastern Canada are predicated on a firm policy decision that these conversions will be carried out in such a way that there will be no increase in pollution.

The Canadian spokesperson urged that the United States take more action to control emissions from old plants. New plants seemed to be fairly satisfactory. He noted that in the absence of effective action in the United States, “Canadian forests, tourism and fisheries will, effectively, be subsidizing the production of U.S. electricity”. Canada was very pleased, he added, that President Reagan had said in Parliament and before the members of both Houses that he would live up to his obligations. Parliament, the spokesperson said, “will hold the President to this promise”.

In opening, the American spokesperson quoted at length from the transcript of a hearing at which, he said in summary, U.S. electrical companies had admitted the problem but not the causes. The companies claimed it would take eight to twelve years to definitively determine the cause of lake acidification.

Use was made of the transcript, he said, because it was important for Canadians to understand the issue as it is being presented to Americans. The American delegate identified himself as an environmentalist, although he represented a state not generally considered to be overly sympathetic to environmental concerns. He had written to Secretary of State Haig in order to ascertain what steps would be taken pursuant to the memorandum of intent. While no reply had been received, it did seem likely that the United States would be slightly behind schedule in some parts of the study and negotiations. He indicated uncertainty about the vigour with which the U.S. Administration would pursue its undertakings.

A Canadian delegate expressed concern about the prospect of electrical plants being converted to coal under less stringent emissions requirements, and that equipment such as scrubbers would not form part of the conversion plans.

The American spokesperson replied by noting that even in oil-fired plants there were significant SO₂ emissions, and that the economic consequences of not employing high sulphur coal would be disastrous for the Eastern U.S.A. He claimed that there was "a loophole" in U.S. legislation through which the electrical companies were moving by rebuilding old plants which entailed less stringent environmental protection measures than did building new ones.

A second American delegate confirmed "the bleak outlook" for the United States doing more "with a sense of shame" and attempted to explain why this should be the case. He cited several reasons:

- 1) The "due process clause" prevented the U.S. government from forcing retrofitting—this being the loophole to which the previous American speaker had referred.
- 2) The attitude of industry is that they do not want the costs of a risk-free society imposed on them, and that a cause and effect relationship had not been proved. (At this point, he drew a slightly sardonic analogy to the tobacco industry's response to evidence that smoking and cancer are related.)
- 3) The United States is experiencing "tough times" economically;
- 4) The Reagan administration is committed to giving more responsibility to local authorities, even though the Swedish situation offered conclusive evidence that acid rain is a transborder problem.
- 5) Localism and the divergent interests of the Mid-west and North-east make the problem more intractable.
- 6) The U.S. is experiencing "the wrenching process of taking apart, brick by brick, the social structure built since 1932" and, in consequence, is having difficulty in focusing public opinion on other issues.
- 7) The present Congress is the most conservative since the New Deal. It is very locally oriented. The interest of the U.S. delegation at the Halifax meeting in acid rain is not at all representative of Congress as a whole.

He concluded by acknowledging the damage which would be done to the Canadian environment should the U.S. not act vigorously, and the damage to the relations between the countries which could occur.

A Canadian delegate said that he had proposed that literature on acid rain be distributed at border crossing points to American tourists. The idea has been accepted and was implemented. He is now prepared, he said, to propose the imposition of an acid rain tax on the thirty-eight million American tourists entering and leaving Canada each year. He said that support was developing because Canadians were starting to become bitter. Acid rain "is the hottest environmental issue in the country," he said. Even the opposition's traditional insulation from criticism by virtue of not being in power was crumbling and opposition members were beginning to be attacked for not doing enough. He said the message the Americans should take home with them is that "the EPA must at least be seen to move".

The U.S. side pointed out that damage was not being done to Canada alone and that in Adirondack Park it was beginning to affect the quality of drinking water and the productivity of agricultural land.

The Canadian side re-emphasized that both awareness of, and irritation about the issue were high in Canada. The irritation level was high because the public knows that the technology to control is available and the costs of using it are known so they are simply unwilling to accept inaction or slowness. Acid rain, it was claimed, is a case where politicians had failed to lead when they should. Both Canada and the United States have to spend social money to deal with the problem. Neither country can afford to play with a known hazard, a Canadian speaker said.

Another Canadian speaker introduced the idea of the formation of a sub-committee of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group to follow closely the work on acid rain of officials and the administrations on both sides of the border in the hope that it might accelerate action. The sub-committee might meet formally twice a year. There was general agreement with the idea. Other suggestions designed to further a resolution of the problem, were advanced:

- 1) A Congressman suggested that two or more Congressmen might introduce a special order on acid rain in the House of Representatives;
- 2) A Canadian asked if Americans could address the issue in their district mailings, and was informed that it was already being done.
- 3) A U.S. delegate raised the possibility of a Canadian Parliamentary delegation going to Washington to meet with Committees dealing with the Clean Air Act in order to exchange views and generate some publicity. There would be time to do so since no final action on the Act would be taken before the end of August.
- 4) It was suggested that the Halifax meeting issue a press release on the subject. Some doubts were expressed about the advisability of this course of action, but most seemed to favour it.

The Chair gave an undertaking to raise the idea of both the formation of a sub-committee and the issuing of a press release at the co-chairmen's meeting, and undertook to consult further with members of Committee III on the question of a sub-committee before the end of June.

In concluding the discussion an American speaker said that perhaps a North American Air Quality Commission, similar in nature to the I.J.C., was required. A draft bill to that effect was distributed to members of the committee. The speaker said that the two countries now had the unique opportunity to prevent environmental damage and not just "roll it back" since they had for once received early warning of the problem. Acid rain has not "sneaked up on us like water pollution". We are common citizens of a common continent and must act in accordance with this fact, he said.

Eastport Oil Refinery

The Canadian side opened the discussion by affirming its continuing opposition to the plans for the construction of an oil refinery and tanker unloading facility at Eastport. The spokesperson claimed that the company involved had attempted to locate in "at least a dozen" other sites further south and had been consistently turned down. Finally, the location of the project at Eastport was determined upon—the worst possible location in terms of navigational hazards of any of those examined.

The Canadian side emphasized that its opposition to the project was not based upon the construction of a refinery as such but rather upon the arrangements for handling tankers. It was suggested that if the plan were modified to include offshore unloading arrangements, Canadians might look upon the project with less disfavour. The arrangements at Saint John, New Brunswick, were cited as an example. As it stands, however, the navigational hazards are simply too great to countenance. The narrow passage and strong currents make an accident, with resulting damage to fish stocks and beaches in Canada (as well as the United States), a virtual certainty the Canadian spokesperson said. In concluding, the spokesperson claimed that Canada may well be forced to "explore the correlation between innocent passage and environmental hazard."

The U.S. respondent reminded the meeting that in 1971 the Environmental Protection Agency turned down the project. In 1981 a judge had overturned the decision but that final approval by Maine may well be subject to Canadian concurrence. The American spokesperson went on to suggest that there is still plenty of time to force a halt, or modification, to the project and that there were more hurdles and consequent delays to be met before the project could proceed.

A member of the Canadian delegation interjected at this point and quoted from a recent newspaper article which claimed that all obstacles to the project had now been overcome and that construction could proceed.

The American side countered that such did not accord with their information (but said that checks would be made) and reiterated the belief that it was unlikely the project, as presently envisaged, would proceed.

Prospects for the Law of the Sea Treaty

The U.S. side began the discussion of the Law of the Sea Treaty by emphasizing that the United States saw mining the seabed as the way to achieve self-sufficiency in a number of strategic materials such as manganese. National security dictates, the spokesperson went on, that the United States should move ahead to exploit the potential of the seabed while leaving the door open for further negotiations.

The spokesperson noted that when negotiations began, seventy-seven nations were involved, but that now the number had doubled. The whole world was "intruding". The United States, he said, was worried about aspects of the proposed Treaty involving the transfer of technology developed in the United States, and worried also about land-locked mineral-producing nations placing road blocks in the way of the United States' search for self-sufficiency.

The second U.S. speaker said that the new Administration in the United States represented a "revolution in attitudes". The new Administration, he went on, is moving slowly on the Law of the Sea so as to ensure: (1) that the Treaty incorporates "its philosophy of government"; (2) that Congress would ultimately endorse the Treaty; and, (3) that current U.N. voting patterns that the United States "mistrusts" would not apply.

For all of the above reasons, the speaker did not view it as being likely that the August conference would produce any results.

A United States Senator bluntly stated that the Treaty in its current form would not have been ratified by the Senate. He implied that this stand could not with justice be attributed to greed, since the United States had shown a great restraint in other areas. For example, the United States' two hundred mile limit applied only to fish, and was not considered by the United States as an economic zone as many other countries considered the two hundred mile limit to be.

The Senator continued saying that the Senate had substantial philosophical objections to the Treaty. He said there was "no way" that it would agree to enter into such a long-term commitment. The Treaty would place the United States "completely at the mercy of the rest of the world" for its supplies of strategic materials. Recent experience with OPEC had made such a situation unacceptable. The PLO (Palestinian Liberation Organization) would be eligible for revenues under the terms of the Treaty and that is unacceptable. The United States would be obliged to transfer the technology it had developed at no charge to other nations, who would then be free to compete with the United States.

The Senator said that he could not understand any nation in the free world supporting the organizational arrangements in the Treaty. The Soviet Bloc (and thus, the Soviet Union) would be guaranteed three seats on the governing council, while the United States would have to compete with its allies to get one. Moreover, he said, the Treaty arrangements would abrogate the Truman doctrine on hydrocarbons. He concluded by saying he had "never seen the Senate so united in opposition to a piece of administration negotiation".

In responding, the Canadian spokesperson reminded the meeting of the 1958 and 1960 Law of the Sea agreements and the U.S. limited convention on territorial waters. The spokesperson noted that 160 nations were involved and emphasized Canada's heavy commitment to the negotiations since 1967. It is hoped that a draft convention will be signed this year, he continued, but recently expressed United States concerns go to the very heart of the negotiations. He suggested that insistence upon this approach would make the United States very much odd man out. The two hundred mile economic zone incorporated in the Treaty is already an accepted and adopted feature of international behaviour, the Canadian speaker continued. It was worthy of note, he added, that both the United States and Soviet military had been supportive of the Treaty throughout.

The Canadian spokesperson emphasized the importance of U.S. participation at Geneva, if only to use it as a forum for the articulation of its concerns, because what is at stake is international peace and security. The collapse of the negotiations after thirteen years of effort, he said, would be a severe blow to multilateralism, to the development of international law and to the stability of international ocean affairs. It would heighten North-South tensions and could be viewed by the developing countries as a frontal attack on the idea of a new international economic order as embodied in the concept that the resources of the international seabed area are the common heritage of mankind. The U.S.S.R. would not be slow to exploit such a rift and many nations could be delivered into Soviet hands as a result, he claimed. After all, he said, many nations "have nothing and are aware of the seabed potential".

The Canadian side indicated that some of the specific objections to the Treaty outlined by Assistant Secretary of State Malone in testimony before Congressional Committees were not without other supports and might form the basis for constructive and productive United States participation at the Geneva Conference.

The second Canadian speaker posed a series of questions: How do we salvage this document? Is there no middle ground for the Senate? Would more status for the United States on the governing body satisfy objections? "Are you really engaged in re-evaluating the United Nations' systems?"

The American side replied that they were becoming concerned by the Law of the Sea in the context of holding suspect any kind of government regulation, especially that of a world organization. It was asserted that: "You can't have a nation which is shouldering forty percent of the defence burden of the free world, and almost all the costs of the exploitation of space, assume the additional burdens represented by the Treaty. If you impose more, it will collapse." Resistance to the Treaty, the speaker said, was but another manifestation of the perception of the economic reality of the United States which has led to such general support of President Reagan's economic policies.

A member of the Canadian delegation said that the United States position as stated would be understandable if the Treaty were going to tie its hands completely, but that the Treaty only called for a seven percent contribution and, moreover, it gives greater surety with respect to exploitation of hydrocarbons from the ocean than does the 1958 agreement.

The U.S. side replied that hydrocarbons should not be in the Treaty in the first place, and referred to the governing body as "a floating pagoda". The Canadian side suggested that a failure on the part of the United States to adhere to the Treaty might very well lead to nations in the Third World and elsewhere making use of national courts in an attempt to seize U.S. assets to compensate for a failure to comply with the terms of the Treaty. An American speaker replied that, as the national survival of the United States was at risk, the United States would do it anyway.

The question was asked of the U.S. side, "Are you really prepared to risk the creation of one thousand more trouble spots?". The Treaty, the Canadian speaker went on, does in fact provide a means of clearing up a number of potential trouble spots such as enclosed passages, and for that reason the United States military had consistently supported the Treaty.

In reply, a United States delegate said that military concerns about rights of passage were over-stated. The speaker said force would ensure passage in the event of a conflict, and that if there were no conflict, the Treaty provisions probably were not needed.

Another American speaker identified himself as being a liberal Democrat since the New Deal, who had gone through a 180 degree turn in respect of foreign aid over the past fifteen years. He said he was not willing any longer to submit to "the demagoguery and arrogance of the Third World" as it exercised its control of the General Assembly. The United States, the speaker said, could not be made to submit itself to that kind of control in an area of strategic interest.

This same speaker went on to say that "the Third World countries were contemptuous of human rights and women, and were authoritarian and regressive in their domestic policies". He did not favour giving un-tied aid to countries where the elites "ran around in Mercedes" and the rest of the country starved. He said he was willing "to aid redress but would not finance the development of high technology simply to benefit their elites". The speaker said he had less and less confidence in multinational institutions and while he continued to favour aid, he wanted to know what it was for and who would benefit.

The Canadian side asked if the United States would consider earmarking seven per cent of the revenue from the exploitation of the seabed for the purpose of aid and setting up its own regime to distribute it. It was suggested that this would be a practical way around some of the difficulties the United States saw in the Treaty. It was asked whether the United States was looking for practical ways of overcoming their objections or whether its stance was ideological in nature. "Are you simply arguing that an international authority is bad?"

A Canadian speaker said that there had to be some agreement as to how to distribute costs which the exploitation of the seabed would impose on land-based production. In reply, an American speaker said that there was protectionism built into the Treaty on nickel, which benefited Canada and disadvantaged the United States, and protectionism in fisheries which benefited Canada and the United States, but hurts their allies and Japan (implying that the protectionism was objectionable).

An exchange amongst the U.S. delegates took place, in which one speaker stated that the respect which the United States does have in the world is based upon the right decisions it has taken, rather than upon military might, and asked whether the mood in the Senate was to reject the Treaty on principle or on the basis of specifics which could be changed. The speaker asked if it was thought incumbent upon the United States to come forward with a new proposal. Another American speaker replied in the negative, and said that this summer would be devoted to attacks on the United States, but that "we'll be back in Geneva or Caracas nine months later with a new draft".

A Canadian inquired whether a lack of a guarantee of U.S. representation on the thirty-six member Council caused the United States the most trouble in accepting the Treaty, or whether the concept of a sharing was being rejected.

In reply, an American said that the United States definitely did not reject the concept of sharing, and drew an analogy with the U.S. space effort where benefits were made available to the Third World at no charge. The speaker went on to say, in respect of submerged lands, those who have the technology to develop it should develop it. He said the Third World countries have no interest in exploiting this technology, and simply wished to act as a drag on those who have. The Soviet Union, it was claimed, was equally interested in slowing down seabed developments because of the huge land mass it had to exploit, and would use its position on the Council to slow down developments.

The Canadian side then urged the United States, if it was determined to back away from the Treaty, to do it in a way that would avoid giving the USSR "its greatest propaganda victory ever". In reply, the U.S. delegate said the United States was willing to lose the propaganda war if it meant that it would not lose a real one. He said that the United States had now to think in terms of survival. He analysed the growing mobilization of military forces and asserted that within the next four years the Soviet Union would move again to test the United States' will before defences were restructured. Another American added that worries about the USSR "were very real" and said the United States had been given no "brownie points" for cutting back on defence expenditures.

The Canadian side said that the single greatest Canadian concern is for the Geneva meeting, and suggested that the United States would be wise to participate actively, put its real concerns forward, and to demand changes if that was what was wanted. The Canadian side said they had received signals that any other approach by the United States might very well result in the other countries going ahead without them. The possibility of the use of national courts was again raised, and Canada's fears of the USSR gaining by a lack of U.S. participation were reiterated.

Skagit Valley Flooding

As a result of a 1942 Order by the International Joint Commission, Seattle claims the right to flood some 5,000 acres in British Columbia through increasing the height and output potential of the Ross Power Dam.

The American spokesperson opened the discussion by saying that, on the issue of the Ross Power Dam, British Columbia wished to abrogate the agreements of 1942 and 1967. The United States, he said, wants a quick ruling from the International Joint Commission because the Pacific Northwest is energy hungry and needs increased output from the Ross Dam.

The Canadian side drew to the attention of the meeting the unanimity of Canadian opposition, noting that all three Federal political parties are now formal intervenors before the I.J.C. and that the International Woodworkers of America have agreed not to log in the area even if the Ross Dam is raised. Canada would receive the entire draw down and would have a valuable wilderness area destroyed including some unique fauna, as well as making the surrounding area unuseable. Beyond that, the existing arrangements for financial compensation, $34,000 a year since 1971, are "crazy", the Canadian speaker said.

The U.S. side agreed that the amount was inadequate, but asked if environmental considerations must always and everywhere stop development.

Poplar River

The United States has in the past expressed concerns about possible adverse effects on water quality and air quality in Montana by a thermal power generating station being built in Coronach, Saskatchewan. Recently the United States and Canada reached an agreement for the establishment of a joint monitoring arrangement and the I.J.C. has issued a report on Poplar River water quality saying that the project could proceed consistent with the provisions of the Boundary Waters Treaty.

The U.S. spokesperson said that Montana was still "a bit tense" about the situation but had been mollified by the agreed information sharing arrangements. He concluded with the observation that the arrangements in respect of Poplar River could perhaps be a model for other agreements.

The Closing of Border Crossing Points in Quetico Park

This late addition to the agenda had been occasioned by the decision by Canada to close two of its border crossing points into Quetico Park. This would lead to the necessity of Americans intending to use the Park to travel through Ontario to the Park's northern entrances. The U.S. spokesperson indicated that U.S. outfitters were disturbed by this inconvenience and that they did not like the quickness and unexpectedness of the decision since it gave them no time to prepare to meet the new situation. The speaker went on to note that there would have been "signals" had the Quetico Consultative Committee still been in existence, but that it had been dissolved by the Carter Administration in "its rush to de-regulate". Concluding, the speaker thanked John Reid, M.P., for "interposing himself between the silver bullet and the victim".

The Canadian side explained that the decision had resulted from the conjuncture of three factors:

- 1) A desire by the Government of Canada to reduce the number of Customs Managers; and
- 2) The wish of the Government of Ontario to have access to the Park limited to the North so that its economy would derive some benefit from the use of the Park. (It was noted that the province controls access through the issuance of permits.); and
- 3) The desire of both Canadian governments to eliminate the adverse ecological impacts of the fixed border crossing points.

The economics of the situation had become extremely important, the speaker went on, since the closing of the Atikokan mines and the resulting turning towards tourism as an alternative. Nevertheless, the Canadian speaker (who represents the area in Parliament) had spoken with the Federal Minister involved and secured an unofficial agreement that only one point would be closed this year and that meetings would be sought with U.S. authorities to discuss "phasing out". Canadian government departments were now meeting to discuss the details and the decision would shortly be made official, he concluded.

An American speaker expressed gratification, but noted that the difference in regulations for the areas on either side of the border, with boat motors being permitted on the Canadian side while banned in the U.S., was causing some irritation amongst U.S. citizens.

The International Joint Committee

In response to Canadian concerns about delays in the appointment of the American Commissioners to the International Joint Commission, the U.S. side informed Canadians that the new administration was committed to the continuation of the I.J.C. and that the United States will quickly appoint its new commissioners. Two factors had slowed the process, the spokesperson said. The first was the attempted assassination of the President which had generally slowed appointments; and the second was the new requirement that the Senate ratify. Previously they had been made on Presidential authority, but in an attempt to upgrade the positions, Senate ratification had been added.

The Canadian side declared itself to be entirely satisfied.

Closing plenary

The North American 'accord'

A U.S. Co-chairman compared the new Administration's proposal for a North American 'accord' with the earlier initiative which had been firmly rejected by Canadians and which had been mainly motivated by U.S. energy supply concerns. The new approach was quite different. He pointed out that during the next year the whole question of closer North American trade relations would be given a good airing on the basis of a study mandated by the 1979 Trade Agreements Act and due for release shortly. In general, the spokesman continued, what was involved in the new concept was a focus on economic goals, on a strengthening of Canada and Mexico designed to make them less dependent partners of the United States. While energy questions could not be dismissed in any discussions of a North American 'accord', the sovereignty of the two neighbours would be recognized.

Similarly the speaker hoped Canada would be interested in the economic strength and stability of the United States and would try to understand the new Administration's economic measures. These measures involved cutbacks in federal programs, tax cuts, a new system of block grants to the states and a new non-interventionist attitude to the market place. Leading Democrats recognized the need for much of the program. It was widely supported across the country as well as in Congress where most of the cuts would be approved, he predicted.

In concluding, the spokesman re-emphasized the Administration's objective of better economic relations with Canada and Mexico. The United States recognized the impact of its economy on them and would consult them increasingly he said, including on developments within their own countries.

A Canadian Co-chairman spoke of Canada-United States relations and the usefulness of the annual meetings of the Group in promoting the better relations which Canadians understood to be the true meaning of the North American 'accord'. Canada was very appreciative that Ottawa was the first foreign capital visited by President Reagan, an important symbolic illustration of the 'accord' intentions.

The spokesman pointed out that in recent years, Congress rather than the Administration had been the source of some of Canada's problems with the United States. Cases in point had been the blockage of the fisheries treaty and the convention tax linkage to border broadcasting. He emphasized how pleased the Canadian side was with the message, conveyed to Committee I, that Senator Percy the Chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, intended to expedite the tax treaty as soon as possible. However, the present Congressional focus may now be on reciprocal or "mirror" legislation instead of linkage. The speaker said this seemed like an improvement to him and he urged them not to look for new linkages. Further, when one of the two countries considered it must act to protect its interests, it should do so carefully and the receiving country should react cautiously since so much was at stake.

The annual meetings of the Group are an important way of learning of each other's concerns and the reasons behind certain measures. However, the spokesman said he recognized that after the present discussions, there were some U.S. concerns remaining with the proposed Canadian energy legislation, the proposed 'basic price system' of the new import policy and the possibility that FIRA's regulations might be tightened. These concerns would be relayed back to appropriate bodies in Ottawa. For its part, Canada was worried by the proliferation of U.S. procurement regulations and by the acid rain problem, the latter a source of widespread concern to Canadians but affecting few Americans. The speaker wondered if a special meeting on the subject of acid rain under the Group's auspices might be helpful in enlarging understanding.

A U.S. Senator, commenting on the U.S. electoral results, said they were more indicative of a widespread desire for a policy change than a major public endorsement of President Reagan. Nor were the Republicans in control of the Senate given a very strong mandate. He considered the President's early visits to Canada and Mexico were the result of a high priority of the Administration. He warned that Canada should not misread the intentions of the North American 'accord' initiative by thinking that the United States is seeking to dominate its neighbours.

Speaking of the current economic situation and the Reagan budget measures, he pointed out that although there were high pockets of unemployment, the U.S. economy was strong. Incentives were needed to encourage savings and investment since traditional mechanisms designed to stimulate consumption had led to low productivity and high inflation. A remarkable unanimity of support was evident behind the new directions.

A Canadian Senator referred to the idea advanced by a number of U.S. sources for a closer trilateral trading arrangement between Canada, the United States and Mexico. Both the Canadian Prime Minister and the Mexican President had formally distanced themselves from this idea he said. Instead, because the two neighbouring countries were at different stages of development, it would be preferable to consider separate bilateral trading arrangements between Canada and the United States and Mexico. He himself would like to see a preferential free trade agreement between Canada and the United States.

In response a U.S. Congressman said he would worry about a bilateral free trade agreement or a customs union. There was a danger that in widespread cross-border rationalization of production, Canada might end up with the short end of the stick which would poison the relationship. Furthermore, Mexico would seek a similar arrangement with the United States, then the Caribbean countries, then Brazil, possibly Argentina, etc. The United States, with more than one border, could not afford to enter into preferential deals he said. What must be done is to liberalize trade on a most-favoured-nation (MFN) basis.

A Canadian delegate said he too was worried about a bilateral free trade arrangement. To begin with there was in the two countries a fundamentally different approach regarding government intervention and regulation. Canada wanted to retain its full sovereignty to be free to make its own mistakes. He spoke of the branch plant viewpoint of Canada by U.S. multinationals and expressed the fear that even if the subsidiaries in Canada were more efficient, there would be a tendency in a free trade area, to relocate in the United States. When conditions were difficult, would there not be an inclination to look after U.S. interests first, he asked.

At various stages of discussion on this item, a number of delegates said that they had found this year's discussions very useful and informative.

El Salvador

A U.S. delegate, the chairman of the House Subcommittee on Inter-American Affairs, outlined the situation in El Salvador following the 1979 overthrow of the Romero government. The junta of army officers and Christian Democrats under President Duarte is presently supported by the United States in the belief that it is trying to carry out needed economic and social reforms. The junta is besieged on the left by guerrillas thought to be supported by Cuba and Honduras and on the right by the oligarchal families and military elements. The rightists, supported by wealthy rightists in Guatemala and Miami want the reforms to fail.

Criticisms of the United States policy in El Salvador stem from those who fear another Vietnam situation and from those in the Catholic community who are lobbying against any military or economic assistance as long as the present government is associated with violence and the abuse of human rights. U.S. assistance this year, the spokesman said, will amount to $126 million in economic assistance and $35 million in military assistance with 54 military personnel. In Congress, both the Senate and the House Committees have held hearings and passed restrictions on the Administration's assistance to El Salvador. The House Committee bill provides for the continuation of assistance only under certain conditions. These conditions involve assurances that the El Salvador régime was not engaged in consistent violations of human rights; was achieving control over all its armed forces to order the end to torture and murder of its citizens; was making progress on political and land reforms; was committed to holding free elections; and was demonstrating willingness to negotiate a resolution of the conflict with opposition groups. The El Salvador government has called for free elections for 1982.

The Congressman recounted that he had found, during a recent trip to Central America, that Canada has a credibility in this area which the United States does not have. He urged Canada to assist with other countries such as Mexico in trying to solve the crisis in the area. He noted the NDP leader's presence in El Salvador and expressed the hope that other parties and the Canadian government would play an urgently needed role as soon as possible.

A Canadian participant said the Canadian approach was for a political solution rather than military intervention of support. He urged support for agrarian reforms so that the land transfers would be put to a productive use and form the basis for future exports. This delegate quoted former U.S. Ambassador White's statements on the inadvisability of military support. Canadians share the position of the Catholic church, he said. While Canada's role in influencing developments was limited by not having a resident ambassador in the country, it was possible that with its contacts in Nicaragua and its diplomatic links with Cuba it could act in a mediator capacity.

Another Canadian wondered if the fact that Canada had traditionally avoided membership in the Organization of American States (OAS) did not affect its credibility to act in this situation. While Canadians tended to view the Duarte régime as the best hope, there was concern over escalation of military assistance as could be seen in the parliamentary debate on the subject. At the same time there was apprehension over the source of support for the guerrilla forces. He doubted that Canadians widely support the Catholic Church's position. They feel too distant from this issue, but naturally they regard a political solution as preferable to a military one and hope that military interventions will not escalate. But what role specifically did the United States see Canada as being able to play, he asked.

The U.S. spokesman agreed that OAS membership could be seen as important. The United States perceived Canada as not being very interested, not involved in the situation to the same degree as Germany for example or the Socialist International. He himself would like to see Canada more closely involved in the international discussions for a negotiated settlement since the United States was often looked on with distrust. But he admitted he did not reflect the views of Congress or of the Reagan Administration which had not been encouraging the idea of a negotiated settlement because it was pinning its hopes on the Duarte commitment to free elections.

A Canadian participant doubted that the Canadian government would want to get involved unless it was within an internationally agreed formula. A Congressman responded that even if there were no direct formal participation by the Canadian government, surely the Communist presence in Central America should be a cause of concern. A strong message should be conveyed somehow to Cuba. He himself put no stock in former Ambassador White's statements he added. Another Congressman was surprised that the Trudeau government was not willing to get involved. Canada underestimated its leadership role, he said, and its mediatory role could be constructive.

A U.S. Senator defended former Ambassador White's viewpoint, saying White had become a convenient scapegoat. He warned against reliance on manufactured or unreliable information which could produce situations in which the accounts of disasters became self-fulfilling prophecies. The constructive role for the United States and Canada to play in the El Salvador mess he said, was to help erase the void causing the widespread social unrest.

North-South relations

A Canadian spokesman spoke to the plenary meeting reflecting the conclusions of a Canadian parliamentary study on North-South issues of which he was Chairman. He stressed the practical advantages for the Western world of increasing development assistance. What is at issue at the moment he said, is "process" rather than "substance". He told delegates that it is important to be present in developing countries when new political forces are erupting; to enter into a dialogue, to be partners in change. Moreover, there exists a clear mutuality of interest. If industrialized countries help these countries develop, they are going to need more goods from the "North". There is a crucial need for U.S. leadership. It is clear that the Third World wants to share power. It will be advantageous for the North to discuss such issues openly; it may find that, in what seems like a monolith of 77 countries, there will be friends and a certain convergence of interests.

An American delegate said the new policies in the United States of governmental non-intervention mean that there will be no money for North-South issues. The United States will not reach the ODA level of .5 percent of GNP. He was not optimistic that there would be significant U.S. participation or support for such a policy direction although he himself found it "an exemplary route".

Another U.S. participant noted that the countries in the developing world are currently requesting a sharing of power and a transfer to them of resources. The United States over a period of 20 to 30 years has given several hundred billion dollars in assistance but has seen little evidence that within the countries themselves there was any move by those in power to transfer resources or share power internally. These developing countries all have vast unemployment, but the United States sees its assistance continually channelled into high technology export-oriented projects, owned by the elite, with little impact on employment levels. Similarly, U.S. grants for education found their way to graduate schools for the elite amidst seas of illiteracy. Grants for health services had no impact on the lack of basic necessities but instead ended up as graduate medical schools. The United States, he said, is waiting for the Third World countries to create the "process" in their own countries, to share the resources and the power internally. Even liberal Democrats were frustrated by the lack of such developments he said.

The Canadian spokesman retorted that there was room in his conception of development assistance for hard bargaining; aid should be used intelligently, and with conditions. Not participating in developing countries will only exacerbate the situation. The 'North' could say, for example, that food aid should be related to food production. The populations in these countries could not fight the elite on empty stomachs. He urged the United States not to turn away because of horror stories about the ruling groups. The mass of the population should not be left at their whim, he said.

THE CONSTITUTION

COMMUNICATION FROM PRIME MINISTER TO PREMIER OF BRITISH COLUMBIA

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as I entered the chamber this evening, I received a communication from the office of the Right Honourable the Prime Minister.

This statement pertains to the constitutional negotiations under way with the premiers. With leave of the Senate, I should like to read the statement, and I now tender to the Leader of the Opposition a copy in both official languages. I have asked that copies be printed immediately for all honourable senators so that they too may study the statement.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): If it is not clear, we shall study it.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the statement is:

The Prime Minister today released the text of his Telex to William Bennett, Premier of British Columbia, in reply to Premier Bennett's proposal of yesterday for a First Ministers' Meeting.

The message reads as follows:

I am writing in response to the communiqué which you and seven other premiers issued on the subject of a possible First Ministers' Meeting on the Constitution.

I regret that, in spite of your repeated statements that we should meet to discuss the constitutional resolution, which—may I remind you—the Supreme Court has said is legal, you have turned down my invitation for a First Ministers' Meeting on six different dates since the Supreme Court decision.

Senator Flynn: Come to the point.

Senator Perrault: I know that most honourable senators would like to hear the statement to its conclusion. The Prime Minister continues:

I am also disappointed at your failure when we met last week to put forward any new constitutional proposal. Indeed, although you claim that the eight premiers want a negotiated settlement of the constitutional issue you have not yet indicated even a willingness to compromise. Surely the negotiated settlement you seek requires that the provinces as well as the federal government modify their previous position.

Nevertheless, despite my disappointment at your once again delaying our proposed meeting, I am prepared to meet with all the premiers one last time in an effort to reach an agreement on constitutional reform. I am also prepared to accept your proposed date of a meeting during the first week of November, even though this will necessitate postponing the federal Budget by one week.

● (2010)

The Prime Minister continues:

I assume this postponement does not concern you, since you knew that a Budget delay would be the inevitable result of your refusal to meet next week and of your suggestion that—notwithstanding that the Budget had been announced for November 3rd—we meet on the Constitution during the first week of November. In addition, your insistence on postponing the First Ministers' Meeting will necessitate a further delay in the Federal-Provincial Finance Ministers' meeting on the Fiscal Arrangements Act which should follow the Budget and which you have been avidly seeking.

Therefore, while I regret your making it necessary for us to delay these events, I agree that we will meet in a First Ministers' meeting on Monday, November 2nd in the nation's capital.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Isn't that fantastic.

Senator Perrault: The Telex continues:

I suggest the first day of the week because I believe it is essential that, once our meeting starts on November 2nd, it should continue for as many hours or days as necessary until either we have reached a consensus on constitutional reform or until it has become clear that such a consensus is not possible. For it is now evident to all of us, and to the Canadian people, that the time has come when this issue must be settled once and for all.

Senator Frith: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: The Prime Minister continues:

If a consensus has been reached, we will then immediately seek all-party agreement in the House to amend the Resolution in accordance with this consensus. If a consensus is not possible, we will either proceed with the Resolution in its current form, or we will seek the consent of the House to include in the Resolution some or all of whatever modifications I may put forward at the First Ministers' Meeting.

I would appreciate receiving your reply to this telex by midnight Friday. If I have not heard by that time that you and your colleagues agree to meet at the date and place proposed, and on the clear understanding that the meeting constitutes the one final attempt to reach a consensus on this issue, and that no further delay or postponement would be accepted then I will have no choice but to proceed with the Constitutional Resolution, which the Supreme Court has said is legal, in the House next week.

The Prime Minister concludes with these paragraphs:

In view of the fact that over a year ago the constitutional issue was raised to the level of first ministers, I think that the advance meeting of ministers that you propose be held next week would be neither useful nor desirable. This issue is now clearly one with which only First Ministers can deal.

We are all totally familiar with the details of the Resolution which is now before Parliament. And we are the only people who can negotiate an agreement on behalf of our respective governments. Therefore, a ministerial meeting could not result in progress toward the desired goal of a consensus on the Constitutional Resolution.

Moreover, as I told you when we met last Tuesday, the federal government is not prepared to put forward the details of its proposals for compromise until a First Ministers' Meeting. Hence we are not in favour of a ministerial meeting "to explore areas of substance where agreement may be achieved" as you suggest. Naturally this does not mean that provincial ministers should not meet if you and your colleagues think this would be useful.

I repeat, this issue is now at the point where it must be dealt with by First Ministers themselves. In view of the number of times you and your colleagues have met on this issue, or discussed it in telephone conference calls, I assume that you know by now what your thinking is on the constitutional issue.

I hope therefore that you will sustain your offer to meet on November 2nd. I believe that if we approach our meeting in good faith, and with a determination to succeed even if it requires meeting day and night, the result will be a national consensus on a constitutional resolution.

I look forward to your reply on behalf of the Premiers before midnight on Friday.

P. E. Trudeau

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I really do not know what useful comments I could make with regard to this letter that the Prime Minister has sent to Premier Bennett. It does not appear, on the surface anyway, to suggest any disposition on the part of the Prime Minister to put forward any meaningful compromise.

● (2015)

It has been suggested by both Premier Davis and Premier Hatfield that what the Prime Minister has in mind is no compromise. It was even suggested by Premier Hatfield that a compromise solution could not be placed on the table because there was no table. In any event, we have to be optimistic. Certainly, we hope that a real compromise will flow from the meeting. I am quite sure that the premiers will not refuse to have the meeting on the date suggested, since it meets with their suggestion that a meeting be held early in November.

However, I note in the letter that the Prime Minister repeats several times that the constitutional package is legal. At no time in this letter do I find any reference to the package not being constitutional, as was stated by the Supreme Court of Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: I am not sure whether it means that the Prime Minister does not care—

An Hon. Senator: He doesn't.

Senator Flynn:—about the unconstitutional aspects of the proposal. If the Prime Minister is worried only about the possibility of finding a legal trick, then I myself am worried about the outcome of any meeting.

Senator Frith: That is not what he means, so don't worry.

Senator Flynn: Senator Frith says that is not what he means. Probably he is the only senator on that side of the house who knows what is in the mind of the Prime Minister.

Senator Frith: It is legally constitutional.

Senator Flynn: It is not legally constitutional.

Senator Frith: That is what the Supreme Court said.

Senator Flynn: Certainly not. You haven't read the decision.

Senator Frith: I most certainly have.

An Hon. Senator: Or he didn't understand it.

Senator Flynn: The Supreme Court judges said it was not illegal. It is the equivalent of a coup d'état, and the court had no power to correct it. They even suggested that the recourse would be for the Governor General to intervene, as in a situation where a Prime Minister, having been defeated in the house, would refuse to resign or call an election. There would then be no remedy other than for the Governor General to call on someone else to form a government, or to force an election, despite the advice of the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister has to realize that if he does not worry about the unconstitutional aspect of this resolution he will be heading for trouble and Canada is likely to suffer.

In any event, getting back to the more positive aspect of the matter, the Prime Minister did not need to go into all that detail and say, "This is the last time!" He had only to say, "I am happy to have that meeting with you on November 3, and I am willing to reach a compromise with you." But he is in a fighting mood, and he has always been in a fighting mood. I hope that the warm weather of Cancun will soften his view and that he will return with a better disposition than is indicated in the communication that has just been read.

Senator Frith: And what is going to improve the disposition of the gang of eight?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I feel sure that most honourable senators are deeply disappointed in the response of the Leader of the Opposition.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Senators: Not at all.

Senator Perrault: Perhaps it was too much to expect that there would be unrestrained joy demonstrated by the opposition upon hearing this important statement by the Prime Minister. For the Leader of the Opposition to say that there is no suggestion here of a compromise. I would refer him to page 3 of the text:

Moreover, as I told you when we met last Tuesday, the federal government is not prepared to put forward the details of its proposals for compromise until a First Ministers' Meeting.

I would only say to the Leader of the Opposition: let him judge after the historic event and not before. In the meantime, let him give his full support to this effort to achieve co-operation between the federal and provincial governments.

• (2020)

Senator Flynn: I have said all that needs to be said.

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government if he can enlighten us with regard to the reason why the Prime Minister feels that the government should not proceed with the introduction of the budget in the last week of October but delay it another week, until after the constitutional conference? There would seem to be very little connection between the two things, and the last week of October was the date originally announced for the introduction of the budget. My understanding, from press statements, is that it was put over to November 3 only because there might be a constitutional conference before that date.

Can the honourable the Leader of the Government enlighten us as to why there is to be further delay in the presentation of the budget?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the introduction of the budget and the subsequent debate are extremely important actions in themselves, which should command the full attention of all parliamentarians, as the Honourable Senator Manning is aware. Indeed, I think most Canadians are very much preoccupied with economic concerns these days, and the government wanted to introduce this budget as quickly as possible and to have it discussed and debated thoroughly by all parties. It was hoped that constitutional matters could have been resolved by Parliament before the budget was introduced.

Senator Flynn: Why?

Senator Perrault: The premiers were aware of the tentative parliamentary priorities which had been established by the federal government. They have said, however, for their purposes, that they would rather have this meeting in November, and the government has acted to accommodate that request, despite the fact that vital budget matters have had to be delayed.

[Later:]

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, may I revert to the discussion that the Leader of the Government introduced earlier this evening?

There is no question but that the Supreme Court of Canada has made the issue so simple that there cannot be any misunderstanding. Of course, the Prime Minister is correct when he says it is legal. We are dealing with the British North America Act and with amendments under the British North America Act which are proposed by the Joint Address. All of that is correct, but that is only half of it and is not the more important half. The more important half is what my friend and leader has so aptly described as "the constitutional end of it." The Supreme Court of Canada—the group of six—has also made the constitutional end of it very simple. Since 1932 there has been one amendment after another, and any time such an amendment has concerned the provinces, they have been represented.

British law is splendid in the way it shapes itself and develops; it is absolutely magnificent. This particular piece of legislation concerns all of the provinces. Therefore, each province, under the conventions concerning amendments to the Constitution, has a right to be heard, to consent to or to oppose, and to be just as important as the Dominion itself. This is, after all, a federation. I repeat, this is a federation and the provinces have this right to consent to or to oppose the amendments.

We have these proposed changes in the Constitution going to Westminster. It is a farce simply to say that it is legal and therefore will be gone ahead with. When it goes to Westminster, what is going to happen? Westminster will be bound to turn it down. Westminster suggested that, before going ahead with it, Canada should refer it to the Supreme Court. Westminster knew what it was looking for, and that is what it got in reply: six judges all deciding that the constitutional conventions had not been obeyed, had not even been considered by Trudeau. If this does get as far as Westminster, I suggest that the whole thing will become a fiasco and will result in Britain offering us patriation of our Constitution with an amending formula. That is where we are headed at the present time, and that is where we will end up.

● (2030)

The Prime Minister, of course, is a half-baked lawyer anyway. He never practised a day in his life. He is half-baked in many other ways, but as a lawyer he's a dud.

An Hon. Senator: He's fully baked.

Senator Walker: He always has been. He never understood the law. They say he was a professor at the University of Montreal. He was not a professor. He was a lecturer, and a damn poor one, because he did not understand what he was talking about. He never lectured on the Canadian Constitution because he did not know a thing about the Canadian Constitution. All he knew about was the Civil Code of Quebec.

It was important that he should do that, but to have a man as prime minister, who will not take advice from anyone and who considers himself an authority on everything, come and face this house and the House of Commons and be like a spoiled little boy saying, "You do this or else!"—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Walker: When he was down in South America he was very cocky about this matter because he thought, as the leader apparently still thinks, that because it is legal it is satisfactory and that that is all that is required. But the most important thing has been left out: the constitutional convention which requires the consent of the provinces—not of all the provinces, but of the provinces. It has never been determined how many would be satisfactory, because there has never been any trouble in the past.

Honourable senators, think of what I am saying. We are wasting a great deal of time. We have an egotistical Prime Minister who is on his last legs and will soon be out. He is a disgrace to the Dominion and a disgrace to the people of the Dominion.

Senator Frith: Oh, come on!

Senator Walker: Now, having said that I just wish to say—

Senator McElman: Baloney!

Senator Walker: And there, in the one who has just spoken, is the personification of baloney. I just wish to say thank you for your kind attention.

Senator Frith: Oh, come on. You were always abusive when you had a bad case.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, obviously there is a difference of opinion in this chamber.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

An Hon. Senator: Amen.

Senator Frith: We will mark David down as "undecided."

Senator Perrault: There is an area, to quote Senator Bosa, of "partisan disputation" here. But, surely, there will be a full opportunity for all of us to present our views on this subject during the scheduled two-day debate. Also, I note on the Order Paper that Order No. 9, standing in the name of Senator Marshall, concerns certain aspects of the Canadian Constitution, providing yet another opportunity for honourable senators to set forth their views. I suggest that this is not the time to debate the Constitution.

May I conclude by saying that I resent and deeply regret, as I think most honourable senators on both sides of the house deeply regret, deplore and resent, the abusive personal remarks made by the senator about the Right Honourable the Prime Minister.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Walker: I meant every word.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, just as a backbencher and one who on occasion has not been completely supportive of all the things the Prime Minister has done, I have to stand and express my opinion that a great Canadian has been seriously maligned in this chamber tonight.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Buckwold: I must say that I am amazed at my friend Senator Walker—who, generally, is very fair in the kind of presentation he makes—describing a courageous Prime Minister in the terms he used.

Although the courts may say that it is necessary to have some consent of the provinces, I would suggest to you that the courts have also implied that you need the consent of the people; and the people are in favour of what the Prime Minister is attempting to do on behalf of this country.

Some Hon. Senators: No, no.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Argue: That is perfectly clear.

Senator Buckwold: The people are in favour. The polls show it.

An Hon. Senator: No, they don't.

Senator Buckwold: The polls show it.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Buckwold: The Charter of Rights is something that is urgently needed and earnestly desired by the people of Canada.

You can talk about provinces and you can talk about legality, but I think the Prime Minister is on very firm ground when he feels that the people of Canada want a Constitution that is amendable and that they want a Charter of Rights, and I am very proud to support it, especially when he has been so gracious in trying to meet the demands of the provinces in their various—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, great!

Senator Buckwold: I see the claque is still over there. I thought the summer adjournment might have changed that.

● (2035)

The Prime Minister has been very gracious in meeting the demands, the sometimes very arrogant and selfish demands, of the provinces insofar as meeting dates are concerned. I believe that it should be recognized that the Prime Minister has been very generous in what he has done. I am looking forward to a meeting of minds.

I suggest that when this package finally gets to the United Kingdom, it will receive the approval of Her Majesty's government and, with that, acceptance by the people of Canada.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

RETIREMENT OF CHAIRMAN OF PENSION COMMISSION— QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. I find it passing strange that over the summer adjournment the Senate was completely ignored with regard to being supplied with information by the Government of Canada relative to our duties.

I am referring to certain events, which I have been informed about third hand, which concern the Department of Veterans Affairs. It is quite ridiculous that no information was ever given to members of the Senate with regard to the retirement of the Chairman of the Canadian Pension Commission. This office is a very important and vital one, affecting some 750,000 veterans in Canada.

Another event, information regarding which came to my attention third hand also, concerned the announcement of the replacement of the gentleman I refer to, which was to the effect that a retired member of the Department of Veterans Affairs had been appointed to look into the backlog of veterans' applications. This is hypocritical, when the retiring chairman of the commission knows more about the reason for the backlog of pension applications than Mr. MacCracken or anybody else in Canada.

Furthermore, a precedent has been established as a result of a decision by the War Veterans Allowance Board and the chairman of that board, Mr. Don Thompson, in Charlottetown, P.E.I., which has to do with, and which affects, the livelihood of many thousands of Canadians, whether they be in British Columbia or Newfoundland.

I wonder why not one member of the Senate was notified through an order in council, or any announcement by the Department of Veterans Affairs with regard to these matters. This is a situation which supports my conviction that we are ignored, so that those in this chamber who have an interest in this do not know what is going on and, as a consequence, cannot try to protect an important segment of the population of Canada, namely, the veterans of Canada.

I wonder why we cannot find out through the Leader of the Government why this ignorance, this lack of communication, is allowed to go on. I think that sooner or later something has to be done, and it should be done now. Regardless of where my interests happen to lie, I am completely disgusted with the fact that I have to learn about these matters in such a fashion. Notification must have come from the Department of Veterans Affairs, yet it certainly did not reach my office or the office of any of the other 92 members of this chamber. Such a situation is absolutely ridiculous.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will study the transcript of today's proceedings in order to understand more fully the detailed question posed by the Honourable Senator Marshall. It is certainly not the practice in the Senate to table every order in council. However, if there is information which should be brought to the attention of the Senate, an earnest effort will be made to obtain and present that information to the members of this chamber. The honourable senator might wish to submit a question inviting a detailed written answer, or he might wish to pose a question in due course during Question Period.

Senator Marshall: I say to the Leader of the Government that I will not do that any more, because I will likely get an answer six months from now. All I would ask is that the Leader of the Government contact the new Minister of Veterans Affairs and ask him to investigate within his department why this communication did not go out to everybody in Parliament—not only to the members of the other place but also to the members of the Senate, who are just as interested in the fate of the veterans of Canada as are the members of the other place.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Just so that we can understand, do you know if the members of the other place received that information?

Senator Marshall: I am sure they did.

Senator Frith: But you don't know.

Senator Marshall: It appeared in the press; that is how I became aware of it. Why should it appear in the press when we don't receive it?

STATUTE LAW (MILITARY AND CIVILIAN WAR PENSIONS, COMPENSATION AND ALLOWANCES) AMENDMENT ACT, 1980

REPORT OF HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE COMMITTEE
TABLED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table a report entitled They Served—We Care by the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science. This report is a study of the benefits for veterans and their families.

I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate and the Debates of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see appendix, p. 2851)

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I move that this report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

THE CONSTITUTION

PUBLICITY CAMPAIGN OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I have a question for the Leader of the Government. We are witnessing in the province of Quebec a publicity campaign on the Prime Minister's constitutional propositions that this house has been debating for over a year now. Could the government leader tell us under which authority the government can spend money on such advertising while Parliament has not yet voted on it. I wonder if the government leader does not support the view that such publicity by the government shows its utter contempt for Parliament and also the fact that the Commons and the Senate are mere rubber stamps for this government?

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I feel that the use of the word "propaganda" is unfair to the government. The government is engaged in a program of education and of providing information in the spirit of freedom of information and of access to information.

[Senator Frith.]

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Contempt of Parliament.

Senator Perrault: Does the Leader of the Opposition really believe that nothing at all should be done by the national government to explain to the people of Canada some of the ideas and proposals pertaining to the Constitution, and does he believe that the entire field should be left open to separatists, wherever they exist, who are engaged in the propagation of their views on a massive scale? Indeed, one of the issues this past week in one of the provinces was the allegation that anti-federal literature was being poured into the school system by a separatist government. Surely, the Leader of the Opposition, as a good federalist, should be more enthusiastic about a process which strives to inform the people of the value of the federal system and of the constitutional options which may be open to them.

• (2040)

Senator Flynn: I do not understand why the Leader of the Government says that the government feels it is necessary to educate the people when we just heard from Senator Buckwold that all Canadians favour the charter. This is a contradiction which I do not understand.

If the separatist government of Quebec does something which does not receive our approval, that should not be used as an excuse by the federal government to do likewise. The Quebec government is doing something which I do not consider to be proper, but it is equally improper for the federal government to go over my head before I have made a decision and to tell the people that it wants this to be passed by Parliament. I have a right to make my own decision. I think it is unfair to push the proposal and to spend money in this way. Would the Leader of the Government tell me under what authority or under what item in the budget these monies have been spent for that purpose?

I realize that the government can educate the people about programs that have been adopted and that are in force, but it cannot educate the people about something that is before Parliament and that Parliament has not, as yet, accepted. This is an entirely different situation. I would ask the Leader of the Government to tell me under what authority the federal government can spend money for something that has not yet been adopted by Parliament.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice and inquiries will go forward.

I would again repeat that this government is not prepared to see the integrity and unity of this nation dismantled by those whose main political goals are the dismemberment of Canada. The massive provincial propaganda campaign, which the Leader of the Opposition well knows exists in the province of Quebec, has been initiated by the premier of that province and his colleagues. Its distortions of federal intentions and parliament's constitutional proposals should offend and be opposed by every right-thinking Canadian.

Senator Flynn: I may inform the Leader of the Government that the National Assembly of Quebec has, by a vote of 111 to 9, including members of the official opposition, the Liberal Party of Quebec, officially indicated its opposition to the proposal made by the federal government. It is the expressed opinion of the National Assembly that it opposes the constitutional package of Mr. Trudeau. This is quite different from the situation here in Ottawa, since the government has not obtained that approval.

I may say that, if the Prime Minister had not pushed his proposal in the way he did, there would be no separatist government in Quebec. If he had been wise enough to wait until after the provincial election, we would have had a federalist party in office in Quebec and we would have been able to deal with this question in a more reasonable way. The current situation is the responsibility of the present government.

Senator Perrault: Of course, the Leader of the Opposition is engaged in partisan nit-picking again.

Senator Flynn: Oh!

Senator Perrault: The parties of Canada who support the federal system and who want to preserve the integrity of this nation have a massive communications task before them at the present time.

Senator Flynn: Ask Mr. Ryan.

Senator Perrault: Regardless of what policy priorities are established by provincial parties, and regardless of those party labels, there is a responsibility for those who believe in the federal system and the integrity of this country to explain the value of unity to the people of Canada. I make no apology on behalf of the government for its efforts to make certain that the people of every province know the value of the federal system and the importance of keeping Canada united, and the constitutional options which are being advanced by Parliament to make this an even better country.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, can I believe my ears? Here is the gentleman opposite telling us that we should do our duty by the federal system, and that we would go out into the streets and proclaim the unity of Canada when the federal system has been defined for us by the Supreme Court of this country. The federal system has been defined for us, and it is not unilateral action on the part of the federal government of this country.

We take the stand that we are the true federalists in this dispute. We are the people who are saying, legalities to one side, the constitutional convention has been confirmed, and we have been told that we are violating that convention and violating the federal system and everything that has been built up over the years if we proceed in this unilateral fashion which has been threatened tonight in the statement received from the Prime Minister of Canada.

How can any gentleman opposite get up and say—and as the federal propaganda machine in Quebec has said that unilateral action on the part of the federal government is good politics, good government, good leadership and good statesmanship in Canada? It simply is not. Maybe that is what we are going to get, but we will regret it.

One thing we are doing is giving those who do not believe in the federal system—and there are some in this country—one of the most effective weapons that they could seek to beat down the federal system; that is why we are worried.

I agree with my leader. We do not want to take a partisan position on this matter although that is how it is developing in this chamber tonight, because none of us feels partisan about it. We are Canadians first, and we are seeking a way to reconcile the differences in this country in order to achieve a harmonious solution to a most difficult and perplexing problem.

We are being asked to endorse confrontationalism. I do not say that the “rights” are all on one side. I am not prepared to endorse everything that the provinces in this country want, but neither am I prepared to endorse everything that the federal government wants. I do not detect a real spirit and feeling of compromise in the atmosphere today. To say that we should regard the attitude of the federal government as consistent with federalism in this country is something which escapes me entirely, and I only hope that in the discussions to come the prudence we have heard about will, in fact, prevail and that we will decide that we will not move until we get that kind of meeting of minds which can be obtained. If some of us have to put aside some of the things we cherish, some of the things we really believe in, or some of our desires in this matter, perhaps it would be well for us to do so, because I do not think that to move in the present atmosphere is conducive to harmony towards the unity of this country.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, in reply to that statement made in a state of high dudgeon by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, may I say that history will judge which party has laboured to preserve the integrity of the federal system, the integrity of this nation and the rights of all Canadians. History will judge. Leave the ultimate judgment to history. In the meantime, there will be many opportunities in this chamber and the other place to debate the Constitution and the implications of proposed changes.

Senator Roblin: Two days?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, consider the scenario before us: federal opposition spokesmen and certain provincial spokesmen from across the country have been asking the Prime Minister to show “flexibility.” In response, he has offered a range of six dates, and now he has accepted the proposal of the premiers to meet in early November; and he has said that he will meet for as many hours and days as are required to set forth provincial and federal views. Yet, despite this conciliatory response by the government, tonight we have this astonishing and highly partisan display by the official opposition. I wonder which party is trying to keep Canada united, and which party is dividing Canadians. Does this display by the opposition tonight serve the nation or, indeed, the Senate.

Senator Flynn: Certainly not what you are saying.

Senator Perrault: If the Prime Minister had refused to have further meetings with the premiers, I suggest that this, too, would have elicited the same opposition response, because it is quite obvious that this display of pre-programmed synthetic opposition rage was orchestrated in advance of the sitting tonight. I suggest that the same words would have been spoken by Honourable Senators Flynn and Roblin, regardless of the prime minister's reply to the premiers. It did not matter what the Prime Minister was going to offer tonight, the response would have been the same.

Senator Flynn: No, sir.

Senator Perrault: May I suggest to the opposition, whose members, at times, do demonstrate a support for the letter and the spirit of the parliamentary system, that we should wait until that meeting is held; wait until the Prime Minister sits down with those premiers, and they discuss the Constitution in a spirit of co-operative provincial-federal relations. Let us wait to see what comes of this process.

Not all of those who believe in the federal system are members of only one party in this country. There are people in many parties who love Canada and who are trying to preserve this federal system, but they have differing views regarding the Constitution and the way in which to guard human rights. There are people at the provincial level who truly believe that the course of action which they advocate is the right course of action. Scripture says something about the value of sitting down and reasoning together. There is some merit to that process. This is the process in which we are engaged.

● (2050)

Are these charges against the government reasonable? Are they fair? In their own hearts, do honourable senators really believe that this or any other federal government should sit by idly while a separatist leader of one of our provinces—a leader who has re-affirmed his intention to break up the country through a second referendum—

Senator Flynn: What about the other seven premiers?

Senator Perrault: Do honourable senators truly believe that a separatist-inspired publicity campaign directed toward the young people in any of our provinces should go unanswered by the federal government? Of course not! We believe that such campaigns which distort the intentions of Parliament must be countered. All honourable senators, regardless of party, believe in the federal system, and we must be prepared to defend that system. But, as I say, let history decide whether the actions of this government have been proper and in the interests of this nation.

Senator Donahoe: Honourable senators, I should like to address a supplementary question to the Leader of the Government.

The question which was put and which we are now discussing is whether or not there is any legal authority for the federal government to spend public money to support a program of propaganda backing its position on the Constitution. That is the question.

[Senator Flynn.]

The Leader of the Government has seen fit to reply by going off on a number of irrelevancies and has attempted to say that the government is justified in spending that money because the position which is being justified is the position of the Liberal Party.

Senator Perrault: Who said that?

Senator Donahoe: My question is a simple one: Does the Leader of the Government in the Senate maintain that there is no distinction between the Liberal Party and the Government of Canada?

Senator Perrault: Let me in turn ask the honourable senator this question.

Senator Donahoe: No. I am asking the question and you should answer it.

Senator Perrault: I stated earlier that the question would be taken as notice. I do not know the source of that funding at the present time. That is a perfectly proper reply.

The honourable senator talks about the federal advertising campaign in Quebec. I wonder if the honourable senator would send me copies of the advertisements which the federal government is alleged to have circulated in the province of Quebec. Would he send them over? I suggest that the honourable senator has not seen the campaign and is commenting on something of which he has no direct knowledge. Has the honourable senator reviewed the literature which is being circulated by the federal government in the province of Quebec? Does he have copies at his desk or in his office?

Senator Flynn: Do you deny it?

Senator Donahoe: Do you deny that there is such a campaign?

Senator Perrault: I understand that there is an informational campaign in the province of Quebec with respect to the Constitution and constitutional proposals. I have promised further information, but I hardly think it advances the sum of human knowledge for any honourable senator to rise in this place and attack a campaign of which he has no direct knowledge.

Senator Flynn: It was mixed up with beer and other advertisements during the television coverage of the baseball game yesterday. It was a mixture of beer commercials, commercials by C.S.N., and commercials on the coming vote.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, may I rise just for one purpose, namely, to attempt to defuse any allegation that concern over the constitutional issues we are facing is a partisan matter. I do not think anyone can accuse me of being a partisan Tory, but I am completely in conformity with the sentiments expressed by Senator Roblin.

This matter far transcends our partisan considerations. It reaches into the very heart of the existence of our nation. My honourable leader over there says that history will judge, but history will judge us now. Now is the time. Our country is more important than the Liberal Party or the Conservative Party, and if anybody tries to impugn my Canadianism or my large "L" or small "l" liberalism, then I do not think that we have a country. Think, honourable senators; forget your partisanship and let us try to pull this country together. It is the responsibility of all honourable senators to do that. That is our ultimate raison d'être.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jack Marshall: They have not got the guts to do that.

Senator Lang: Why are we in this small group sitting over here? We are trying to impress on people that this issue far transcends partisan politics. Our country was built on compromise, accommodation and reasonableness. That is the nature of Canadianism. Any constitution imposed on this country that has no political legitimacy will not work. To try to impose liberty in the name of, for instance, a bill of rights, is the worst form of tyranny. Once you try to impose "liberty", you deny it.

Let us be reasonable and let us forget our partisanship. I am standing here tonight because I am a big "L" and a little "l" liberal. Let us forget any allegations and confrontations, because these issues are far too important and will require the best of everyone of us. We can make a contribution to Canada that will transcend anything that has ever occurred in this chamber. It could go down in history as being a mark of a mature nation.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

PROTECTION OF CANADIAN URANIUM INDUSTRY

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I have a question to put to Senator Austin. The question is not as disruptive in nature as the previous one, but Senator Austin in a recent interview claimed that market conditions and U.S. insensitivity and negativism forced the Canadian government to seek the protection of an international cartel for the uranium industry. Could the minister tell us whether or not certain American-owned uranium producers in Canada, or, for that matter, Canadian producers in Canada, were reluctant to participate in the cartel and that they were, in effect, forced to do so by the Canadian government?

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State): Honourable senators, I will have to ask Senator Flynn to have that question put to the minister responsible by one of his colleagues in the other place.

Senator Flynn: As you are a minister of the Crown, you have the responsibility to reply to statements that you make outside the Senate. If you are telling me that you will not reply to the question, that is your right, but I am still entitled to put the question to you.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, the question that Senator Flynn has put is one that seeks information other than that which I have given in the very general narrative he has regarding certain events that took place in the uranium industry.

Senator Flynn: You say that you are not responsible for the attitude of the present government toward the so-called uranium cartel. In any event, were you not invited to be a member of the cabinet in order to advise the government on that burning issue?

Senator Austin: The specific question Senator Flynn puts seeks information on detailed actions which took place in the past, and that kind of information must come from the minister responsible.

I must say, as Senator Flynn gives me the opportunity, that I think that the government followed a remarkably enlightened and intelligent program—

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: But was it legal?

Senator Austin: —in the support of the Canadian uranium industry in the international market, which certainly was legal.

Senator Flynn: Do you, then, agree with the action of the Attorney General in prosecuting those uranium producers, and in not making any charges against the deputy minister at the time?

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, let me say that I know nothing of the contents of any report given to the Attorney General about uranium producers. I know nothing of the basis for any allegations. We can only await disclosure of such information in due course and in the proper way. I am sure that the former Minister of Justice would understand that.

• (2100)

Senator Flynn: I am sure that that type of decision of the Attorney General is made by the cabinet and all its members.

Senator Austin: He denied that. He does not disclaim responsibility as Attorney General of Canada.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

REFUGEES FROM EASTERN EUROPE—ADMISSION TO CANADA— POSSIBLE INCREASE IN QUOTA—ECONOMIC AID TO POLAND

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I want to elaborate on a question posed last week by Senator Haidasz on which I asked a supplementary. It has to do with the immigration laws of our country and the fact that there are certain restrictions on refugees from other countries who are presently in Canada and those who want to enter Canada. Is there any differentiation between the qualifications of ordinary refugees under Canada's immigration laws and those that apply to foreign hockey players who wish to enter Canada? There would appear to be no restrictions when a National Hockey League team requests immigrant status for a foreign hockey player. It would seem that they do not have to abide by the law which stipulates that they cannot fill a position for which a Canadian can qualify.

Could the Leader of the Government qualify that and produce an answer in the near future?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that question was, in fact, answered, at least in part, last week. It is quite conceivable that a hockey player could be a political refugee. I believe that the Stastny brothers, who are now playing for the Quebec Nordiques with great success, left Czechoslovakia in a rather unorthodox fashion. However, I would be pleased to ascertain the facts of that case. They certainly did not leave Czechoslovakia under normal and established circumstances.

The Vancouver Canucks also have at least two Czech hockey players on their team this year. Incidentally, largely as a result of the work of the Stastny brothers, the Canucks lost 6-3 to Quebec last night.

The Czechs playing for Vancouver are not refugees. They left Czechoslovakia in a manner which was satisfactory to both the Czechoslovakian and Canadian governments. They applied, I understand, for work permits to play for the Vancouver Canucks. I suppose the case could be made: Are there other Canadian hockey players who might have qualified to play and to score goals for Vancouver as well as the Czech "imports"? I cannot answer that question. Obviously, however, there may be a difference between the Stastny brothers playing for the Quebec Nordiques and the Czechoslovakians playing for the Vancouver Canucks. I shall attempt to obtain further information for Senator Marshall.

Senator Marshall: Will the Leader of the Government assure the Senate that he will find out if hockey players have to comply with the same rules and regulations as any ordinary person who is applying for entry into Canada under our immigration laws?

Senator Perrault: I was, in a peripheral manner, involved in the case of the two players Bubla and Hlinka who came from Czechoslovakia. I want to assure Honourable Senator Marshall that as far as I know, they arrived in Canada to work here temporarily as hockey players, and all Canadian laws and regulations were observed.

TRANSPORT

THUNDER BAY—GRAIN SHIPMENTS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to take the opportunity to elicit some information from the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. He apparently received a telegram recently from the Dominion Marine Association in what they described as:

—a shocking waste of ship capacity in the light of the short operational period yet available . . . and the opportunities for record export shipments.

They are referring, of course, to the shipping activities in Thunder Bay at the Lakehead.

Would the minister confirm that he has received that protest? If so, has he anything to say about it?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I have received a telegram protesting the situation that was stated to be existing at Thunder Bay. Mr. Radke, the Acting Grain Coordinator, has replied to a similar telegram that he received, and I do not know whether Senator Roblin would be interested in the information that is contained in it. I would be quite happy to send it to him or to relate it now in the Senate.

Senator Roblin: I would be pleased to have it, but my real point is whether the minister agrees that the protest is justified? Is there an unreasonable delay at the Lakehead? Has a delay taken place?

Senator Argue: From what I can see I do not think there has been. Perhaps I should read the reply to the telegram. It is from C. D. Radke, Acting Grain Coordinator, to Rear Admiral Timbrell, President of the Dominion Marine Association. It reads as follows:

My telex Oct. 9 responded to yours of October 7 concerning grain vessel delays at Thunder Bay. I indicated that although any delay was unacceptable delays to that point in week 10 should probably be considered minimal as rail-ship interface returned to "SYNC" following grain handlers strike. Longer delays are now being experienced and I wish to put this in perspective in order to assure continued cooperation of all elements of transportation system.

Following strike settlement September 17 remainder of week 7 saw 16 ships clear port. 21 ships cleared in each of weeks 8 and 9 with virtually no berthing delays. In week 10 from October 3 to 10, no less than 30 ships were cleared, some half million tonnes of grain. Elevator stocks fell to lowest levels since 1973, i.e. 729 thousand tonnes, and berthing delays of one and two days were not uncommon.

Turning to week 11, Tuesday Oct. 14 following Thanksgiving holiday weekend 21 grain ships were in port of which seven loading. Anticipate 21 ships will clear by weekend. As of noon Oct. 16 nine are loading and six waiting. With those uncleared this week and new arrivals over weekend anticipate 20 grain ships in port to begin week 12.

I would emphasize excellent job done by ships, elevators and railways since strike despite difficulties of fresh start-up of system in mid-September. There is no villain in this story covering slightly less than 2 million tonnes of grain loaded in a month, 88 ships cleared and rail unloads back to the 6,200 car level in week 10, maintaining this in short week 11. We anticipate 6,800 unloads in week 12, plateauing at 7,200 in week 13 i.e. 470 thousand tonnes per week. This should bring shipping situation back to normal in week 12 thus seeing us over the major cyclical problem of the post strike start-up.

I recognize the hardship this problem has caused DMA member fleets and I am grateful for their support through it. Outlook is excellent for the rest of the season contingent of course on salty loadings in St. Lawrence and continued good weather.

The very encouraging information in this telegram is that the unloads at Thunder Bay have increased from some 5,000, or a little more, per week for a period of about three months before the strike to 6,800 unloads in week 12, and perhaps to 7,200 in week 13.

What has really happened because of the strike and the resulting settlement is that the workers went back with enthusiasm and goodwill and prepared to work as they are working beyond the five-day week, two shifts every day. The proof of the pudding is really in the eating, namely, they have increased their handling through Thunder Bay at this point by as much as 40 per cent. Therefore, we should be grateful for the very good job being done by everybody involved in Thunder Bay.

Senator Roblin: I guess Senator Godfrey would understand me when I say there is nothing like blinding the boys with science, because if you get sufficient number of minutes of bafflegab on the record it is very hard to discern the wheat from the chaff.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Wouldn't you quote those figures?

Senator Roblin: They are wonderful figures. I love them. That is not my question though. I am not alleging that the grain movement has stopped at the Lakehead.

Senator Frith: You said "unreasonable delays."

Senator Roblin: No. I am asking whether the allegations made by the Dominion Marine Association are true. They have stated in their information the number of ships that were delayed and the number of days involved. I was merely wondering whether or not that was true. I do not deny the fact that the grain is moving through the port. Thank heavens for that. I want to find out whether there is any basis for the complaint. The minister can say yes or no.

● (2110)

Senator Argue: There may be some reason for the complaint. I am not trying to deny that. But I believe there is some explanation for the situation that existed immediately after the strike ended. Because of the strike, the railway companies had closed down their system of delivering grain to Thunder Bay. As soon as the strike ended the railways did their best to get the cycle moving again. However, it takes some time to get the complete system moving. I spoke to the Vice President of CNR and to officials of CPR, who told me it would take some weeks for the system to reach full operation to the point that there could be the same kind of short turnaround period that existed in the past. The telegram that Mr. Radke sent to Admiral Timbrell would indicate that the railways are now back in full operation, that the system is functioning adequately. The workers at Thunder Bay are doing a good job, although there have been some delays. The honourable senator will recall the old threshing crews who operated many years ago. Often a teamster would arrive at the threshing machine before the person in front had finished unloading his grain, and people operating the equipment were not at all embarassed if teamsters were sitting on the rack taking it easy while someone else was unloading.

I know it is inconvenient for ships to have to wait and I am not trying to justify the situation, but we should be grateful that the markets are adequate and that the railway system is functioning to capacity. I know that some ships are waiting in port to be unloaded, but we should thank God that at times we have an excess of ships rather than few ships waiting to be unloaded.

I believe the system is working well. However, I shall be happy to provide the honourable senator with a more adequate answer. I readily agree that the official reply could not tell him whether three ships waited an extra two days or provided any detailed information. I repeat that the system is functioning well. Ship loadings have been large and the outlook generally is optimistic.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

UNITED NATIONS

FOOD AND AGRICULTURE ORGANIZATION—WORLD FOOD DAY

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, a few moments ago I was on my feet to welcome the Minister of State responsible for the Wheat Board. I understand that he was the sole Canadian representative at the FAO meeting in Rome last week. Can he confirm that, and state whether he made any official announcement at that meeting or at any other meeting in Europe?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I had the honour to represent the Prime Minister at the World Food Day, and on his behalf I read a statement that had been given to me. In the formal proceedings I was the only representative of the Canadian government. It was my first time in Rome, and my first FAO meeting. I felt proud of the role Canada has played over the years. As a matter of fact, during the period following the end of World War II, when the FAO was first established, I was able, on behalf of the Canadian government, to detail the sort of contribution to the World Food Program that Canada is making today. But I made no new announcements recently in Rome.

TRANSPORT

WESTERN CANADA—REDUCTION OF RAIL PASSENGER SERVICE

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. I might say that I was in a considerable dilemma in deciding to whom I should address my question. In addressing it to the government leader, I wish to say that Senators Argue, Olson and Austin should feel that the question is addressed to them also and that they too can reply to it, because those honourable senators are all from western Canada and they have something in common in relation to my question.

The Canadian government has seen fit to make an order in council, which adopts the policy of the Honourable Jean-Luc Pepin, the Minister of Transport, regarding the elimination of rail passenger services in western Canada.

I realize, of course, that the minister has eliminated rail passenger services in a number of other places, including eastern Canada. I do not believe that central Canada has been similarly affected. My question, which really is addressed to all four honourable senators, is: Do the western ministers approve of the policy of the Minister of Transport with respect to the discontinuance of vital passenger services in western Canada?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there is a proposal before the Senate that the subject matter of VIA Rail be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications. There will therefore be an opportunity to debate VIA Rail policies during the course of the debate to refer the matter to committee, and also in committee itself.

I have before me a document which is too lengthy to be read tonight. It explains, in part, the position of the government with respect to VIA Rail. I should be pleased to incorporate the highlights of that document into today's proceedings.

The question was addressed to me as a western minister. I have made representations to the Minister of Transport concerning certain routes in western Canada. For example, Senator Bell is aware of the fact that the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway is still in operation, and I have made suggestions concerning other routes affecting the Province of British Columbia. I have also put forward proposals for improvements in the rail service being provided for the people of my province, and, hopefully, certain services can remain in the future.

It might be constructive to have some factual information provided for the Senate, perhaps as a basis for further questions by honourable senators in the weeks to come. I shall therefore be pleased to incorporate this material in the record of today's proceedings in a spirit of co-operation.

Senator Donahoe: I have a further question. I understand, from the answer just given, that the minister does approve of the policy of the Minister of Transport.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I understand the reasons which have prompted this action by the government. May I suggest at least some of those reasons this evening, if the honourable senator wishes me to do so?

Senator Donahoe: In view of the fact that the matter is before a committee—

Senator Perrault: It is not yet before the committee. We are debating the resolution to refer the matter to committee. Knowing the honourable senator's concern for parliamentary decorum, perhaps he will permit me to make a brief statement.

Improved highways, increased use of private automobiles, expansion of bus services and extraordinary growth of air travel have all eroded rail's traditional share of the passenger market.

That has happened in connection with many routes in Canada. I recall one parliamentary committee, on which I served while in the other place, discussing the discontinuance of certain rail lines.

An Hon. Senator: The Bullet.

Senator Perrault: The so-called "Bullet" in Newfoundland was one of those services where a decline in patronage was a very real factor.

Decline in patronage is not due to downgrading of services by railways, but rather to passengers' choice of other modes.

Rail passenger services have a role to play, but not the same role as thirty years ago. Some adjustments are necessary.

It was not an easy decision for the Minister of Transport to make. Discontinuance of rail service is no way to win a political popularity contest.

The situation facing the government is as follows: mounting operating deficits; old, unreliable equipment—the average age of the equipment being 25 years; limited financial resources at government's disposal.

• (2120)

The decision was to hold operating deficits steady through reductions of under-utilized, expensive and inefficient routes; to invest substantially in new equipment for routes with good potential; to make changes now to free up money for investment and to allow VIA Rail to get on a firm footing.

With regard to budgetary considerations, and to give some idea of the financial problem facing the government—and the honourable senator has cabinet experience—the figures are as follows: 1977-78, operating costs, $209.1 millions—for a total of $209.1 million. 1980-81, operating costs, $332.1 million; capital costs, $117.5 million—for a total of $449.6 million. Going down to the projected figures for 1983-84, the details are: operating costs, $355 million; capital costs, $182 million—for a total of $537 million. These are enormous increases in costs. There is an increase of over $300 million anticipated from fiscal 1977-78.

Even with reductions in service, the government is spending more than ever before on the rail passenger service.

For the first time a three-year commitment has been given to VIA Rail to allow that entity to plan more rationally.

The average government subsidy per ticket, over the entire system, is $70 out of the taxpayers' pocket.

The honourable senator may choose to debate this matter, and perhaps the time to do so would be when we debate the reference to committee of the matter of VIA Rail.

The transcontinental service, alone, accounts for half of the total losses. The average subsidy per transcontinental ticket is $160 out of the pocket of the Canadian taxpayer. Perhaps the honourable senator will wish to dispute these figures, but I am putting them on the record as the figures which have been produced by the Minister of Transport.

The criteria for route selection are as follows: first, concentration on high-density, inter-city services; second, maintenance of single transcontinental service; third, maintenance, with reduction in frequency, of remote services where no adequate alternative to rail exists; fourth, services dominated by commuter traffic to be offered to provinces; fifth, discontinuance of services with low load factors and low revenue/cost ratio.

The changes, as honourable senators are aware, are scheduled to take place on November 15, 1981, with the exception of commuter services, which are extended to the summer of 1982 to allow the provinces time to arrange transfer.

With regard to the reasons for not having public hearings, we will put these on the record, and then the honourable senator will be able to debate the matter at some future time.

Hearings have already been held by the CTC on virtually all routes affected in the last four to five years.

Given the ceiling on expenditures of about $500 million, the CTC would have been forced to recommend reductions even after public hearings, which could last another three or four years, with the continuance of these massive subsidies on the part of the Canadian taxpayer of the order I have described earlier. In the meantime, less and less money would be available for new equipment.

By taking a decision now, investment can begin immediately and new equipment will be operating in eastern and western Canada within two years, the amounts saved by not having hearings amounting to $100 million. This is a very controversial decision; everyone admits that. The minister said he would have preferred another route. The honourable senator is aware of that. The National Transportation Act, section 64, clearly allows government to make changes by order in council. In terms of intermodal comparisons, figures are put forward under various headings, such as the number of passengers, net government spending and the spending per passenger by the government. Without giving this whole chart, rail is $70 per passenger, bus is $5 per passenger, air is $10 per passenger.

The level of cost recovery is as follows: rail, 30 per cent; bus and car 55 per cent; air, 54 per cent. Incidentally, included in the bus figure is also the car figure. In other words, the mode of road travel includes bus and car.

I have other figures here which I will be pleased to place on the record, but which I do not propose to read now. These concern energy consumption and intermodal comparisons. I would be pleased to put that on the record of today's proceedings.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The table follows:)

Intermodal comparisons

	road
	rail	bus	car	air
number of passengers	7 m.	35 m.	480 m.*	35 m.

	road
	rail	bus	car	air

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have taken rather a long time to reply to the question, but the question of VIA Rail is, I know, of interest to many senators.

Senator Donahoe: Honourable senators, perhaps my final supplementary is unnecessary, but I would like to ask the minister this. Am I correct in believing that in arriving at his approval of the minister's policy, he was not in any way guided by any representations that were made at public hearings?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that premise is not correct. There have been CTC hearings on virtually all of these routes over the past four or five years.

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, is it not true, though, that the CTC had recommended keeping these lines alive?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I will take that question as notice. I have presented the extent of the information available from the Minister of Transport, and I am going to leave it at that for this evening.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

I wonder if the honourable senator would indicate to the Senate if the appointment of a second cabinet minister from British Columbia can be construed as the first step in the double tracking that was promised?

Senator Perrault: It is better than opposition "double talking."

AIRPORTS—COST OF OPERATION

Hon. Daniel Riley: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Has the leader any comments to make on the $1 million per week deficit at Mirabel airport, and has he translated that deficit into the cost in respect of each passenger ticket on planes leaving Mirabel?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is my understanding of the intermodal comparisons I provided earlier that they do take into account the cost of providing passenger service, which in the air category would, I understand, take into account passenger costs at Mirabel airport. However, the question will be taken as notice.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I wonder if the Leader of the Government would also obtain the figures as to the cost of maintaining each airport in Canada, and what those airports contribute to the cost of that maintenance, which I understand is as low as 10½ to 12 per cent. Who is paying the difference? It must be the Government of Canada.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I hope that the Honourable Senator Marshall does not expect an answer at 2 o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

Senator Marshall: No. I will give you until Thursday at noon!

Senator Perrault: Well, it will be a "guestimate," if you want that.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): October 1983.

THE ECONOMY

INFLATION—INTEREST RATES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I would like to respond to a question asked on October 15 by the Honourable Senator Charbonneau concerning recent OECD figures and comparisons of living standards among OECD countries.

I am informed that the OECD figures referred to by the honourable senator indeed indicate that Canada had dropped from third to twelfth place in its standard of living compared to other OECD countries. I would suggest, however, that the figures used for the study do not provide a reliable indicator of relative living standards. The comparison of absolute living standards across countries is a highly complex matter and necessitates adjustment to a common currency. The OECD, study used observed exchange rates to convert nominal per capita GNP to U.S. dollar values. This procedure is highly questionable for a number of reasons, including the fact that exchange rates can, for substantial periods of time, deviate from the values that make the purchasing power of currencies equal to each other.

I would refer the honourable senator to a more thorough and technically superior study of living standards recently completed by the United Nations. This study looked at 119 countries and concluded that Canada's living standard was lower than those of only four countries Libya, Kuwait, Saudi Arabia and the United States.

UNITED NATIONS

RELIEF AND WORKS AGENCY—POSSIBILITY OF SPECIAL CONTRIBUTION BY CANADA

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on October 14 I was asked a question by the Honourable Senator Macquarrie with regard to the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestinian Refugees. I have an answer which is rather lengthy. I ask that it be incorporated in the proceedings of this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

The United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestinian Refugees in the Near East (UNRWA) has demonstrated since its inception the greatest effectiveness in responding to the needs of the Palestinian people, despite the difficult conditions in the Middle East under which it has had to operate. UNRWA's accomplishments in education, health and food programs have been instrumental in ensuring that the Palestinians have received the assistance that they require. Canada has therefore been concerned over the humanitarian and political implications for the Palestinians, should programs be threatened with suspension or closure due to lack of funds.

Over the years, since the founding of UNRWA, Canada has provided both material and moral support. This has reflected a commitment to continue humanitarian assistance to Palestinians, and our assessment of UNRWA as an agency that is executing effectively its important responsibilities. In formulating the level of Canada's 1981 contribution, it was foreseen that UNRWA would have difficulty in meeting its increased financial requirements for 1981 through voluntary contributions received from donor countries. We therefore increased our 1981 contribution by 30 per cent in comparison with 1980. That includes a cash grant of 2.9 million Canadian dollars and 4.5 million Canadian dollars in wheat flour.

Canada continues to follow closely UNRWA's financial situation, and will also keep in close contact with other major donor countries concerning the problems faced by the agency. When formulating the level of our 1982 contribution, full consideration will be given to UNRWA's difficulties.

THE ENVIRONMENT

NIAGARA RIVER—DUMPING OF NOXIOUS LIQUIDS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on October 14 the Honourable Senator

Muir asked a question concerning the quality of the water in the Niagara River. On June 9, 1981, the Stony Creek Regional Office of the Ontario Ministry of the Environment released a report which stated:

We feel that the water supply of the Niagara River is of acceptable quality.

Environment Canada concurs with that assessment of the situation. The water is safe to drink. It is not great but it is acceptable.

The deputy leader has said that he will drink to that.

However, the federal government continues to be very concerned about the situation. The Niagara River continues to be a priority area of concern for the government. We are pressing the United States to take action in a number of areas.

The Niagara Falls Waste Water Treatment Plant has not functioned properly for over three years. Canada has made numerous representations to the United States by way of diplomatic notes, bilateral meetings, and discussions between officials, to take the necessary action to bring the plant on line. However, the matter has been delayed by a U.S. domestic legal dispute over who should pay for repairs.

The United States Environmental Protection Agency has just announced that $4.4 million will be made available for the repair of the plant.

We are pleased with this development and intend to follow this matter closely. We also intend to request that interim controls be placed on chemical dischargers until these repairs are completed, in order that water quality standards are maintained.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there is one final matter which will be of special interest to those honourable senators from Manitoba.

The U.S. Department of the Interior informs us that Secretary Watt did not announce any government commitment to the Garrison Project during a recent visit to North Dakota.

The rumours may arise from a headline in a Fargo, North Dakota newspaper, "Watt Sees More Garrison Construction". However, this headline is not substantiated by the substance of this article, which will be of some relief, I think, to Honourable Senators Guay, Roblin, and other Manitobans.

According to his office, Secretary Watt made some off-the-cuff comments to the effect that the administration was working with North Dakota to develop some kind of phased concept for construction; however, there are no firm plans at this time. He said that he had come to North Dakota to learn about the project and had flown over the area in question. Secretary Watt also stated that he had no official announcement to make about any administration position, but that he was confident that something could be worked out.

We have received the assurances of the Department of the Interior that there has been no change in their position.

The Senate Appropriations Committee will consider this week a number of proposals for the Garrison, including one from the Office of Management and Budget, to cut the Garrison appropriation from $4 million to $2.4 million.

The embassy is contacting all senators concerned to ensure that they are aware of Canadian views on this matter.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I should like to thank my honourable friend for his statement with regard to the Garrison Project. It does interest me because, as he says, that is not the impression that was received on the spot by the people concerned. The impression was that Mr. Watt was the first one representing the Reagan administration stating clearly and without question that the Garrison Project had the support of the administration, and that the only things standing in the way of its proceeding was the court action, which my honourable friend may know is taking place now, and the fact that money has not been appropriated. However, just so long as the policy matter stands, as I believe it still does, the position that no money is going to be appropriated still leaves the matter wide open for the future.

I want to hear from the government that the United States administration has given an assurance that it will not use the Garrison system to pollute waters in Manitoba. A positive statement like that would go a long way to make a lot of people in that province very happy. Will my honourable friend do what he can to get such a statement?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it is an important matter for the entire country. I had anticipated that there would be some query in this regard from Honourable Senator Roblin and other honourable senators this evening. That is the reason I brought this information to the Senate. Certainly this situation will be monitored very closely.

Senator Roblin: I am really interested in getting a definite statement from Mr. Watt. If such a statement is made, would my honourable friend be kind enough to produce it so that we can read it for ourselves?

VIA RAIL CANADA INC.

MOTION TO INSTRUCT TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS COMMITTEE TO MAKE STUDY—POINT OF ORDER

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Riley, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bielish:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications be instructed to inquire into and report upon the national rail passenger service provided to Canadians by VIA Rail Canada Inc. and, in particular to examine

- (a) the Federal Government's plans for reorganizing Canada's passenger train services announced by Transport Minister Jean-Luc Pepin on July 27, 1981;
- (b) the changes in passenger train services effected by Order in Council P.C. 1981-2171, dated August 6, 1981, made pursuant to subsection 64(1) of the National Transportation Act; and
- (c) the procedure followed by way of Order in Council P.C. 1981-2171 in varying the Canadian Transport Commission's Orders and Decisions respecting Canada's passenger train services.

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, item No. 2 of the Orders of the Day reads as follows in English:
[English]

15th October—Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Riley, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bielish:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications—

[Translation]

In French, it reads as follows: "That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce—". If I refer to the Rules of the Senate of Canada, it appears that the translation of "Senate Committee on Transport and Communications" is "Comité sénatorial des transports et des communications" and that the translation of "banques et commerce" is "Banking, Trade and Commerce". I think it is important to know which Committee is being referred to.

The Hon. the Speaker: I have the assurance of the Clerk that this will be corrected before our next sitting.

NEWFOUNDLAND

DEVELOPMENT OF HYDRO POWER AND OFFSHORE OIL RESOURCES—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Cook calling the attention of the Senate to certain matters relating to the development of hydro power in Labrador, and to the development of the offshore oil resources of Newfoundland.—(Honourable Senator Marshall).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have discussed this order with Senator Marshall. I believe this was originally Senator Cook's inquiry and, as I believe he knows, at some point I should like to intervene, so far as it relates to the legal aspect of offshore resources, in much the same manner as I did on the question related to Nova Scotia. The order was adjourned in Senator Marshall's name and I spoke to him about it. I believe it is reasonable for us to assume, with regard to Newfoundland, that there are negotiations going on which are somewhat similar to the negotiations that apparently were successful with Nova Scotia. Therefore, no matter what the law is, if administrative arrangements can be worked out, it is desirable for everyone. Senator Cook and I agree on that point.

With Senator Marshall's consent, then, I suggest that we stand this order for, perhaps, two weeks. If something further develops, we can always bring it forward.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

EIGHTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—ORDER DISCHARGED

On the Order:

Consideration of the Eighth Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.—(Honourable Senator Nurgitz).

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I ask leave of the Senate at this time to withdraw this report and let the order be discharged.

I should explain briefly that we objected to a regulation in our report. We discovered, after we had approved the report and it had been tabled in the house, that the regulation had been rescinded. Unfortunately, the letter informing us that it had been rescinded had never been received by our staff, and we were not aware of the fact.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted to discharge the order?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order discharged.

SEVENTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—MOTION FOR ADOPTION—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the seventh report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, which was presented on Tuesday, June 16, 1981.

Hon. John M. Godfrey moved that the report be adopted.

● (2140)

He said: Honourable senators, the Seventh Report of the standing joint committee appears as an appendix to the Senate Hansard of June 16, 1981. In this report the joint committee registers its objections to VIA Rail, and in consequence almost all of the railway passenger services of the country, being established and set up in business pursuant to an involved use of subordinate powers, a dollar vote in an Appropriation Act and three slim regulations. At no time has Parliament had the opportunity to debate and to decide on what are very significant matters.

The report explains in detail how this was done. I will not repeat those details in this speech. However, just to give some idea of the moneys involved, the so-called one dollar vote actually authorizes the Minister of Transport subject to such terms and conditions as may be presented in regulations, to reimburse railway companies such as the CNR and CPR for certain costs incurred by them to the tune of up to $240 million annually. And we have heard tonight from Senator Perrault that that sum has since been increased very substantially.

Our committee in examining regulations operates under certain criteria approved by the Senate and House of Commons. Its principal objections to these regulations comes under its tenth criterion which is as follows:

Whether any Regulation or other Statutory Instrument within its term of reference, in the judgment of the Committee: . . .

10. in the absence of express authority to that effect in the enabling statute or prerogative, appears to amount to the exercise of a substantive legislative power properly the subject of direct parliamentary enactment, and not merely to the formulation of subordinate provisions of the technical or administrative character properly the subject of delegated legislation;

In the opinion of the committee, it is objectionable in principle that relationships between the VIA Rail, the new public railway passenger authority and the railway companies, and the takeover of services should have been settled without parliamentary involvement. The committee delayed making this report because we had some indications from the minister that the actions taken to establish VIA Rail might be regularized by the introduction of a bill by the government. It was only when we were told that the government had decided against the introduction of a bill for a VIA Rail Canada Act that the committee decided to present this report recording in detail its objections to the procedures used.

Our committee had objected in previous reports to the type of procedures used in this instance and had particularly referred to the procedures used to set up VIA Rail.

In its report dealing with the work of the committee between January 1974, and January 27, 1977, it took objection to the making of regulations under votes and appropriation acts. The type of power to which the committee then objected arises:

—when moneys are voted by Parliament to be disbursed for a stated purpose that all the rules governing the expenditure, the determination of eligible recipients and so on, are left to be made by a subordinate authority. Parliament simply hands a sum of money to a subordinate with authority to spend it for a particular purpose, often vaguely stated, as that authority sees fit. The authority then makes a set of rules, often very elaborate, governing the expenditure of the money and, in effect, defining the purpose and objects of Parliament's bounty. Often the financial basis which gives the legal justification for the use of a Vote in an Appropriation Act is a fiction since the money voted is only one dollar.

In its fourth report dated July 17, 1980, the committee specifically objected to the procedures used in VIA Rail Canada when it stated:

The making of extensive subordinate laws on important matters such as VIA Rail Canada Inc. under Votes in Appropriation Acts also produces laws and policies never debated by Parliament. Your Committee's predecessor called for an end to this practice inimical to parliamentary sovereignty.

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance expressed continued concern regarding the use of $1 items in the appropriation acts to amend the legislation enactments in its reports of March 23, 1972, and November 21, 1973. These concerns seemed to have had some effect upon the government of the day because the committee in considering the supplementary estimates in November, 1973, heard evidence from the President of the Treasury Board regarding the use of $1 items in supplementary estimates to amend existing legislation. The President of the Treasury Board stated:

I would heartily agree that if we are changing in substance the act itself, then it should be done by way of an amending bill to the act.

What we have done here, progressively, is to reduce and to eliminate, as far as we can, any substantive changes in legislation through the appropriation acts, even though it is faster and more convenient. The reason that recourse is had to the appropriation acts rather than a separate bill is because it is more economical of time and does not require the apparatus, the overhead, the attention, the energy which a separate bill itself would require.

On April 3, 1974 an official of the Treasury Board stated before the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance:

All that had occurred recently in estimates in relation to the amendment of other acts has been simple changes of financial limits, rather than any matters of substance. For instance, the amount of the loans which may be made to crown corporations might be increased and other changes of a similar nature have been effected.

During a debate in the House of Commons on December 10, 1973, to concur in supplementary estimates, a point of order was raised by Eric Nielsen, M.P., with respect to the use of $1 items to amend statutes. It was contended that these $1 items should properly be brought before the house by way of a separate bill. The debate on this point of order eventually ended with a ruling by the Speaker which, on the basis of principle and a previous ruling in 1971, termed the three specific $1 items in question as "not properly before the house" because they were legislative in nature. The Speaker did point out that $1 items which merely amended a previous appropriation act, although legislative in nature, were not irregular. Again in 1976 the Speaker ruled that an appropriation act is not the place to seek authority to do something such as to establish a program.

In 1977 the Speaker ruled that it makes no difference whether the item attempted to spend a large sum or simply $1.

The test is whether or not the government is putting forward a spending estimate under authority it already possesses, or whether it is really seeking new legislative authority to do something.

It does seem extraordinary, in view of all these rulings of the Speaker of the House of Commons and the statement of the President of the Treasury Board before the National Finance Committee, that the government should have proceeded in the way it did to create VIA Rail by the use of a $1 vote and regulations enacted thereunder.

Since the ruling by the Speaker of the House of Commons in 1977 there has been very little discussion in that house on the subject of $1 items that amend previous legislation, and evidently a point of order was not used by anyone in that house when the VIA Rail item appeared in an appropriation act.

However, on June 12, 1981, the Speaker of the House of Commons on a point of order raised by an opposition M.P. threw out various votes in the 1981-82 estimates on the basis that they were legislative in nature and, therefore, not before the house in proper form.

In her ruling, Madam Speaker said:

That we are dealing here with matters of substance is demonstrated by the fact that vote 45 seeks even to grant to the governor in council the power to pass regulations. By definition, the estimates seek spending authority alone; they are not intended to ask for substantial authority, such as to pass regulations.

Madam Speaker also stated that it is not the role of the Speaker to act on her own initiative in such procedural questions.

She also made a very practical suggestion that should be followed up by the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, namely, that, if all votes included a reference to the statutory authority on which they are based, it would be easier to determine whether or not they were in order.

It would appear, judging by past performance, that governments will continue to slip items into the estimates to be confirmed by appropriation acts which are improper because they are legislative in nature. There are several practical ways to prevent this.

To begin with, individual members of the House of Commons should continue to play the role played in the past by members such as Mr. Nielsen and Mr. Andre who did the necessary research and raised the points of order which resulted in the Speaker's rulings I have referred to. They have the research staff available to do this.

Individual senators could also play a like role because they can also raise a point of order with respect to items in the estimates and in an appropriation bill, and ask for a ruling by the Speaker of the Senate who has the same powers in such matters as the Speaker of the House of Commons.

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance could play a very practical role in this process. They could instruct their research staff to carefully examine the estimates and draw the attention of the committee to items that are out of order. The committee could then point out these items in its report. Any senator could then raise the point of order in the Senate at the appropriate time.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

GOVERNMENT POLICY—MOTION TO REFER SUBJECT MATTER OF INQUIRY TO BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Murray, seconded by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.:

That the subject-matter of the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Argue, P.C., which appeared on the Orders of the Day on November 20, 1980, be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I had hoped to persuade Senator Murray that, in view of the Order for the pre-study of Bill C-48 and "all related matters" as indicated in that Order, the object of his motion has been achieved. However, the honourable senator is not in the chamber tonight, so we shall stand the order, but I wanted him to have a chance to read these observations to see whether he agrees.

Order stands.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Recommendations

1. We recommend that under the Pension Act:

a) the proportionate pension to the spouses and dependents of deceased veterans who were in receipt of a disability pension of 47 per cent or less be paid immediately instead of being phased in over a 6½ year period as in the Statute Law (Military and Civilian War Pensions, Compensation and Allowances) Amendment Act 1980; and

b) the proportionate pension be increased to a percentage of the full pension granted to spouses of deceased veterans equal to twice the assessed degree of the deceased veteran's disability.

2. We recommend that under the Pension Act:

a) the pension at the married rate when it is greater than the widow's/widower's pension continue to be paid for a period of one year to the surviving spouse of a deceased veteran; and

b) the surviving spouse of a deceased veteran in receipt of an Exceptional Incapacity and/or Attendance Allowance continue to receive such allowance for a period of one year following the death of the veteran.

3. We recommend that pension increases reflect the principle of parity with the average wage of five unskilled categories of Public Servants or, the increase in the Consumer Price Index, whichever is the greater, and that this principle be entrenched in the Pension Act.

4. We recommend that all necessary steps be taken immediately to eliminate the unacceptable delays in processing pension applications and in pension adjudications which have accumulated since 1970 and that to this end, particular consideration be given to encouraging essential staff to continue working beyond the normal age of retirement.

5. We recommend that the residence requirement of the War Veterans Allowance Act and the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act be amended to permit otherwise qualified persons to benefit from the legislation while residing outside Canada.

6. We recommend that in the calculation of entitlement to a War Veterans Allowance, the annual exemption for income derived from bank deposits, bonds and dividends be raised to at least $500.

7. We recommend that:

a) the Government appoint a Committee composed of officials from both the government and veterans associations to review and update those recommendations of the Woods Committee which have not been implemented and to identify, study and make recommendations about the anomalies which still exist in the treatment of veterans and their survivors;

b) the Committee study the apparent inequity to a divorced spouse who under existing legislation has no entitlement to benefits under the Pension Act and the War Veterans Allowance Act; and

c) the Committee study the apparent inequity of the way in which veterans are compensated for periods spent as prisoners of war.

Introduction

The Senate received Bill C-40, An Act to amend the Pension Act, the Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act, the War Veterans Allowances Act and the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act, on 10 July 1980, just before the summer recess. Since the legislation embodied many improved benefits for veterans and their families, most parliamentarians wanted these benefits to be received as soon as possible without the delay of several months that the refusal to act quickly would have entailed. Thus, the legislation was passed by the Senate after a brief debate on its principles, without being sent to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science. However, it was agreed that the subject-matter of Bill C-40 would be referred to the Committee ex post facto for study and report. Consequently, on 6 November 1980, the Senate authorized the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Science to examine and report upon the subject-matter of the Statute Law (Military and Civilian War Pensions, Compensation and Allowances) Amendment Act, 1980, Chapter 19, Statutes of Canada, 1980, and any regulations that might be made thereunder. On 19 March 1981 the mandate was extended to the examination and consideration of the Annual Report of the Department of Veterans Affairs for the fiscal year ended 31 March 1980.

An examination of the Statute Law Amendment Act of 1980 (Bill C-40) shows that it introduced a large number of changes into the two most important pieces of legislation which deal with the treatment of veterans: the Pension Act and the War Veterans Allowance Act. Some of these changes were of a minor or "housekeeping" nature; others were of vital importance both in terms of the financial commitment and the number of veterans and their family members who will be affected. Having carefully assessed the treatment of veterans under the legislation, your Committee decided that the major areas of continuing concern were: under the Pension Act, the scheme of proportionate pension payable to the spouses of deceased veterans, the continuation of the pension at the married rate following the death of a veteran, the system by which the pensions are indexed, and the continued existence of unacceptable delays in processing applications and in making adjudications; and, under the War Veterans Allowance Act, the residence requirement and the treatment of investment income. Finally, your Committee found that there are still a number of anomalies in the treatment of veterans and their families. The report which follows deals with these concerns and makes some recommendations for their solution.

Your Committee discussed and approved this Report on Tuesday, 7 July 1981. At the time, Bill C-79, an Act to amend the Veterans' Land Act and to amend the Veterans' Benefit Act in consequence thereof, was before the House of Commons and would inter alia amend the Veterans' Land Act to enable the spouse and dependents of a veteran to enforce their family law rights on property held under the Veterans' Land Act and the Veterans' Benefit Act. The Committee decided to make a recommendation to this effect if the legislation were not passed before the summer adjournment. Prompt passage of the Bill on 9 July has made such a recommendation unnecessary.

Bill C-82, an Act to amend the Pension Act and the Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act, was passed by the Senate on 10 July. It provided for the elimination of the "phasing-in" period of the proportionate pension payable to the spouses and dependents of deceased veterans. Your Committee commends the Acting Minister of Veterans' Affairs, the Honourable J. Gilles Lamontagne for introducing this amendment since the immediate payment of proportionate pensions to eligible spouses and dependents is an essential recommendation of your Committee. Our recommendation (Recommendation 1), however, goes substantially beyond the amendment proposed and adopted by Bill C-82. For this reason, neither the text of the Report nor the wording of Recommendation 1 has been altered. We hope that the Acting Minister will take equally prompt action on this and our other recommendations.

The Committee wishes to acknowledge its gratitude for assistance given in the course of the study and the preparation of its report by the Clerk of the Committee, Mr. Patrick Savoie and by Mr. Henri-Georges Belleau and Mr. Grant Purves of the Research Branch of the Library of Parliament.

The Pension Act

1. The Pension Act has been amended since its inception on 7 July 1919 to keep it up-to-date with changes in the social and economic conditions of veterans. There are, however, a number of areas of concern which have not commanded much attention in the past but which are important today because the majority of veterans are now reaching an age where disabilities and the decreasing capacity to cope with them due to the passage of time, are a serious and growing burden. This burden to a large extent is shared by the veteran's spouses. These spouses have loyally and conscientiously taken care of the incapacitated veterans for a great many years, giving them the affection, security and support they need and enabling them to stay in their own homes instead of in institutions. Although there are a number of spouses who are the husbands of disabled veterans most of them are aging women.

2. Since men do not live as long as women and disabled people tend to have a shorter than average life span there is, yearly, a large number of veterans who die and leave widows behind them. Your Committee is concerned about these women. Since widowers as well as the widows of war veterans were equal partners in marriage, we believe that they have also served and that Canada should care for them. The most important of our concerns are:

The Payment of Proportionate Pensions to Spouses

3. The new legislation allows the spouse of a deceased veteran, who was in receipt of a disability pension of 47 per cent and less, a pension equal to one-half the amount of this disability pension. Similar benefits were extended to the spouses of former prisoners of war who were receiving or were entitled to receive Prisoner of War Compensation at the time of their deaths.

4. Your Committee is satisfied with the spirit and positive philosophy of the legislation, but we cannot agree with the decision to "phase-in" these benefits over a six and one-half year period and to set a spouse's pension at one-half the deceased veteran's disability pension.

5. It appears, on the basis of testimony before the Committee, that about 20,000 or 75 per cent of the estimated number of eligible spouses, most of whom are women, will not qualify for benefits until 1984 or later. Many widows of both World War I and World War II pensioners are now in their late seventies or mid-eighties. Obviously, taking mortality rates into account, many will not live to enjoy the benefits. It is also probable that a great number of widows will not gain much additional income from a proportionate pension at current levels. If they are receiving an allowance under the War Veterans Allowance Act, this may be reduced by part or all of the amount of the proportionate pension because the allowance is income-tested.⁽¹⁾

6. The proportionate pension paid is only equal to half of the deceased veteran's disability pension if this disability pension was assessed at 47 per cent or less at the time of death. Widows of pensioners whose disability was assessed at 48 per cent or more, however, qualify for the full spouse's pension of $608.60. There is as a result a large and unjust difference in the treatment of widows receiving the maximum award and those entitled to the proportionate pension. For many years, veterans' associations have urged that the government adopt a proportionate pension based on the relationship between twice the degree of the veteran's disability and the full spouse's pension. This proposal has received the support of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs of the House of Commons which on 10 June 1975 unanimously recommended that:

"When, at the time of death of the prisoner [pensioner?] he was, or would have been in receipt of a pension assessed at 47% or less, pension be paid to the widow in double proportion to the assessed degree of the pensioner's disability as it relates to the basic pension granted for widows.

At the present time a full widow's pension is paid when the pensioner's death was attributable to or incurred during wartime military service, or in the case of peacetime forces if it arose out of or was directly connected with service, or when the pensioner's disability was assessed at 48% or more at the time of death. The effect of this would be that because 100% widow's pension is payable when the disability pensioner was paid at the 50% rate, a double proportion would be payable if his disability was assessed at a lesser rate, so that, for example, the widow of a 40% pensioner would be awarded 80% of the normal widow's pension."⁽²⁾

The difference in benefits to eligible spouses, as of 1 January 1981, can be illustrated as follows:

Pension Payable to Spouse of Deceased Veteran

Degree of deceased veteran's disability and size of his/her disability pension as percent of the full disability pension	Pension paid to spouse under existing legislation	Pension payable at double the rate of disability as per cent of full spouse's pension	Difference
45% ($456.44)	$228.22	$547.74	$319.52
40% ($405.74)	$202.87	$486.88	$284.01

Figures taken from Canada, Senate, Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, Proceedings, 1st Session, 32nd Parliament, 17 March 1981, 4:6.

7. The government estimated that about 1,500 widows and 600 children would become eligible on 1 October 1980, with 26,000 widows and 10,000 dependent children receiving the new benefits by the time the legislation became fully effective. This estimate turned out to be inaccurate. The number of applicants and enquiries concerning eligibility for awards for the first two groupings, that is 1 October 1980 and 1 June 1981, has been half the estimated total number.⁽³⁾

8. This may be due to a feeling by some widows that the pension is a form of welfare or charity, rather than theirs by right, and they are too proud to ask for it. Others may not be aware that they are eligible in spite of efforts by the Department of Veterans Affairs, the Legion and other veterans' associations to inform potential recipients and to contact the spouses of pensioners who died before the effective date of the legislation.

9. Your Committee is aware that the financial resources of the Department of Veterans Affairs are limited, but we feel that these widows and children should have a high priority since the cost of paying the proportionate pensions has proven to be less than estimated and since the number of recipients is diminishing yearly through death.

10. The concern of your Committee was partially relieved when the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs, the Honourable J. Gilles Lamontagne, assured us that the Department is aware of the injustice involved in at least the phasing-in of the proportionate pension to spouses of deceased veterans and that efforts are being made by the Department to eliminate the phasing-in and to have the pensions paid immediately.⁽⁴⁾

11. It is the considered opinion of your Committee that justice and compassion demand immediate action in this matter, and therefore

1. We recommend that under the Pension Act:

a) the proportionate pension to the spouses and dependents of deceased veterans who were in receipt of a disability pension of 47 per cent or less be paid immediately instead of being phased in over a 6½ year period as in the

Statute Law (Military and Civilian War Pensions, Compensation and Allowances) Amendment Act 1980; and

b) the proportionate pension be increased to a percentage of the full pension granted to spouses of deceased veterans equal to twice the assessed degree of the deceased veteran's disability.

Continuation of Pension at Married Rate to the Spouse of a Deceased Pensioner

12. Soon after the inception of the Pension Act on 7 July 1919, veterans' associations began to request that a pension be continued at the married rate, where such is greater than the widow's pension, for a reasonable length of time, in order to enable the widow and children to adjust to a reduced income. At that time the pension was discontinued on the day following a pensioner's death. In 1954 the Pension Act was amended to provide that on the death of a disability pensioner who was in receipt of a pension for his wife and child, the pension would be continued to the last day of the month in which death occurred. In 1980, the Act was amended to provide that any pension or allowance awarded ceases to be payable on the first day of the month following the month of the death of the person to whom, or in respect of whom, any allowance is paid.

13. The present practice still creates severe hardship for the widow of a 100 per cent pensioner, and even greater financial hardship if the pensioner is in receipt of the Exceptional Incapacity and/or Attendance Allowance.

14. Let us take the case of a pensioner with a 100 per cent invalidity with bilateral below-the-knee amputation who is married. The following is the pension at the married rate:⁽⁵⁾

Pension under Schedule A of the Pension Act	$1,014.33
Exceptional Incapacity Allowance	143.19
Attendance Allowance	268.48
Total	$1,426.00

15. As shown by the above calculations the total monthly pension received by a married pensioner is $1,426.00. When he or she dies, the pension on the month immediately following death is reduced to the "widow's" rate, that is to $608.60 per month. This reduction usually requires the widow to make a drastic, immediate change in her way of living at a time when she is suffering from shock, grief, intense fatigue and disorientation due to loneliness, insecurity and anxiety about her future. For an elderly woman the loss of a husband is a serious traumatic experience. For most people at any age it would be financially difficult and mentally disturbing to be suddenly deprived of $825.00 in monthly income.

16. The National Council of Veteran Associations in Canada has made a study to find out how long it would usually take a widow to make the necessary financial adjustments to a greatly reduced income after the death of her husband. The history of widows whose cases were handled by members of the National Council of Veteran Associations in Canada was examined. It was found that as a rule there is a delay in getting the pension for the widow and so it was decided that three months would be the absolute minimum necessary to ensure continuity of income in the interim.⁽⁶⁾ This does not take into account the sort of adjustment that would be required. Funeral arrangements are usually unexpectedly expensive. If a widow is living in a rented house or apartment her lease will normally run for a year so that she may have to pay that rent for several months at a rate she can no longer afford. If she owns her home and it is mortgaged she may not be able to carry the monthly payments and yet be unable to sell in three months' time or be forced to sell at a loss. She may not be able to find immediately adequate new housing at the price she can pay. She may not be in a sufficiently stable emotional state to make the required decisions and her physical health will suffer from the stress of her situation.

17. The Exceptional Incapacity Allowance legislation was passed in 1971 following the report of the Woods Committee which studied the work and organization of the Canadian Pension Commission. It consists of a payment of an additional allowance for a veteran who is so badly disabled that he can only be classified beyond the 100 per cent disability level. These are, in other words, the worst and most severe type of case there is. They include, for example, the quadriplegics and paraplegics and other cases which are grouped in five grades or categories.

18. At present there are fewer than 1,000 pensioners receiving an exceptional incapacity allowance. These are further divided into five grades or categories. In the first category there are only 142 veterans and they would be mostly paraplegics. In the second grade there are only 76, who would be, for example, people who are wheelchair-bound. In the third grade, there are 105 who generally speaking would have at least two amputations and one other condition to qualify in that category. In the fourth grade, there are 180 who are, generally speaking, persons with double amputations above the knee if they were leg amputations or above the elbow if they were arm amputations, or a combination of these. In the fifth grade, and lowest, there are 493 veterans. A typical exceptional incapacity allowance recipient in this grade would be for a person with a leg off above the knee combined with a gunshot wound in the other leg and perhaps a complication of heart disease.⁽⁷⁾

19. It must be noted that the qualifications for this exceptional incapacity allowance are very severe. In addition to any one of these disabilities the recipient must suffer very severe pain and discomfort in order to be eligible. He or she might have, for example, some loss of life expectancy as in the case of the paraplegics and severe amputees.

20. Finally, in addition to the exceptional incapacity allowance the pensioner gets a clothing allowance which amounts to a maximum of $60.84 a month. If in need of attendance, he can draw an attendance allowance which is considered as an encumbered income. Although the latter cannot be spent for unauthorized purposes, this income comes into the family so that the pensioner can employ a person to do the housekeeping, shovel the snow, and so on.⁽⁸⁾

21. All the above allowances are terminated on the first day of the month following the death of the veteran. Additional expenses occasioned by extreme disability, such as special accommodation and contracts to supply special services may continue for many months.

22. In weighing whether or not to recommend the continuation of pension and special allowances at the married rate to spouses of deceased veterans, your Committee considered the fact that the minimum cost of extended care at a nursing home such as Deer Lodge is at least $82 per diem or $2,460 a month while intensive care costs $132 per diem or $3,960 a month. Without the care of their spouses, frequently over a great many years, thousands of disabled and aging veterans would have to be placed in nursing homes at vast public expense. It seems only fair that consideration should now be given to the amount of money that has been saved for the government by those widows.

23. There are convincing precedents for continuing the married rate for a longer period of time. Under the War Veterans Allowance Act the principle of such a continuation has already been accepted on the basis of need for up to a year. In the United States, a severely disabled pensioner has the premium on his G.I. Insurance waived so that the widow gets $10,000 when the pensioner dies to help her until she goes on to widow's pension. In the United Kingdom there is special legislation that covers her for six months at the married rate.⁽⁹⁾ In any case we consider it inhumane to subject the surviving spouse of a disabled veteran to the drastic and immediate change in his or her standard of living as is now required under the Pension Act; and therefore

2. We recommend that under the Pension Act:

- a) the pension at the married rate when it is greater than the widow's/widower's pension continue to be paid for a period of one year to the surviving spouse of a deceased veteran; and
- b) the surviving spouse of a deceased veteran in receipt of an Exceptional Incapacity and/or Attendance Allowance continue to receive such allowance for a period of one year following the death of the veteran.

Indexation of the Basic Pension

24. The present legislation provides that pensions will be increased in accordance with the Consumer Price Index, that is, the cost of living. However, since wages traditionally increase at a faster rate than the cost of living, it follows that the pensioner does not benefit from the general increase in the standard of living but falls behind, at least relatively, each year.

25. In 1972, there was mutual agreement by a joint government-veterans committee established by the Minister of Veterans Affairs that the disability pension at basic single rates should be tied to a composite of five unskilled categories of public servants' rate of pay. Since then the government has passed legislation increasing the basic rate effective 1 July 1973 and 1 July 1978, aligning it with the average of these five categories. However, there have been ad hoc increases not embodied in the Pension Act. Thus the system, which has been followed since 1973, essentially has been to give the veteran an annual increment based on the cost-of-living. If, as a result, the pension falls behind the wages paid to the composite unskilled labour group in the Public Service, the veterans' associations are presumably expected to point this out to the government every three or four years and ask for a further increase to bring the pension up to the after tax level of the composite group.⁽¹⁰⁾

26. It is the opinion of your Committee that there is no reason why the veterans should be forced to approach the government "hat in hand" every few years, and therefore

3. We recommend that pension increases reflect the principle of parity with the average wage of five unskilled categories of Public Servants or, the increase in the Consumer Price Index, whichever is the greater, and that this principle be entrenched in the Pension Act.

Delays In Processing Pension Applications and in Pension Adjudications

27. Providing veterans and their families with improved benefits will do little to improve their lives if prompt receipt of pensions and ancillary benefits is frustrated by delays in processing claims and deciding appeals. The following examples, taken from the files of the Royal Canadian Legion, illustrate the sort of delays that do occur:

"Mr. G.'s claim to pension entitlement for right inguinal hernia was submitted for Commission's consideration on 27 March 1980. This request was acknowledged on 28 April 1980. A follow-up enquiry was sent to the Commission on 5 March 1981 as to the status of claim, with their reply of 23 April indicating that a decision would be rendered within three months."

"An application for Attendance Allowance was submitted for Mr. K. on 25 July 1980. An acknowledgment was received in September. Commission's Head Office request for investigation went forward to the Senior Pension Medical Examiner on 31 October 1980. The veteran died on 2 February 1981. Mrs. K. has not yet received any decision on the lifetime request for additional benefits for her husband."

"Mr. N.'s claim for a change in the diagnosis of his pensionable spinal disability and for the basis of his entitlement for another condition was submitted to the Commission on 29 December 1979. Follow-up correspondence from the Legion as late as 3 April brought forth a reply of 6 May 1981 that the Commission would proceed to deal with both of these outstanding claims as soon as possible."⁽¹¹⁾

28. At its most extended, the complete process of adjudication can take a total of at least four years from the day a claim is filed until a final decision, on appeal, is made on its merits. Within the past year, the average time to adjudicate a First Application has risen to more than 11 months and to more than 7 months for widows. At the same time, a backlog of approximately 4,000 cases waiting for a decision on final appeal has built up. According to the veterans organizations, the situation is particularly serious with regard to First Applications, pension medical examinations for Attendance Allowance, payment of pension awards, appeals to the Pension Review Board and general correspondence.

29. The Canadian Pension Commission and the Pension Review Board share responsibility for processing claims for pensions and ancillary benefits. Your Committee closely questioned the officials of the Commission and the Review Board about the reasons for the delays and what steps were being taken to reduce them to a minimum consistent with a thorough and fair investigation and adjudication of claims. Your Committee also questioned representatives of the veterans' associations about their experience in representing clients before the government agencies.

30. The officials of both the Royal Canadian Legion and the National Council of Veteran Associations stated that their working relations with the senior officials of the two government agencies were excellent. Their fundamental complaint lay with the delays in adjudication and the fear that these would intensify when the Department completes its move to Charlottetown in 1983. There was also agreement with the officials of the Commission and of the Review Board that the cause of the delays was twofold: a large influx of new applications and new appeals, combined with the loss of experienced staff through retirement and resignation.

31. There has been an obvious failure to recruit and train sufficient replacements. The problem lies less at the level of Commissioner, than at the level of medical examiner and essential administrative staff. Even here, the veterans' associations were reluctant to blame the government agencies. Mr. Chadderton, Secretary General of the National Council of Veteran Associations in Canada said when he appeared as a witness:

"I will make a point blank statement. I deal every day with the Canadian Pension Commission and the Department of Veterans Affairs—day in, day out. I think the problem is getting staff, training them and retaining the staff. These are relatively simple administrative functions. I suggest it is all wrapped up in the red tape of how the Public Service Commission operates and how the federal government departments operate."⁽¹²⁾

32. In an effort to reduce delays the Canadian Pension Commission has been given authority to hire staff without exacting a commitment to move to Prince Edward Island. The Pension Review Board is in the process of a reorganization which is designed to enable Board members to adjudicate more cases. New staff is being hired and trained to do much of the research work required before a decision is rendered. According to Board officials, if all goes according to plan, the waiting period for a decision will be cut from 16 months to 10 months this year, and to 6 months next year.⁽¹³⁾

33. Your Committee was only partially reassured by the steps undertaken to eliminate delays in adjudications. It is absolutely essential that both the Canadian Pension Commission and the Pension Review Board be fully caught up in their work well before the move to Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island in 1983, and therefore

4. We recommend that all necessary steps be taken immediately to eliminate the unacceptable delays in processing pension applications and in pension adjudications which have accumulated since 1970 and that to this end, particular consideration be given to encouraging essential staff to continue working beyond the normal age of retirement.

The War Veterans Allowance Act and the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act

34. The War Veterans Allowance Act was passed in May 1930 to give allowances based on a means test to veterans who suffered pensionable disabilities or fought in World War I and were consequently incapable of competing in the labour market. Amendments have modified the legislation so that today allowances to veterans and their spouses and children are based on a modified income test instead of a means test and are paid to veterans who, because of age or incapacity, are unable to work and have insufficient financial resources. Since 1962, certain civilians have qualified for comparable benefits under Part XI of the Civilian War Pension and Allowances Act. Allowances are paid to members of groups that served in close wartime support of the armed forces. These are, for example, the Canadian Merchant Seamen, Canadian Firefighters, Newfoundland Overseas Forestry Unit and their spouses and children.

35. The Statute Law Amendment Act of 1980 introduced a number of changes into the Acts. Your Committee studied these changes and decided to comment specifically on two of them: the residence requirement for veterans; and, the annual exemption for certain types of income in the calculation of entitlement to the income-tested benefits.

The Residence Requirement for Veterans

36. While the Statute Law Amendment Act of 1980 has removed the Canadian residence requirements for widows and children of recipients who die outside Canada, veterans (both military and civilian) must still return to Canada and reside here for a period of one year before they become eligible for benefits. Once in receipt of an allowance, however, they can then leave Canada and resume their residence abroad.⁽¹⁴⁾

37. Your Committee supports the 1980 amendment in this respect, but finds it hard to understand why the legislation does not allow qualified veterans to have the same residence rights as the widows and children of recipients who have died while living outside of Canada.

38. Most veterans find it difficult and often impossible to return to Canada to establish residence in order to comply with the present legislation. Often they are too poor, too old and too ill to be able to travel and to establish a new domicile in Canada for a year. Frequently they have family ties where they are living that make it financially and psychologically out of the question. Most of the veterans involved, especially those living in the United Kingdom and the United States, feel that Canada is ignoring their wartime service by forcing them to return to Canada for a year before being eligible for benefits.

39. Your Committee believes that those Canadians who, for personal reasons, chose to live abroad following their service, should be entitled to the same benefits as those who returned to Canada, and therefore

5. We recommend that the residence requirement of the War Veterans Allowance Act and the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act be amended to permit otherwise qualified persons to benefit from the legislation while residing outside Canada.

Exemption of Interest Income

40. The Statute Law Amendment Act of 1980 increased the exemption for interest income from $50 to $100 per year in the calculation of entitlement to a War Veteran's Allowance.

41. At present because of current interest rates that are well over 10 per cent, a recipient with $1,000 invested in bank or trust deposits or Canada Savings Bonds receives interest income in excess of the exemption.⁽¹⁵⁾

42. Your Committee believes that it is very important to a veteran to be able to set aside a few thousand dollars to pay funeral expenses, debts or to leave to a spouse. The current limit is unrealistic and discourages such savings, and therefore

6. We recommend that in the calculation of entitlement to a War Veterans Allowance, the annual exemption for income derived from bank deposits, bonds and dividends be raised to at least $500.

Conclusion

43. In the course of our research and the examination of witnesses your Committee was impressed by the many references to the Report of the Committee to Survey the Organization and Work of the Canadian Pension Commission. This task force, set up in 1965, was chaired by Mervyn Woods and submitted its Report in 1968. A great many of its recommendations were later incorporated in the 1970-1971 Amendments to the Pension Act and since then have been credited with having a major and beneficial effect on the treatment of veterans, ex-Prisoners of War and their dependants. On the other hand, many of its recommendations were not implemented. Our witnesses do not think that a massive study of all the legislation and bureaucratic structures dealing with veterans is necessary. They suggest, however, that the Woods report should be reviewed because a number of anomalies and inequities still exist in veterans' legislation and regulations. We agree with this suggestion. There are, for example, two inequities which require further study; namely, the treatment of the divorced spouses of veterans and the treatment of the Dieppe prisoners of war.⁽¹⁶⁾

44. At present, the divorced spouse of a veteran has no entitlement to benefits under the Pension Act and the War Veterans Allowance Act. The Pension Act does provide that the Canadian Pension Commission has the discretion to make a grant to a divorced spouse. This discretion comes into play particularly if there is a court order or a maintenance order for some support during the lifetime of the veteran. Under the Canada Pension Plan, on the other hand, pension benefits are divided in half on the divorce of a contributor, if applied for at the time of divorce. We believe that this precedent as well as the new marriage and property legislation in a number of provinces should be taken into consideration in the proposed review in order to keep the legislation in step with present attitudes and new concepts of equality in the marriage partnerships.⁽¹⁷⁾

45. Under the Prisoner of War Compensation Act veterans are paid disability pensions of from 10-20 per cent based on the length of time they were incarcerated. The Hong Kong veterans, however, have been entitled to a disability pension of 50 per cent because of the extreme severity of their long confinement. Other groups of veterans, such as the Dieppe POWs, were also held for long periods of time under abnormally harsh conditions but are entitled to a pension of no more than 20 per cent. Is it just to compensate those who were POWs for over 2½ years at a disability rate that is only twice the compensation offered those who were incarcerated for just 3 months?⁽¹⁸⁾

46. We understand that there are other possible inequities, and therefore

7. We recommend that:

a) the Government appoint a Committee composed of officials from both the government and veterans associations to review and update those recommendations of the Woods Committee which have not been implemented and to identify, study and make recommendations about the anomalies which still exist in the treatment of veterans and their survivors;

b) the Committee study the apparent inequity to a divorced spouse who under existing legislation has no entitlement to benefits under the Pension Act and the War Veterans Allowance Act; and

c) the Committee study the apparent inequity of the way in which veterans are compensated for periods spent as prisoners of war.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Report of the Agricultural Products Board for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1981, pursuant to section 7 of the Agricultural Products Board Act, Chapter A-5, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the Agricultural Stabilization Board for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1981, pursuant to section 14 of the Agricultural Stabilization Act, Chapter A-9, R.S.C., 1970.

Text of a telex, dated October 20, 1981, from the Prime Minister to William Bennett, Premier of British Columbia, in reply to Premier Bennett's proposal for a First Ministers' Meeting.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Is the third document the one that was read yesterday in the house?

Senator Perrault: It was felt, honourable senators, that the document should be tabled formally in this chamber, as it was tabled in the other place. The text of this document was read yesterday.

Senator Roblin: But it is the same document?

Senator Perrault: Yes.

ACID RAIN POLLUTION—EMISSIONS OF SULPHUR OXIDES

Hon. Cyril B. Sherwood: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. The report of the task force studying acid rain indicates that Canada actually emits 16 per cent of the sulphur oxides in the atmosphere. Having regard for the traditional 10-to-1 population ratio between the United States and Canada, it would seem that we are disproportionately guilty of causing acid rain pollution. In order to strengthen our bargaining position with the United States, what action does the federal government plan to take to drastically reduce Canadian emissions?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): At some point I hope to bring to the chamber a detailed reply to the honourable senator's question. However, I can provide at this time some related information on the subject of acid rain with regard to the state of negotiations between Canada and the United States. It should be said, perhaps, that all of us would take the position that, if possible and feasible, no acid rain should be permitted. The question is: Can a way be found to stop it?

The chairman of the U.S. House Subcommittee on Health and Environment, Congressman Waxman, invited Canada to make a presentation to a so-called technical inquiry which he is holding on the Clean Air Act.

● (1410)

After consultation with Environment Canada and the Ontario Ministry of the Environment, it was agreed that technical officials of the two governments would make a presentation similar to that provided for earlier Congressional hearings at Lake Placid and Albany, New York. After some hesitation, the committee agreed to receive the presentation being offered. The Canadian presentation was at no time the subject of any communication with the U.S. Administration and no pressures were applied.

Finally, the Governments of Canada and the United States are continuing with the activities spelled out in the August 5 Memorandum of Intent. These include the completion of technical studies required for the negotiations. The next negotiating session pursuant to the Memorandum of Intent is scheduled for just a few days from now, October 29.

We are also continuing our efforts to bring our concerns to the attention of the U.S. Congress. This is being carried out through a variety of methods including technical briefings, provision of information materials and a visits program in which U.S. Congressional staff, journalists and state legislators have participated.

This does not answer the question of the honourable senator, but it does indicate Canadian concern with the problem of acid rain. The question of the honourable senator related to the question of possible Canadian culpability in the creation of acid rain. I shall seek further information and bring it to the Senate.

Senator Sherwood: Honourable senators, certainly everyone in Canada acknowledges that Canada has made substantial strides to cut pollution over recent decades when the whole question was not at issue. What is important is that now, when we are appealing to U.S. officials to make sacrifices and to expend considerable sums of money, we must indicate a willingness to do the same.

I have a further question to the Leader of the Government: Is the government going to further delay submitting the recommendations of the task force to further study, or is it going to provide North American leadership in implementing the task force recommendations now?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice. It is an important question and a reply will be provided as soon as it becomes available.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW ACT

INQUIRY RE INTRODUCTION OF PROPOSED AMENDING LEGISLATION

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I refer the Minister of State for Economic Development to the Throne Speech delivered in this chamber about 18 months ago which contained a paragraph in connection with the Foreign Investment Review Act, in which it was indicated it was the intention of the government to strengthen that statute and, in particular, to make provision for performance reviews in respect of large foreign firms operating in this country to determine whether they are meeting the test of substantial benefit to Canada—if I remember the wording correctly. As well, there was to be an amendment to ensure that there would be some public information about major acquisition proposals before approval in order that Canadian participants might be solicited. My question to the minister is: When may we expect to see the legislation that will give effect to these proposals contained in the Throne Speech?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, the question revolves around two matters. One, of course, is the matter of significant benefit to Canada, which is central to the whole purpose of the Foreign Investment Review Act and activities under it. That remains a priority. The second matter concerns some performance review and related matters.

If there is to be legislation, obviously it will be introduced by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, who is responsible for these matters.

Senator Roblin: As usual, my honourable friend did not tell me what I might expect, so I will ask him the question in a slightly different way. Can he give us an unequivocal statement that the policy of strengthening FIRA remains a priority for this administration?

Senator Olson: I am sure the honourable senator is aware that yesterday a direct question was posed to the minister responsible in the other place. In concluding his reply to the question that had been asked the minister stated:

● (1415)

—and I hope he will be very pleased with the decisions we will be announcing before too long.

Now we get to the next part of the question, and I think the honourable senator impliedly asked me whether or not we are in a position now to make an announcement. That was part of his question, and he even went on to talk about priority.

I have to tell my honourable friend, as I have told so many senators in replies to those kinds of questions, that I will not engage in anticipating or making announcements in advance of the ministers directly responsible for doing so. As I have said before, I do not intend to engage in that.

Senator Roblin: I have tried to make the question as simple as possible so that my honourable friend would be able to give me some kind of answer. I have asked him, and I ask him again, whether it is the policy of the government to strengthen FIRA. Is that still the policy of the government? That is not a question of when or what, but a question of policy. What is the policy of the government? I think we are entitled to an answer to that.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I can bring to the Senate statements and responses made by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to a number of inquiries along that line. I would be happy to do that and then he would have in precise detail what the minister directly responsible has said. Part of that, of course, he can find in yesterday's House of Commons Hansard at page 11965.

Senator Roblin: I am aware of the reference that my honourable friend has given, but as he is the chairman of the cabinet committee which deals with these matters, I really thought that he might be able to provide an answer, but evidently he does not wish to do so at the present time.

However, I point out to him that the Canadian ambassador to the United States has given some kind of answer to the people down there on this topic, because in speaking to the American Gas Association on October 13 last he is quoted as saying that Canada's National Energy Program will not be followed by similar initiatives in other economic sectors. I suspect that a good many of his listeners in the United States would immediately jump to the conclusion that the government does not intend to introduce similar initiatives into FIRA, because that is one of the main bones of contention now under discussion between the business communities and the governments of the two countries. Is the ambassador's statement correct, and does my honourable friend not think that it may be slightly misleading to Americans if it remains the policy of the government to strengthen FIRA?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, what the American ambassador had to say—

Senator Roblin: The Canadian ambassador.

Senator Olson: The Canadian ambassador, too.

Senator Roblin: It was the Canadian ambassador; not the American ambassador.

Senator Olson: Perhaps I could add that if he had done a little more research he would have found that both ambassadors have made statements along that line recently. That should not come as any surprise to the honourable senator, because had he done a little more homework he would have found that the statement made almost a year ago—not quite a year ago, but almost a year ago—was that the Canadian ownership requirements respecting the energy sector in this country were designed, and, indeed, were proceeded with, on the basis of coming to grips with what we regard as a serious problem in that sector.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend declines to answer the question. The Canadian ambassador made this statement to a group of Americans on October 13. Are we not entitled to some information as to whether he was expressing the policy of the government?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am afraid there is difficulty, not with my understanding the question, but with my honourable friend understanding the reply. I just told him that that should not come as any surprise because the application of the so-called Canadian ownership requirements of something like 50 per cent by the end of this decade has been stated many times before. He can look back and see that that applies to that sector only.

Senator Roblin: It is not the questioner who is having trouble understanding my honourable friend or understanding the Canadian ambassador; it is his listeners in the United States who will have difficulty understanding, because we are not talking about the Canadian ownership under the National Energy Program, but similar initiatives to be taken in the economic sector. There is a possibility that those who listen to the ambassador may get the impression that no similar initiatives are intended with respect to FIRA, for example. That is why I am trying to get the minister to explicate the government's policy so that this matter may be clear to all who have a legitimate interest in it.

● (1420)

Senator Olson: It would be helpful if Senator Roblin and other honourable senators would repeat the statement that was made by the Canadian government a long time ago with respect to energy, particularly the gas and oil sector, that that was a policy designed to achieve a certain level of Canadian ownership within the time frame stated at that time. It was not any indication that it was going to be applied to any other sector. If you want to distort that on the basis that some people are doing it as a pattern for other things, then you have to take responsibility for the distortion.

Senator Roblin: But what else is FIRA but a policy that has to do with Canadian ownership? Nothing. The whole basis of FIRA is: Who is entitled to have ownership in our economic affairs—Canadians or somebody else? To slide off the question the way my honourable friend has attempted to do simply won't wash.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, my friend can make that interpretation if he likes, but if he wants to be objective—I guess that is too much to expect—

Senator Roblin: I am as objective as you are.

Senator Olson: —the fact of the matter is that FIRA was set up, and the examination under the Foreign Investment Review Regulations is to determine whether or not there is a significant benefit to Canada and Canadians. Any other interpretation he wants to put on it will have to be his responsibility, because that is not repeating the statements of this government.

Senator Roblin: You have said in the Throne Speech that you intend to vastly expand the application and implication of FIRA, and yet you will not tell me what you are going to do about it.

Senator Olson: The honourable senator is doing it again. He says "vastly expand," and he makes all kinds of other interpretations on what was contained therein. If he wants to do that then, of course, it is his responsibility. That is not what the government said.

Senator Roblin: I am simply quoting what you had in the Throne Speech.

UNITED NATIONS

ELECTION OF NEW SECRETARY GENERAL

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I would ask a question of the Leader of the Government. Will he ascertain from the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs what instructions are being given to the Canadian delegation at the United Nations concerning the election of a Secretary General? The government will be aware that Mr. Waldheim is seeking a third term in that post, and in this he is, apparently, supported by both the United States and the Soviet Union. He is being opposed for the position by a former president of the General Assembly, a Tanzanian, Mr. Salim A. Salim, apparently with the support of China and certainly with the support of members of the Organization of African Unity.

Does the minister know on which side Canada will come down in this matter, and if he does not know can he ascertain that information?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice.

YUKON TERRITORY

WATER BOARD—APPOINTMENT OF CHAIRMAN

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, I have a question for Senator Austin. Historically, the federal government has sought and accepted the recommendation of the Legislative Assembly when filling the position of Chairman of the Water Board of the Yukon Territory. Would the minister explain why the government has rejected both the original recommendation of the Legislative Assembly that the previous chairman be reappointed, and the subsequent recommendation of another person for that position?

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State): Honourable senators, I have no information to give Senator Balfour at this moment, but I will make inquiries and respond as quickly as I can.

THE BUDGET

POSTPONEMENT OF PRESENTATION

Hon. Martial Asselin: I have a question for the Leader of the Government. Yesterday, when the Prime Minister made his statement on the constitutional meeting, he also said that presentation of the budget would be postponed. This is the second time the government has postponed the budget. How can the government use the constitutional conference as an excuse to postpone the budget? As far as I know, the provincial premiers and the Prime Minister of Canada will not be discussing the economy. Surely, presenting the budget is a matter of some urgency. Why would postponement of the budget necessarily have a connection with the constitutional conference?

● (1425)

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the premiers were well aware of the government's intention to introduce a budget at a particular time. They knew the approximate date of its presentation. The desire of the federal government to present the budget as soon as possible, and to provide all members of Parliament with the opportunity to debate the budget fully, was well known to the provincial premiers.

The government believes that both the constitutional issue and the budget issue are worthy of the full attention of all members of Parliament, that there should not be diversions involving the constitutional meetings at a time when the budget is under debate. The presence in the other place of the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and other ministers during the course of that budget debate is important. It is felt to be advisable and desirable to have the constitutional debate before the budget is presented. The premiers have decided on yet another date, and therefore the date of the presentation of the budget has been postponed.

Both matters are of vital importance to Canadians, and it is unfortunate, at a time when Canadians are seriously concerned about high interest rates and high mortgage rates, rates affecting mortgage roll-overs, and other economic matters, that the premiers were unable to arrange their schedule so that the constitutional discussions could have been held sooner than is now proposed, a date scheduled in accordance with the telex message received by the Prime Minister from Premier Bennett earlier this week. The government believes that both issues, are of great importance. It is unfortunate for the people of Canada that a more satisfactory schedule could not have been arranged.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I am not sure I understand the reply given by the Leader of the Government. I fail to see what justification the government could have for postponing the presentation of a budget that will be extremely important in dealing with the economic situation in this country today. How can the constitutional conference be a reason for postponing the budget? If the budget had been presented on the agreed date, surely the Prime Minister would have been able to leave the constitutional conference for two hours in order to listen to the budget speech. Is settling the constitutional question more important to the government than Canada's present economic problems? The Leader of the Government has just said that Canada is faced with very serious economic problems, and here we have the Prime Minister who has already postponed the budget presentation twice. And this, while we were hoping that the budget would be able to provide ways of dealing with our economic problems.

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the premiers have rescheduled the proposed constitutional meeting on at least six occasions. One would have thought, after the years of discussion that have taken place involving federal and provincial first ministers, that the provincial premiers would by now have at least formulated a basic position, one which had the support of at least a majority of the premiers. Obviously, there is still some disagreement among the premiers. Yesterday a rather bitter statement was issued by the Premier of New Brunswick who alleged that he had, in effect, been "thrown out" of the meeting of premiers—

Senator Asselin: Don't start on that again.

Senator Perrault: —because he disagreed with some of them. Obviously, there remains an element of discord among some of the premiers. As I have said, the federal-provincial meeting has been rescheduled on six occasions, and the Prime Minister has said repeatedly that it is important, in the interests of the nation, that the budget be presented as soon as possible. The rescheduling of dates has caused real difficulty with regard to that budget presentation.

● (1430)

The Honourable Senator Asselin, who for years served in a distinguished manner in the other place, knows the importance of the budget presentation. He knows that the budget debate is fully deserving of the attendance of all members of Parliament, regardless of party. He knows it is important for the opposition to be given a full opportunity to analyze and to criticize the budget. He knows that it is important not to have parliamentary efforts diverted at budget time.

These considerations have led to a decision to postpone the budget presentation until after the constitutional discussions have been held. The Honourable Senator Asselin may not wish to accept my explanation. Of course, that is his right.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, I cannot accept the reasons given by the government, because, in fact, they are not reasons. We cannot expect our economic problems to be solved at a constitutional conference between two levels of government. In any case, the conference would be dealing with constitutional matters and not with the economy. I fail to understand the minister when he tells us that the budget date had to be changed because the provinces have changed the date of the conference. Why did the Prime Minister not state that he wanted to meet with the provinces on a given date, and then announce the date of his budget presentation? There must be a more serious reason than the one given by the Leader of the Government.

[English]

Senator Perrault: Well, honourable senators, I have nothing further to add to my reply. Let us hope that the meeting between the Prime Minister and the provincial premiers is a successful one.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Honourable the Leader of the Government if it is premature to reach any conclusion about delaying the budget until we hear from the premiers as to whether or not they will accept the date suggested by the Prime Minister. If they do not accept it, will the budget speech be made on the day previously announced?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I must report that as of 2 o'clock this afternoon I had yet to be advised by the office of the Right Honourable the Prime Minister of any reply received from Premier Bennett. Honourable senators are aware, of course, of the premier's request for another rescheduled meeting, a request accepted by the federal government. Perhaps the reply is coming by telex, by mail, or perhaps by some other form of communication. It has yet to arrive in Ottawa.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I have a question regarding the television broadcasting of the budget speech. Last year, instead of trying to get a seat in the Senate gallery, I went back to my hotel room to watch on television the Minister of Finance, Mr. MacEachen, deliver his budget speech. I did not see very much of Mr. MacEachen during that time, but I did hear about the budget long before the members of Parliament, to whom Mr. MacEachen was speaking, did, because as soon as Mr. MacEachen appeared on television, reporters started interrupting and talking about provisions in the budget, which Mr. MacEachen had not yet come to, and this continued throughout his speech. We saw more of, and heard more from, panels of reporters during the speech than we saw of, and heard from, Mr. MacEachen.

There is a constitutional convention, which the media should obey, regarding matters of importance like the budget, and that is that members of Parliament should hear about them first in the chamber. My question is, can anything be done about locking these reporters up until 9 o'clock, or getting the television networks to agree that they will not interrupt the budget speech, so that the people of Canada will be able to hear the budget speech in its entirety at the same time as the people in the House of Commons?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I feel that most honourable senators are in agreement with the excellent points made by the Honourable Senator Godfrey.

Senator Godfrey: Can the minister furnish an answer as to what can be done? I do not want the matter to be dropped. I really believe that the government should try to take some action.

[Senator Asselin.]

Senator Perrault: I would like to provide the assurance that the senator's excellent proposal, and the valid points made by him, will be drawn to the attention of the appropriate authorities.

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary to Senator Asselin's question, which also touches on the point raised by Senator Guay.

Originally, the plan was to present the budget during the last week of October. This was supposed to be definite, and since one of the dates that had been considered for the first ministers' meeting was also at that time, it stood to reason that the budget would be postponed until the following week. An earlier date could not be requested because the budget is prepared for a given date, and it was reasonable to postpone the budget until the week of November 3. But now that the first ministers' conference is to be held during the same week, why not reschedule the budget for the original date, that is, the week before, the last week of October? Since this was the original date, the budget will obviously be ready by the last week of October. I fail to see any good reason for rescheduling the budget date after the first ministers' conference. There is no direct connection between the two events, and the sooner the budget is presented, the better. "As soon as possible" was supposed to be the last week of October. Why not reschedule the budget presentation to the last week of October, now that the first ministers' conference has been moved up to the first week of November? That is my question.

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I would like to provide the assurance that every possible effort has been made by the government to introduce that budget and to schedule the budget debate at the best possible time in the interests of the people of this country. Regrettably, this obsession of some of the premiers with constitutional issues has caused problems in re-arranging the parliamentary schedule.

Senator Tremblay: Why not come back, then, to the end of October?

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

HOME INSULATION PROGRAMS—INSTALLATION OF UREA FORMALDEHYDE FOAM

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I should like to pose a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

It was revealed over the summer that the Office of Energy Conservation in the Department of Energy was aware in 1977 that the variable quality of both product and installation could render urea formaldehyde foam insulation highly dangerous. However, a federal review board was told over the summer that the energy department "was promoting effective energy conservation and did not want any adverse publicity" over urea formaldehyde.

Would the Leader of the Government advise the Senate whether, having actively promoted the sale of this insulation which it knew to be potentially dangerous, the government is now going to accept its responsibility to assist the thousands of Canadians, whose health is now threatened, by having the insulation removed from their homes?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not accept the accuracy or the validity of the allegations made by the honourable senator. In at least a partial fashion, I have been involved directly with this problem. It is estimated that there are approximately 8,000 homes in my province with urea formaldehyde foam insulation. There is no question in my mind that there are health problems arising from certain of those home installations, perhaps not in all cases but at least in some cases.

I have reviewed much of the literature on the subject of urea formaldehyde foam insulation. I would invite honourable senators to acquire some of it, including the urea formaldehyde installation standards sheet issued for those engaged in urea formaldehyde foam insulation installations. Those standards are very rigid.

● (1440)

Rather than quote at random and from memory, honourable senators, I am prepared to bring to the Senate a statement on urea formaldehyde foam insulation at the earliest opportunity.

As honourable senators are aware, the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has had a task force at work to measure the extent of the problem across the country. Their report should be available in a few days.

May I express the personal hope that in those cases where it can be clearly demonstrated that this substance has had a deleterious effect on the health of certain people in this country, we can find a way to get some early aid to them. Perhaps later on we can affix the legal responsibility, whether it is on the manufacturers of the product, on those who have installed the product or on the government itself.

Honourable senators should be aware as well that the manufacturers of the urea formaldehyde foam insulation deny that the substance has posed these alleged health hazards. They are taking the matter to court. It is an extremely complicated question. Unfortunately, that does not solve the problem for the many Canadians who allege they are now suffering from the effects of dropping temperatures because windows must be left open to allow fresh air to enter their homes.

The question is important and I will ask the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and other ministries to provide me with information which can be either read during Question Period or perhaps tabled in some form so that honourable senators can at least have the facts as we know and understand them.

Senator Muir: May I ask a supplementary? I should like to thank the honourable gentleman for his response. Whether he accepts my statements or not is another question, but I, too, have had some involvement with this insulation.

My supplementary has to do with a report on urea formaldehyde foam insulation made by an independent testing laboratory. The report was commissioned by the federal government and released over the summer. It indicates that the hazardous fumes given off by this insulation are almost impossible to stop.

This evidence notwithstanding, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs said last week in the other place that once the review committee's report had been completed some time in November, the government would make it public in order to "shed as much light as possible on this whole issue." In the meantime, according to the minister, the government is trying to reassure all those "whose concerns are unfounded."

I can advise the honourable leader of instances in my own area where people have had to live in a tent for months, and they do not know whether they will have to burn the house down or what they will have to do because of this problem.

May I ask the honourable leader whether the 80,000 homeowners who have this insulation, 29,000 of whom acquired it with federal assistance, can expect anything more by way of a commitment from the government, despite what he has just said, than that it will attempt to "shed light" on the question?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, first of all let me state that any suggestion that the government deliberately allowed insulation to be employed in this country which they knew to be dangerous is a monstrous suggestion, and I hope the senator is not implying that.

Senator Muir: I think you are being facetious.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): You said in your opening remarks that they knew.

Senator Muir: I am not suggesting that at all.

Senator Perrault: Well, that was the understanding of some of us on this side. No government would do that, regardless of its political affiliations.

Senator Muir: I did not use the word "deliberately".

Senator Frith: You said "which it knew to be dangerous."

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, there has been a testing program under way across the country. There have been variations in the results, depending on the manner in which this insulation was installed. I think the honourable senator is probably aware of that testing program. Perhaps a number of homes in his province have been tested. The gas levels are higher in some homes than in other homes.

It is true that the government is measuring the extent of the problem and a report should be available in a few days. Until that report is issued, I am not able to state what action, if any, will be taken by the federal government, apart from saying that we are most concerned about the problem and that we are aware of some of the severe personal problems which are alleged to be arising in various parts of this country. However it is done, action will be taken for people who have suffered in this fashion and who are faced in some cases with pulling out the old insulation and putting in new. I understand that costs range from $7,000 to as much as $20,000, depending on the problem which exists in the home and depending on the size of the building.

However, I think it would be more constructive, honourable senators, if I were to bring to this chamber as much evidence as we have been able to gather to this point. Certainly, because that information will be factual in nature, honourable senators will then be able to judge for themselves.

Senator Muir: I have another supplementary. Once again I wish to thank the Leader of the Government in the Senate. With all due respect to him, I surely do not think he needs Senator "Edgar Bergen" Frith beside him to put words in his mouth. I am sure that the honourable leader—

Senator Frith: Well, did you say that or not? I would like to know.

Senator Muir: I am sure the Leader of the Government can respond on his own to questions put to him.

Senator Frith: Will the honourable senator accept a question?

Senator Muir: The government leader can respond to questions put to him without someone whispering or chattering in his ear, and I shall proceed upon this further supplementary.

Senator Frith: Would the honourable senator accept a question?

Senator Muir: I thought we were supposed to ask the questions, but go ahead. I shall be happy to.

Senator Frith: In your original question did you or did you not say that the government introduced this program "which it knew to be potentially dangerous"? That is what I heard. If you did not say it, or if you withdraw it now if you did say it, that is the end of the matter. But I clearly heard you say, I thought, "which it knew to be potentially dangerous." If you are suggesting that, then I think it is quite in order for me to say to the leader, "You should deal with that part of the question."

Senator Muir: I will put my question to the government and I will deal with that part of it tomorrow, because I know that the assistant house leader is rather upset today for some reason. I don't know what.

Senator Frith: Why can't you answer it today?

Senator Muir: I will respond to it tomorrow!

Senator Frith: Why not today?

Senator Muir: Can you hear me?

Senator Frith: Why will you not respond to it today?

Senator Muir: Can you hear me? I answered you. I will respond tomorrow.

Senator Frith: Why can't you respond today?

Senator Muir: I will respond—do I have to appeal to you, Mr. Speaker? Surely the honourable gentleman should know how to act in this house. I said to him in a very kindly, quiet way that I would respond to him tomorrow, and I shall.

Now, the Leader of the Government in the Senate said that he was familiar with the subject, and so on, and I realize that he is. I have information that he met in Vancouver with members of the urea formaldehyde foam insulation action committee on October 10. After the meeting, the leader was interviewed on a local radio station, allegedly saying that the government has not given consideration to assisting UFFI victims. However, the new Minister of State, Mr. Joyal, said on September 18 that the Treasury Board has accepted the principle of evaluating damages in compensating victims. In a subsequent press release, Mr. Joyal did not back away from leaving the impression that the government is considering compensating victims.

Now I very kindly ask: Would the leader take this occasion to clarify the issue one way or the other, and indicate if, in fact, the government has decided not to compensate victims of urea formaldehyde foam insulation? That is all I am asking.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, without any doubt the question is important, especially for those who have put urea formaldehyde foam insulation in the walls of their homes. With respect to any statements I have made publicly on this subject, I would invite honourable senators to listen to any tapes I have ever made relating to it. I have said from the outset that we must determine whether this substance is injurious to health. The companies deny that it is, and that matter is before the courts. If this material is injurious to health, then we must determine whether it is injurious to health under certain circumstances, and whether there were violations of those very strict application standards. If, in fact, this substance is injurious, then we must determine whether the material was installed properly, whether there is a degree of culpability on the part of the installation industry, and the degree of federal involvement in the authorization of this material for application both commercially and residentially.

What I am saying is that we are trying to determine where the responsibility lies in this matter. My personal belief is that those who must leave all their doors and windows open because they believe that this material is causing illness to their youngsters cannot wait for the resolution of legal problems which could go on for two years, three years or five years. Personally, I would like to see a program put into place immediately which would assist those who can prove clearly that this insulation substance is causing health problems. The validity of certain allegations, and the responsibility for those problems, could be worked out later, as is done in the case of certain air accidents. In the meantime, we should at least provide some assistance to those who are suffering.

However, the reports to date provide conflicting evidence. Definitive medical evidence has not yet been amassed. I know that a report is to be made available this month. Since we are almost at the end of the month, hopefully it will come out within a few days. As soon as that report is issued, I will bring as much information as I can to the chamber.

Honourable senators, I do not underestimate the problem. Senator Muir obviously does not underestimate the problem. I have had at least two meetings with large numbers of these people, and some of them are in a great state of emotional stress, and some believe that they are under a great deal of physical stress as well. I have talked to doctors associated with the problem, and at least one of them has told me of breathing problems and nasal irritations. I am sure that Senator Muir is aware of the problems with this material because he has talked to many people in the same circumstances in his own province.

I did not say that the government has taken a hard line and indicated that these people will not be helped. We have established inspection programs for homes where it is alleged that this material is causing problems, and we have put together a panel to survey the problem across the country. Soon we will have more in the way of hard information, and then we can proceed. I can give the assurance that we intend to proceed responsibly.

Senator Muir: I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government. I thank him for his kind and comprehensive answer, and I can see that he has some compassion in his heart, unlike his seatmate.

Senator Frith: Boy, he is looking for a scrap today.

Senator Muir: I do know that there have been cases of nasal problems, sores on faces, chest problems, and so on, and I have in my possession certified documents which support what the honourable leader has already stated.

I said that the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources was aware in 1977 of the dangers of this type of insulation and, as the honourable senator stated, the installation of this material was promoted by governmental authorities even though the potential danger was known. One would assume that if one branch of a department knew of these potential dangers, it would get in touch with the other branch and suggest that the material not be used. If that part of my question offends the honourable senator, then I will withdraw it because I would not want to upset him.

I would point out that the Leader of the Government has not responded to the portion of my question regarding what the Minister of State in the other place said on the subject of compensation.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, with regard to the statement which is attributed to the Minister of State, I, too, pursued the matter when I heard it on the radio and read it in the press. I was assured that the statement had not, in fact, been made in that fashion, and there was a suggestion that the minister had been misquoted. However, I am sure that we will know more about this problem very shortly, and if it is possible to table the report of the investigating committee in the Senate, then it will be done.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I bring a supplementary point to the attention of the minister. We have been talking about the primary problem, which is the health one, but there is a secondary problem, which is a monetary one. In my part of the country, realtors will not list houses which have this insulation installed because they do not know who is legally responsible for any deleterious effects. The minister has mentioned the question of legal responsibility being on his agenda. I would ask him to take note of this particular question so that when the matter is resolved by the Governor in Council, they will do something to free up the market for these properties which is now so badly hindered.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the potential economic side-effects of the problem are massive, and I think that should be said. May I also say to honourable senators who have had individual cases brought to their attention that I would be very pleased to receive any information they may wish to pass on. I shall channel that information to the proper government departments.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

MIDDLE EAST—PEACE PROPOSAL OF FIRST DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER OF SAUDI ARABIA

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate—not on the Constitution and not on the budget, but on an area of discord and concern in the Middle East. Alas, since I last interrogated the leader, the tension and discord in that area have increased, but in that period one of the positive and helpful developments has been the eight-point peace proposal of His Royal Highness, Crown Prince Fahd of Saudi Arabia, which has been well received and is absorbing the interests of chancelleries throughout the world. I note no indication of the Canadian government's interest in that matter or its attitude toward the proposal. I wonder if the minister is in a position to enlighten me as to Canada's point of view on this very practical and, I think, reasonable and, certainly, peace-intended initiative by the First Deputy Prime Minister of Saudi Arabia.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have received no information from the Secretary of State for External Affairs on this particular question. The question will be taken as notice and a reply provided.

UNITED NATIONS

ELECTION OF NEW SECRETARY GENERAL

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, earlier today I was asked a question about the Canadian government's position regarding support for Tanzanian Foreign Minister Salim A. Salim as Secretary General of the United Nations. I believe that this will establish a new Senate record for the production of replies. I have just been sent a document.

The Australian government has announced its support for Tanzanian Foreign Minister Salim A. Salim as Secretary General of the United Nations. As far as Canada is concerned, the election of the Secretary General will be first decided by the Security Council, of which Canada is not a member at this time. The single successful candidate will then be submitted to the General Assembly for election by secret ballot in keeping with tradition. Canada intends to remain neutral at this time.

A question was asked about its being appropriate for Canada to encourage a representative of a Commonwealth country such as Tanzania which, I believe, was the fundamental thrust of Senator Murray's question. If Foreign Minister Salim Salim were to be the choice of the Security Council, Canada would be very pleased to offer him its full co-operation.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

MIDDLE EAST—PEACE PROPOSAL OF FIRST DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER OF SAUDI ARABIA

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, before I put forward my supplementary, may I thank the honourable minister, but not terribly heartily, because Senator Murray and I knew what Australia was going to do, and we also know the procedure whereby the Secretary General is elected. However, we still do not know what Canada intends to do. In terms of new enlightenment, there is no particular blaze that blinds us. His intentions we do appreciate, and he may thank the sustained questioning that has been going on which gave him an interval of time.

● (1500)

As a supplementary to my own question, considering the importance of Saudi Arabia to the whole peace process and the stability of the Middle East—something recognized by the American State Department, by the British government and by others—and noting that King Khalid has been invited to Britain and the United States, would the minister advise us if consideration is being given, by this country, to inviting His Majesty to come to Canada to discourse and dialogue with Canadian leaders on the very serious and dangerous events in the area from which he comes and in which his country holds a very prominent place of leadership?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The question will be taken as notice.

JUSTICE

CONFIDENTIALITY OF MEDICAL RECORDS—JUDGMENT OF SUPREME COURT

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Would the Leader of the Government inform this chamber, either today or as soon as possible, of the reaction of the federal government to the recent Supreme Court decision relating to the Krever royal commission in Ontario on the whole matter of confidentiality of patients' medical information?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice. It is not the practice, however, to comment on a decision rendered by the courts.

STATUTE LAW (MILITARY AND CIVILIAN WAR PENSIONS, COMPENSATION AND ALLOWANCES) AMENDMENT ACT, 1980

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science entitled They Served—We Care which was tabled yesterday.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, on July 10, 1980, just before the summer adjournment, the Senate received Bill C-40, an act to amend the Pension Act, the Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act, the War Veterans Allowance Act and the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act.

Since that legislation embodied many improved benefits for veterans and their families, most parliamentarians wanted those benefits to be received as soon as possible, without several months' delay, and, as a result, the Senate approved it without its being referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science. However, it was agreed that the subject matter of Bill C-40 would be referred to the committee ex post facto for study and report when Parliament resumed.

Consequently, on November 6, 1980, the Senate authorized the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science to examine and report upon the subject matter of the Statute Law (Military and Civilian War Pensions, Compensation and Allowances) Amendment Act, 1980, Chapter 19, Statutes of Canada, 1980, and any regulations that might be made thereunder.

On March 19, 1981, the mandate was extended to the examination and consideration of the Annual Report of the Department of Veterans Affairs for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1980.

The Statute Law Amendment Act, 1980, introduced a large number of changes into the two most important pieces of legislation which deal with the treatment of veterans, namely, the Pension Act and the War Veterans Allowance Act. Some of those changes were of a minor or housekeeping nature; others were of vital importance, both in terms of financial commitment and the number of veterans and their families to be affected.

Having carefully assessed the treatment of veterans under the legislation, your committee decided that the major areas of continuing concern were: under the Pension Act, the scheme of proportionate pension payable to the spouses of deceased veterans, the continuation of the pension at the married rate following the death of a veteran, the system by which the pensions are indexed, and the continued existence of unacceptable delays in processing applications and in making adjudications; and, under the War Veterans Allowance Act, the residence requirement and the treatment of investment income.

Your committee found that there were still a number of anomalies in the treatment of veterans and their families. The report which I tabled last night deals with those concerns and makes some recommendations for their solution.

Perhaps I should say here that this report was approved on Tuesday, July 7, 1981. At that specific time Bill C-79, an act to amend the War Veterans' Land Act and to amend the Veterans Benefit Act in consequence thereof, was before the House of Commons and would amend the Veterans' Land Act to enable the spouse and dependants of a veteran to enforce their family law rights on property held under the Veterans' Land Act and the Veterans Benefit Act. The committee decided to make a recommendation to this effect if the legislation were not passed before the summer adjournment. The bill was passed promptly on July 9 and, as a result, made this recommendation unnecessary.

Bill C-82, an act to amend the Pension Act and the Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act, was passed by the Senate on July 10. It provided for the elimination of the phasing-in period of the proportionate pension payable to the spouses and dependants of deceased veterans.

Your committee commends the former Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs, the Honourable J. Gilles Lamontagne, for introducing that amendment, since the immediate payment of proportionate pensions to eligible spouses and dependants is an essential recommendation of our committee.

However, our recommendation, being Recommendation No. 1 in the report, goes substantially beyond the amendment proposed in Bill C-82 and adopted by its passage. For this reason, neither the text of the report nor the wording of the recommendation have been altered. We hope that the new Minister of Veterans Affairs will take equally prompt action on this and our other recommendations.

Since men do not live as long as women and disabled people tend to have a shorter-than-average life span, there is, yearly, a large number of veterans who die and leave widows behind them. Your committee was concerned about these women. Since widowers as well as the widows of war veterans were equal partners in marriage, we believe that they have also served and that Canada should care for them, and so we have entitled our report They Served—We Care.

The new legislation allows the spouse of a deceased veteran, who was in receipt of a disability pension of 47 per cent or less, a pension equal to one-half the amount of the disability pension. Similar benefits were extended to the spouses of former prisoners of war who were receiving, or who were entitled to receive, prisoner-of-war compensation at the time of their death.

• (1510)

Your committee was quite satisfied with the spirit and the positive philosophy of the legislation, but was rather disappointed in the phasing in of these benefits over a six-and-one-half-year period, as well as the setting of the spouse's pension at only one-half of the deceased veteran's disability pension.

We were quite pleased when, under the sponsorship of the then Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs, the Honourable J. Gilles Lamontagne, Bill C-82 was passed in the early part of July of this year, eliminating the phasing-in period and benefiting approximately 20,000 eligible spouses.

The proportionate pension paid is only equal to half of the deceased veteran's disability pension if the disability pension was assessed at 47 per cent or less at the time of death. Widows of pensioners whose disability was assessed at 48 per cent or more, however, qualify for the full spouse's pension of $608.60. There is, as a result, a large and unjust difference in the treatment of widows receiving the maximum award and those entitled to the proportionate pension. For many years, veterans' associations have urged that the government adopt a proportionate pension based on the relationship between twice the degree of the veteran's disability and the full spouse's pension. This proposal received the support of the House of Commons Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs in June 1975.

The difference in benefits to eligible spouses, as of January 1, 1981, can be illustrated as follows: If a veteran was receiving 48 per cent disability pension at the time of his death, his widow would receive $608.60. If a veteran was receiving only 45 per cent disability pension at the time of his death, which would be approximately $456.44, his widow would only receive $228.22. We are recommending that this pension be double the rate of the disability as a percentage of the full spouse's pension. So, our recommendation would be that she receive $547.74 rather than $228.22, or an increase of $319.52 a month over the present legislation.

In 1954 the Pension Act was amended to provide that on the death of a disability pensioner who was in receipt of a pension for his wife and child, the pension would be continued to the last day of the month in which death occurred. In 1980 the act was amended to provide that any pension or allowance awarded ceased to be payable on the first day of the month following the death of the person to whom, or in respect of whom, any allowance is paid.

This present practice still creates severe hardship for the widow of a 100 per cent pensioner, and even greater financial hardship if the pensioner is in receipt of the Exceptional Incapacity and/or Attendance Allowance.

Let us take the case of a married pensioner with a 100 per cent disability with bilateral below-the-knee amputation. The following is the pension at the married rate:

Pension under Schedule A of the Pension Act	$1,014.33
Exceptional Incapacity Allowance	143.19
Attendance Allowance	268.48
Total	$1,426.00

When the veteran dies, the pension on the month immediately following death is reduced to the widow's rate of $608.60 per month. This reduction usually requires the widow to make a drastic, immediate change in her way of life at a time when she is suffering from shock, grief, intense fatigue and disorientation due to loneliness, insecurity and anxiety about her future. For an elderly woman the loss of a husband is a serious traumatic experience. For most people at any age it would be financially difficult and mentally disturbing suddenly to be deprived of $825 in monthly income.

If a widow is living in a rented house or apartment, her lease will normally run for a year or so, so that she may have to pay that rent for several months at a rate she can no longer afford. If she owns her home and it is mortgaged, she may not be able to carry the monthly payments, and yet be unable to sell it or may be forced to sell at a loss. She may not be able immediately to find adequate new housing at a price she can afford. She may not be in a sufficiently stable emotional state to make the required decisions, and her physical health will suffer from the stress of her situation.

There are convincing precedents for continuing the married rate for a longer period of time. Under the War Veterans Allowance Act the principle of such a continuation has already been accepted on the basis of need for up to a year. In the United States a severely disabled pensioner has the premium on his G.I. insurance waived so that the widow gets $10,000 when the pensioner dies to help her until she goes on to the widow's pension. In the United Kingdom, there is special legislation that covers her for six months at the married rate. At any rate, we consider it inhumane to subject the surviving spouse of a disabled veteran to the drastic and immediate change in his or her standard of living, as is now required under the Pension Act. Therefore, we recommend, under the Pension Act, that:

(a) the pension at the married rate, when it is greater than the widow's/widower's pension, continue to be paid for a period of one year to the surviving spouse of a deceased veteran; and

(b) the surviving spouse of a deceased veteran in receipt of an Exceptional Incapacity and/or Attendance Allowance continue to receive such allowance for a period of one year following the death of the veteran.

The present legislation provides that pensions be increased in accordance with the Consumer Price Index—that is, the cost of living. However, since wages traditionally increase at a faster rate than the cost of living, it follows that the pensioner does not benefit from the general increase in the standard of living but falls behind, at least relatively, each year.

In 1972 there was mutual agreement by a joint government-veterans committee, established by the Minister of Veterans Affairs, that the disability pension at basic single rates should be tied to a composite of five unskilled categories of public servants' rates of pay. Since then the government has passed legislation increasing the basic rate effective July 1, 1973 and July 1, 1978, aligning it with the average of these five categories. However, there have been ad hoc increases not embodied in the Pension Act. Thus, the system which has been followed since 1973 essentially has been to give the veteran an annual increment based on the cost of living. If, as a result, the pension falls behind the wages paid to the composite unskilled labour group in the Public Service, the veterans' associations are presumably expected to point this out to the government every three or four years and to ask for a further increase to bring the pension up to the after-tax level of the composite group.

● (1520)

It was the opinion of the committee that there is no reason why veterans should be forced to approach the government "hat in hand" every few years. Therefore, we recommend:

that pension increases reflect the principle of parity with the average wage of five unskilled categories of Public Servants or the increase in the Consumer Price Index, whichever is the greater, and that this principle be entrenched in the Pension Act.

Providing veterans and their families with improved benefits will do little to improve their lives if prompt receipt of pensions and ancillary benefits is frustrated by delays in processing claims and deciding appeals.

The process of adjudication can take a total of at least four years from the day a claim is filed until a final decision is made. Within the past year the average time to adjudicate a first application has risen to more than 11 months, and to more than 7 months for a widow. At the same time, a backlog of approximately 4,000 cases are awaiting decision on a final appeal. According to the veterans organizations, the situation is particularly serious with regard to the first applicants, pension medical examinations for Attendance Allowance, payment of pension awards, appeals to the Pension Review Board and general correspondence. Because of these delays the committee recommends:

that all necessary steps be taken immediately to eliminate unacceptable delays in processing pension applications and in pension adjudications which have accumulated since 1970 and that to this end, particular consideration be given to encouraging essential staff to continue working beyond the normal age of retirement.

While the Statute Law Amendment Act, 1980 has removed the Canadian residence requirements for widows and children of recipients who die outside Canada, veterans, both military and civilian, must still return to Canada and reside here for a period of one year before they become eligible for benefits. Once in receipt of an allowance, however, they can then leave Canada and resume their residence abroad.

Most veterans find it difficult, and often impossible, to return to Canada to establish residence in order to comply with the present legislation.

The committee believes that those Canadians who, for personal reasons, chose to live abroad following their service should be entitled to the same benefit as those who returned to Canada, and, therefore, we recommend:

that the residence requirement of the War Veterans Allowance Act and the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act be amended to permit otherwise qualified persons to benefit from the legislation while residing outside Canada.

The Statute Law Amendment Act, 1980 increased the exemption for interest income from $50 to $100 per year in calculating entitlement to a War Veterans Allowance.

At present, because of current interest rates that are well over 10 per cent, a recipient with $1,000 invested in the bank receives interest income in excess of the exemption.

The committee believes that it is very important to a veteran to be able to set aside a few thousand dollars to pay funeral expenses and debts, or to leave to a spouse. The current limit is unrealistic and discourages such savings, and, therefore, we recommend:

that in the calculation of entitlement to a War Veterans Allowance, the annual exemption for income derived from bank deposits, bonds and dividends be raised to at least $500.

During the examination of witnesses the committee was impressed by the many references made to the report of the committee which studied the organization and work of the Canadian Pension Commission. This task force, set up in 1965, was chaired by Mervyn Woods and submitted its report in 1968. A great many of its recommendations were later incorporated in the 1970-1971 amendments to the Pension Act, and since then have been credited with having a major and beneficial effect on the treatment of veterans. On the other hand, many of the recommendations have not been implemented.

Our committee did not think that it was necessary for a massive study of all legislation dealing with veterans to be undertaken at this time. We do suggest, however, that the Woods report be reviewed, because a number of anomalies and inequities still exist in veterans' legislation and regulations.

There are, for example, two inequities which require further study, namely, the treatment of divorced spouses of veterans and the treatment of Dieppe prisoners of war.

Therefore, we recommend that:

- (a) the Government appoint a Committee composed of officials from both the government and veterans associations to review and update those recommendations of the Woods Committee which have not been implemented and to identify, study and make recommendations about the anomalies which still exist in the treatment of veterans and their survivors;
- (b) the Committee study the apparent inequity to a divorced spouse who under existing legislation has no entitlement to benefits under the Pension Act and the War Veterans Allowance Act; and
- (c) the Committee study the apparent inequity of the way in which veterans are compensated for periods spent as prisoners of war.

Finally, honourable senators, let me acknowledge with gratitude, during the course of this study and the preparation of this report, the work of the Clerk of the Committee, Mr. Patrick Savoie, and Mr. Henri-Georges Belleau and Mr. Grant Purves, of the Research Branch of the Library of Parliament. Let me also take this opportunity to thank the members of the committee who worked hard and long on behalf of the veterans and their families to see that they receive proper recognition from their fellow Canadians for the service they have given to their country. I should like to make special mention of Senator Jack Marshall, Senator Florence Bird, Senator Fred McGrand and Senator Andrew Thompson, who are members of our steering committee, as well as all the other members of the committee who attended the meetings faithfully and showed that they care for the great service to our country by our many veterans and their spouses.

It is fitting that we should table this report just days before November 11, when we will all pause for a minute at the eleventh hour of the eleventh day of the eleventh month to recognize that they served and we care and we shall remember them.

On motion of Senator Marshall, debate adjourned.

VIA RAIL CANADA INC.

MOTION TO INSTRUCT TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS COMMITTEE TO MAKE STUDY—DEBATE RESUMED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Riley:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications be instructed to inquire into and report upon the national rail passenger service provided to Canadians by VIA Rail Canada Inc. and, in particular to examine

- (a) the Federal Government's plans for reorganizing Canada's passenger train services announced by Transport Minister Jean-Luc Pepin on July 27, 1981;
- (b) the changes in passenger train services effected by Order in Council P.C. 1981-2171, dated August 6, 1981, made pursuant to subsection 64(1) of the National Transportation Act; and
- (c) the procedure followed by way of Order in Council P.C. 1981-2171 in varying the Canadian Transport Commission's Orders and Decisions respecting Canada's passenger train services.

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, between the middle of August and the middle of September of this year, I was a member of the task force that covered Canada from coast to coast, to hold public hearings on the abandonment of railway lines and reduction in services. We held hearings for 15 days in 13 cities and heard 325 briefs during 125 hours of testimony. I had accepted the invitation of the Leader of the Opposition to become a member of the task force with some reservations. As a former member of the board of directors of Canadian National, I must admit I had somewhat rigid views on passenger rail services in Canada, or as my English-speaking friends would say, I was a bit of a tight wad. When I accepted the invitation, I had the distinct impression—and I said so to the Leader of the Opposition—that my own personal views would probably constitute a minority opinion. Well, I was wrong! The Minister of Transport was walking on dangerous ground when he unilaterally and arbitrarily announced the abandonment of a number of railway lines and a reduction in services which will affect 19 per cent of passenger services—1,200,000 passengers—and the availability of passenger rail services to several hundred thousand people, the direct loss of 1,600 jobs on the tracks and in the workshops at Canadian National and Canadian Pacific, and, indirectly, the loss of other service jobs in small communities as a result of the minister's actions. Obviously, smaller communities will be more severely affected than the larger urban centres. A small town like, for instance, Capreol in Ontario will suffer a severe economic setback through the loss of salaries of more than 30 railway employees who will be losing their jobs. Large centres are able to absorb such setbacks more readily, but they will still have their problems. Smaller towns will not be as lucky. If these cutbacks are implemented, a number of small communities will be left without railway services and without any acceptable alternative. Some communities in northern Ontario, for instance, will be completely isolated, because there are no roads or highways at the present time.

● (1530)

[English]

Honourable senators, I have heard evidence at first hand. I have examined all aspects of the minister's announcement. I have looked at all the ins and outs and, for the life of me, I cannot see how he can justify what he has done. To achieve his end, the minister used section 64 of the National Transportation Act. That section does empower the minister to change or rescind orders of the Canadian Transport Commission; but does it give him and the cabinet the power to write government policy, using section 64 as the vehicle or instrument? I doubt that very much. Section 64 was intended by its drafters to allow the minister discretionary power, not dictatorial power.

The minister made his announcement through a press release while Parliament was adjourned, and chose to act through orders in council. He completely by-passed the normal procedure of referring the matter to the Canadian Transport Commission and allowing that body to hold public hearings to determine public convenience and necessity.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Charbonneau: In doing so he has diminished the role of the Canadian Transport Commission and has weakened public confidence in the democratic process. The minister has completely ignored Parliament, the Canadian Transport Commission and the public. He has unilaterally and arbitrarily imposed a decision of vast magnitude by executive order alone.

There are no compelling reasons for the minister to have acted as he has done. His decision flies in the face of logic and economics in an energy-conscious economy. He has chosen to punish the most efficient user of energy in this country. It cannot be disputed that, seat-mile for seat-mile, trains give us a far greater and more efficient return per gallon of diesel fuel than do planes, ships or highway vehicles. His department's own statistics tell us that rail is more efficient in recovering costs than any other mode of transportation and depends less on government subsidies.

The department's most recent figures reveal that rail recovers 82 per cent of its costs; highway transportation, 49 per cent; marine, only 22 per cent; and air, only 32 per cent. It seems to me that the Department of Transport officials are misleading the minister in their bias toward air transport in transportation policy. They use positive buzz words to obscure the facts. It would seem that money spent on air transport is considered by them to be an investment, while federal funds spent on rail transport are regarded as subsidies.

Let there be no misunderstanding: air transport in Canada is heavily subsidized. The Department of Transport carries on its books almost $1.5 billion in land and terminals. Rents, landing fees and airport passenger taxes do not come near matching the federal funds needed each year to subsidize air travel.

Honourable senators may be surprised to learn that only about 25 per cent of the Canadian population has ever flown. For various reasons, such as the cost, fear of flying and accessibility to airports, three-quarters of Canada's population have never flown on commercial aircraft.

Let us look for a moment at highway transport. Taxation on fuel and licence fees pays only about half of the immense costs involved in highway infrastructure and maintenance. The same applies to marine transport, which recovers only 23 per cent of its costs. Simple arithmetic tells us that it requires federal subsidies of 77 per cent to keep marine transport afloat—and, in saying that, no pun is intended.

It makes no sense to cut back on the most efficient mode of public transportation in Canada. It is incumbent upon the government to provide certain services—perhaps at a loss but at the least possible cost. Rail is near the top of the list of essential services. The patchwork dismantling or dismembering of our passenger rail service defies all logic. Some of our most heavily patronized trains are being arbitrarily mothballed. Residents in some parts of heavily populated areas are being cut off. Residents in Saint John and southwestern New Brunswick will now have to backtrack at least 100 miles to catch the Ocean Limited in Moncton. In doing so they will be adding hours and hundreds of extra miles to their journey if they wish to travel to Montreal.

Northern New Brunswick residents, particularly in the Edmundston area, are being deprived of their regular service to Moncton. The Saint John-Sherbrooke-Montreal run—the popular “Atlantic”—is being discontinued. Residents of Sherbrooke and area will be completely dependent on bus service—and I might add that the bus services were recently on strike for a period of about five months.

The regular daily service between Toronto, Peterborough and Havelock—according to some transportation experts, a moneymaker—is being scrapped. Eight years ago the city of Peterborough had five trains per day. Soon it will have none.

Ottawa and Hull are being dropped from transcontinental service. As Ottawa's mayor, Marion Dewar, stated, it is inconceivable that the nation's capital would now not be part of that service.

The northern transcontinental train linking Edmonton and Vancouver via Jasper is also being scrapped.

Those are only a few of the major cuts and cutbacks announced by the minister. I say again that his logic escapes me. He is taking negative measures that will force Canadians back into their private cars, and it will only add to our energy crisis problems. At a time when we should be upgrading, improving and streamlining passenger services, the minister is cutting out and downgrading services. Every other industrialized nation in the world is improving its rail passenger service, but Mr. Pepin is marching to the tune of a different drummer. Almost every week we see news stories and photographs indicating that other nations are bringing new rail technology on stream. We have seen that in connection with Japan, France, South Africa, and even the United States of America.

For too long we have marked time in advancing technology and equipment in Canada. The Bombardier LRCs are an exception. Those light, rapid and comfortable rail units will soon be introduced in Canada, but only along the Quebec City-Windsor corridor. They were promised also to eastern and western Canada, but they have since been withdrawn for exclusive use in central Canada. Is it any wonder that we have regional alienation in this country?

● (1540)

As honourable senators know, VIA Rail was formed in 1977, first as a subsidiary of Canadian National, and later in 1977 was transformed into a schedule D crown corporation, entirely separate from any other crown corporation. However, neither VIA Rail nor the policies it pursues have ever been the subject of a debate in the House of Commons, nor in the Senate, as Senator Godfrey mentioned last night. VIA Rail was formed by the government, and now its services are being dismantled by that same government, without the benefit of full debate by the country's legislators. VIA Rail's relations with the government, and especially its contracting system with Transport Canada, have never been adequately defined nor debated. We suspect that the department exerts much more influence on the affairs of VIA Rail than is good for either VIA Rail or the public, though the influence is doubtless exercised in those directions that the government wishes to pursue. It is those directions, however, which must be aired, debated and ultimately approved by Parliament as a whole.

I further submit that such an area of transport policy, especially in regard to VIA Rail, should take place before, and not after, any services are discontinued.

Government policy is the obvious driving force behind the present proposals. It is that policy which must be debated. The fact that the minister waited until after Parliament had adjourned in July of this year before making his dramatic announcement is proof positive to me that he wishes to avoid such consultation and debate until after the service cuts are a fait accompli.

The suspicion, according to all the witnesses we have heard, is rampant throughout the land that, first, the railroads wanted out of the rail passenger service, and, now, that the government wants out too. Under the Railway Act the two major railways have obligations and responsibilities to the Canadian public. Under the Canadian Pacific Act of 1881 CP has the responsibility for the efficient and perpetual operation of the railroad. The government has chosen to take over that responsibility by creating VIA Rail. It cannot be cast aside at the stroke of a pen or an order in council.

The government has responsibilities to individuals and to communities. Some communities were created by the railroads. The minister's arbitrary action will soon destroy them. I have heard of multi-million-dollar developments which have been shelved because of the discontinuance of rail services. Private entrepreneurs are loath to proceed because rail service has been suspended. These include residential and commercial projects.

Tourism in Canada is being dealt a body blow. Tour operators on the west coast are apprehensive as to what the cuts will do to the Japanese tourist trade. One operator fears the loss of 20,000 to 25,000 Japanese tourists if the cuts go forward.

The Jasper Chamber of Commerce estimates that 100,000 tourists, many of them Japanese and Americans, arrive at Jasper by train. Now there will be no train to Jasper. The Jasper Chamber of Commerce estimates that the loss in tourist dollars to the town could be as high as $10 million. Jasper will become a ghost town. Small local businesses built up as a result of tourism will go under.

A recent letter appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press written by a Miami, Florida travel agent. He wrote:

Our travel agency sends more Americans to travel by Canada's scenic railroad routes than for any other reason.

The Minister of Transport is making his cuts to save $100 million in eastern and western Canada so that he can spend $100 million in modernizing equipment to be used in central Canada along the Quebec City-Windsor corridor. I call that robbing Peter to pay Paul. He is causing serious disruptions all across Canada, and his decision will add to our energy woes. He will add 1,600 railroad employees to the already swollen unemployment rolls. He will cause economic hardship in countless communities across this land. He will deny access to rail services to millions of Canadians who have just as much right to the service as the residents along the favoured corridor.

If VIA Rail beefs up its central Canada service, what might be the net effect? It could drive some of the major bus companies over the brink. Then government might be placed in the absurd position of having to directly subsidize service in order to guarantee its survival. Voyageur, for instance, in Quebec, makes a profit on eight lines only, and loses money on 20 other lines. The eight lines are used to subsidize the other 20. If you ask me, the minister has thrown out the baby with the bath water.

VIA Rail has not been given a fair chance. In only four years it has increased train ridership by 41 per cent. Rail passenger patronage is definitely on the increase. More and more Canadians are turning to rail as a cheaper, more efficient alternative means of travel. It would be criminal to frustrate VIA Rail's progress at this point in its growth. I am sure VIA Rail is a reluctant accomplice in the minister's decision, and given their druthers they would "druther" build, not tear down, the nation's rail passenger service.

The president of VIA Rail has appeared at various times before parliamentary committees, and from his testimony we can draw the obvious inferences as to what ails VIA Rail.

VIA Rail is in a financial bind largely created by costing order R-6313 of the Transport Commission. It has no fixed contracts with CN and CP. Instead, it has open-end, cost-plus contracts which militate against proper budgeting and proper accounting. It all adds up to a helluva way to end a railroad.

VIA Rail is not master of its own house. It is not permitted to operate the passenger service in a businesslike manner. It inherited obsolete and antiquated equipment from CN and CP at considerable cost—$70 million, to be exact. Because this equipment is so old, the costs of maintenance are labour intensive. At the present time 63 per cent of VIA Rail's revenues flow back to the CN and CP for rails and services.

My conclusions, as far as the process of the decision is concerned, are as follows.

There is massive objection across Canada to the government's decision to remove one-fifth of Canada's rail passenger services. A large number of Canadian citizens are outraged at the arbitrary manner in which the decision was made and as a result of which the reductions will occur, without reference to Parliament or recourse to public hearings.

The decision to cut rail services made by order in council has seriously impaired the role of the Canadian Transport Commission as protector of the public interest in transportation services.

The unilateral and arbitrary process by which the decision was made constitutes a dangerous precedent for further emasculation of Canada's transportation services.

As to the social and economic aspects of this situation, I submit that there is widespread public support for the concept of VIA Rail among the more than 1.2 million Canadians who will be affected by the cuts, and a concern that VIA Rail be given a more adequate time frame and the financial means to prove itself.

Special groups of Canadians, such as the disabled, the elderly and the economically disadvantaged, to whom other passenger modes are physically or financially impossible, will be severely affected by the cutbacks.

The cuts discriminate unfairly against Canadians living in sparsely populated or remote areas, such as northerners, or the Indian people, who have no other modes of transportation available to or from their communities.

● (1550)

The overall negative impact on the labour force will be far greater than the direct loss of 1,600 jobs of VIA Rail and railway employees.

As to regional alienation, the cuts are unjustifiably discriminatory towards certain areas of Canada and thus will create further discord, disharmony and regional tension. Government policies to improve regional and economic opportunities are often offset by contradictory policies of reducing transportation services to those same regions. Over two-thirds of the job losses caused by the cuts will occur in regions beyond central Canada, mainly in areas already disadvantaged or with existing employment problems. A widespread view exists that any savings produced by the cutbacks across the country will be spent to upgrade services in the narrow transportation corridor between Quebec City and Windsor, which, in the public mind, already enjoys superior rail, highway, bus and air transport services.

Concerning quality and accessibility of service, I submit that there is a significant public view that huge capital projects of questionable value, such as the Pickering airport site and the Mirabel airport, evidence a distinct and perhaps reckless bias on the part of the Department of Transport toward the air mode of passenger service.

In making the cuts, the minister failed to consider more attractive alternatives towards reducing government subsidy, such as modernization of equipment, as evidenced in recent studies initiated by Transport 2000, the Government of Alberta and even VIA Rail itself. The state and age of VIA's equipment obscures the potential viability of rail passenger service by making it disproportionately costly to maintain, unreliable and unattractive to many potential customers. Present service and equipment have been allowed to deteriorate to the point that rail service is now slower and less reliable than it was in the 1950s or earlier.

There exists a general recognition and willingness on the part of the Canadian public to pay higher fares, especially if a higher quality of rail passenger service becomes available. This point was repeated again and again. There is considerable public dissatisfaction with much of VIA Rail's scheduling of trains, which, in many cases, appears completely inappropriate to customer needs.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I therefore recommend that the minister, before making a final decision with respect to cutbacks in railway routes, should appoint a commission with a mandate to make an in-depth study of all forms of transportation in Canada, including marine, air, highway and railway transportation, in order to establish the real costs to the taxpayer of the grants or subsidies being provided to each one.

Subsequently, the government will be able to decide what amounts will be made available for subsidies and award such funds on an equitable basis, after debate in the House of Commons and the Senate. I feel these suggestions should be examined, and that is why I am supporting the motion of Senator Riley to refer this matter to the Senate Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

[English]

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: Honourable senators, perhaps the honourable gentleman would not mind answering a question arising from some of his comments. I was very interested, as I am sure all honourable senators were, in the figure that Senator Charbonneau gave with respect to air travel in Canada. He said that 75 per cent of the total population—which, I presume, would include children as well as adults—has never flown.

I have three questions for the honourable senator. First, could he tell us where he got that figure? I do not remember having seen or heard it before. Secondly, does he have the figure for adults alone, as opposed to that for adults and children? Thirdly, does he have a provincial breakdown of that figure?

Senator Charbonneau: Honourable senators, with regard to the first question, that figure has been established, I believe, by several bodies. Though I have piles of testimony here, I do not have the figures at hand. I believe that Transport 2000, which is a nation-wide organization which you have probably heard about, has conducted studies and has compiled all kinds of transportation statistics. I know that body has come up with that figure.

With regard to the second and third questions, I have not seen any breakdown as between adults and children, or, for that matter, a breakdown as between provinces. However, I could take a note of your request and perhaps contact some of the witnesses. If I can secure those figures, I will be pleased to provide them to you.

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, I regret that it was not possible for me to be in the chamber on Thursday last to hear the erudite remarks of my provincial and regional colleague, the Honourable Daniel Riley. I have, however, read the Hansard report with close attention. Senator Riley has moved that the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications be instructed to inquire into and report upon the national rail passenger service provided to Canadians by VIA Rail Canada Inc., and so on. He also admonished us, as colleagues, due to a sense of urgency in dealing with this important subject, to restrict our speeches so that witnesses may be called and heard by the standing Senate committee.

In response to his exhortation, let me say that I support his motion fully so that we may hear witnesses and gather facts. And in response to his admonition, that is the sum of my speech.

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator van Rогgen, debate adjourned.

VISITORS IN GALLERY

HUNGARIAN FREEDOM FIGHTERS

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, it is a privilege to rise in this chamber at this time to bring to the attention of honourable senators the presence in the gallery of representatives of a delegation of Canadians of Hungarian ethnic origin who are visiting the Parliament of Canada this afternoon to commemorate the October 1956 Hungarian uprising.

Twenty-five years ago the Hungarian nation rose to regain its freedom and independence. Since those tragic days Canada has received in asylum 40,000 refugees from that country. During that span of years they have contributed tremendously to the economic and cultural growth of our country.

In honouring these freedom fighters, I would like to welcome them to the Senate chamber and wish them an enjoyable visit. I invite honourable senators to meet with them in the Railway Committee Room later this day.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

LABOUR RELATIONS

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, June 30 the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Deschatelets:

That a special committee of the Senate, to be composed of seven members, be appointed to inquire into and report upon

(a) any matter relating to labour relations in Canada with particular reference to problems concerning the free collective bargaining process and the constructive settlement of disputes; and

(b) any proposals for a more orderly and less disruptive exercise of the right to strike;

That the Committee have power to engage the services of such technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purposes of the inquiry; and

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, to report from time to time, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, since it is some months since this motion was last debated it may be of interest to mention briefly just what it involves.

It was on June 18 last that Senator Deschatelets gave notice that he would call the attention of the Senate to the serious disintegration of labour relations in Canada and to various proposals for a more orderly and less disruptive exercise of the right to strike. On June 23 he spoke on the question. In his speech he pointed out the large number of work stoppages we are having in Canada and he mentioned that in 1979 labour-management conflicts resulted in 1,050 work stoppages involving close to half a million employees. I suspect that if the figures were available for 1980 and 1981 they would show a considerable increase. He also mentioned, although I do not think it was necessary for him to do so, that he spoke only as a concerned Canadian who did not question the right to strike or to order lockouts, and did not speak in support of either labour or management. His purpose can best be described in his own words. He said:

the only reason why I enter this debate is the responsibility which we share as members of the Senate for millions of our fellow Canadians who suffer from such situations—

Strikes and lockouts.

—which affect services, often essential ones, to which they are entitled, who are never consulted and who are used as innocent hostages.

I may add that the language is perhaps a little strong, but it certainly conveys his meaning. He continued:

Adding to this the current economic situation plagued by inflation, unemployment, high interest rates and an insignificant increase in productivity, one may well understand how urgent it is to have a very close look at the use of the right to strike and have lockouts, in order first to reduce the number of strikes and lockouts, and then to shorten them when they do occur.

The senator also mentioned various proposals which would be worthy of study, such as limiting by law any wage increases over the increase in the cost of living. He referred to a system used in Sweden and another in West Germany, and made the suggestion of giving labour a voice in management by having labour people on boards of directors.

Just to complete the picture, on June 30 Senator Deschatelets moved his motion to have a special committee of the Senate appointed to look into labour matters. While the proposed committee would be authorized to study all matters relating to labour disputes, I think it is fair to say that its chief study would probably be centred on strikes, with a view to proposing a substitute for them and exercising control over them, which, of course, would limit their effectiveness.

Honourable senators, on the same day, June 30, Senator Lawson spoke to the motion. As is well known, he is a responsible, highly respected and highly qualified labour leader. He speaks from the labour-employee point of view; consequently, his remarks carry great weight. I suspect that his attitude towards the proposed committee represents that of many of the leaders of labour unions.

Dealing with what might be called the essence of the motion, he made the following statement, which can be found at page 2671 of Hansard:

I would also urge extreme caution before any hasty move is made to establish a committee to take a walk out on this landmine that exists across Canada called "labour relations."

He further stated:

I am also concerned about what is proposed by Senator Deschatelets regarding "a more orderly and less disruptive exercise of the right to strike." That sounds pretty good, except if we are talking about a free society, free collective bargaining and free trade unions, the most essential ingredient in that is the right to strike—the right of the worker to withdraw his services, to withdraw his labour. To tamper with that would be to insist on changing the whole system.

Honourable senators, generally speaking I find myself in agreement with these remarks of Senator Lawson. Labour relations in Canada today are in a disturbed state. Indeed, I think they are in a sort of transitional period, and that is largely as a result, I think, of economic conditions, and I do not expect that there will be any substantial improvement until economic conditions improve and become stabilized.

Strikes are being widely used, so I expect any study proposed by the motion would concentrate on limiting the right to strike and on introducing some substitute for strikes. Personally, I do not believe unions would be prepared at this time to accept any limitation or substitution.

Speaking of strikes, I would ask you to remember that labour won the right to strike only after a long, hard battle that took place over many years. As a result, it is the most cherished right of organized labour and goes to the very foundation of labour policies. To limit that right in any way would, I think, provoke most determined opposition.

Honourable senators, traditionally, the right to strike has been the ultimate weapon in a struggle between management and workers, and it still is, even though it seems to be used more often now than formerly. But it should be noted that hundreds of agreements are reached between employers and employees under the collective bargaining system without any recourse to strikes. As a rule, the public does not hear of these, but the public does become alarmed when a major strike is in effect, such as a postal strike, which affects a great many people.

You may recall, too, that over the years various aids or methods have been developed by governments to assist the parties to arrive at a mutual agreement. At one time, for instance, conciliation boards were popular, and each side would select someone to represent it, with the two so elected agreeing upon a third. I believe it was Mr. Mackenzie King who, as Deputy Minister of Labour, first advocated that method of trying to settle industrial disputes. Certainly, he advocated it in his book Industry and Humanity.

The recommendations of a conciliation board had no legally binding effect, but such recommendations did influence public opinion and public support, and thus very often provided a settlement. However, after a time those boards fell into disuse, principally, I suspect, because actually it had come to be the chairman who decided the issue. However, such boards are still used in some cases, usually with the chairman being appointed by the Department of Labour.

Over the years various types of mediation in labour disputes have developed and these have been fairly successful both in preventing strikes and in assisting the parties to come to a settlement when strikes do occur.

• (1610)

Now, honourable senators, I expect that the motion before us is, at least in part, a reflection of public opinion at the present time. I do believe there is a rather widespread belief that strikes should not be allowed in what is termed essential industries, though there does not appear to be general agreement on what constitutes an essential industry. We do know that rail transportation is so regarded, as governments have legislated striking railway workers back to work and have eventually imposed a settlement of their disputes with their employers. And, of course, the effects of the recent postal strike so annoyed the general public that I expect the government was under considerable pressure to legislate an end to it, and may I add that personally I am pleased that it did not do so.

However, in these days when a great many of the services we require or at least enjoy can be interrupted by strikes, the question does arise as to when the point arrives when the interest of society as a whole takes precedence over the interest—the legitimate interest—of any section of society as represented by a group of employees.

Over many years this question has been asked and debated, but so far as I know a satisfactory answer has not yet been found. It was back in 1920 that the State of Kansas put into effect a law known as the Industrial Court Act which provided for the compulsory adjudication of industrial disputes. That court was given authority not only to order employers and employees to work but also to take over and run such industries which did not obey the court orders. I do not know what eventually happened to that law, but I remember reading a debate on the matter, and Samuel Gompers, the then President of the American Federation of Labour, was asked in effect who protected the public interest in industrial disputes. He admitted he had no clear answer, and I think the situation is pretty much the same today.

Now, honourable senators, while I do think that the right to strike is an essential right of a labour union, and that without that right labour could not have made the gains it has over the years, I think I am realistic enough to realize that the relationship between employer and employees, that is, unionized employees, is pretty well balanced. It is no longer the weak bargaining with the strong. And I think, too, that there is developing in our society a feeling that in certain cases legal strikes should not be permitted. What these cases are is a matter of debate. I expect the protection of persons and property—that is, police and fire protection—and at least a minimum health delivery service would be regarded as essential.

It is interesting to note that after a six-week police strike in Halifax the head of the Police Association stated that police strikes were not the answer, and intimated that binding arbitration might be. The provision of health care is a difficult and complex matter. In Nova Scotia we have just come through a three-week strike of non-medical hospital workers. About 6,000 personnel were on strike and they effectively closed down at least 27 hospitals, except for emergency treatment by supervisory personnel. The services of all non-medical personnel cannot be classified as essential, yet by putting up picket lines, which essential workers belonging to other unions would not cross, the strike, which was legal, was made very effective.

Honourable senators, it may seem that I am contradicting myself when I say that I am not in favour of this motion, yet believe there are some essential services in which strikes should not be permitted. I do not feel there is any real contradiction. I believe that for a union to be effective it must have the right to strike, and at the same time I think that the public as a whole is entitled to some essential services without interruption. I think also that in the ongoing development of collective bargaining it will be recognized that strikes cannot take place in certain services, but I think this should come from the membership of the unions rather than from sources outside the labour movement. I do not know if the mover of the motion has had any indication from labour people that they would welcome such a study or, at least, that it would be acceptable to them. If not, I am afraid that, if passed, this motion could well be regarded as an attack on the rights now enjoyed by unionized employees.

Honourable senators, while at the present time there is a great deal of criticism of the collective bargaining system because of the large number of strikes, I think it should be remembered that, with all its faults, it is the best system yet devised for promoting harmonious relations between employers and employees.

Honourable senators, I realize that Senator Deschatelets has given this matter a great deal of thought and a great deal of his time. It may well be that the committee he proposes could perform a valuable service. If it is set up, I hope it will. However, I do believe that passing this motion at this time would serve no useful purpose. Therefore, I do not support it.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ENTITLED "CERTAIN ASPECTS OF THE CANADIAN CONSTITUTION"—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Lamontagne, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs entitled: "Certain aspects of the Canadian Constitution", tabled in the Senate on 26th November, 1980.—(Honourable Senator Marshall).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government):

Honourable senators, I have spoken to Senator Marshall about this order in the same terms as I spoke to him yesterday about the order dealing with development of hydro power and offshore oil resources in Newfoundland, and he agreed that we should stand this order for at least two or three weeks, or certainly until we are through with the Constitution and the budget, if ever. May I suggest that we put this order over for three weeks or a month?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Three weeks.

Order stands.

ENERGY

GOVERNMENT POLICY—MOTION TO REFER SUBJECT MATTER OF INQUIRY TO BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Murray, seconded by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.:

That the subject-matter of the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Argue, P.C., which appeared on the Orders of the Day on November 20, 1980, be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I mentioned yesterday that I had hoped to persuade Senator Murray that the objective of this order is met by the pre-study of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce relating to Bill C-48. He agrees that we can postpone this order for a month or two in order to see how the whole subject fares before the committee, which has an order to study Bill C-48 and "all related matters." I would suggest the same date as we picked for the freedom of information matter, which is December 2.

Order stands.

CANADA-UNITED STATES INTER-PARLIAMENTARY GROUP

TWENTY-SECOND MEETING—REPORT OF CANADIAN DELEGATION

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson rose pursuant to notice of Thursday, October 15, 1981:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Twenty-second Meeting of the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group, held at Halifax, Nova Scotia, from 22nd to 26th May, 1981.

He said: Honourable senators, the report of the Twenty-second Meeting of the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group, held in Halifax from May 22 to 26, 1981, which I tabled on October 15, is extremely late in being brought to your attention. Last year I was able to report to you on the Twenty-first Meeting on July 15, 1980 but, unfortunately, this year the parliamentary recess came upon us before the report was ready.

However, as you are well aware, the causes of differences between the United States and Canada are sufficiently serious and, unfortunately, sufficiently numerous that I believe the report of the discussions between the parliamentarians of the two countries should be well set out in our permanent records.

The United States delegation was led by Senator Ted Stevens and Congressman Dante B. Fascell as co-chairmen. Our delegation had Mr. Ian Watson, M.P., and myself as co-chairmen. For the purpose of dealing with the lengthy agenda, our meetings were, as usual, divided into three committees, as set forth in the report. Co-chairmen of the committees were as follows: Committee I, Representative Sam Gibbons and myself; Committee II, U.S. Senator James A. McClure and

[Senator Flynn.]

Mr. Frank Oberle, M.P.; and Committee III, Representative James Oberstar and Mr. Ian Watson, M.P.

A year ago I was able to indicate that the Twenty-first Meeting of the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group had given rise to some optimism with regard to a better understanding between our two countries of the many complicated and sometimes irritating issues involved. There was still hope that the U.S. Senate might ratify the Fisheries Treaty. Thus, it was arranged for a smaller delegation from our group to visit the United States Senate Foreign Relations Committee during the summer with the hope of expediting ratification. In the event, as you know, there was further delay in the Senate, and President Reagan finally withdrew the treaty.

• (1620)

It is hardly necessary for me to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the lack of a treaty on the east coast fishery has led to unbridled and unreasonable competition for fish on the Georges Bank and possibly some other Atlantic areas. It has been said that if some control is not instituted the scallops, at least, will be completely fished out. I have heard that the American fishing fleet there has risen from 20 vessels last year to 120 this year, and our own restrictive controls have had to be removed in view of this competition. It is perfectly obvious that this is a disastrous situation for the fishery and our maritime population.

Last year, also, arrangements were made for continuing discussions on grains marketing, and a sub-delegation met with our American counterparts in Ottawa to deal with this matter. I understand that some progress was made, and another meeting is scheduled for the end of this week to further these talks.

You will see in the report for this year, which I have now tabled, less indication of any general easing in the different points of view of our two countries. There are still issues, many of them hardy perennials, which have been on the agenda for several years, and these complicate our relationship with our neighbour. Some, such as the acid rain problem, the FIRA problem, the national energy problem and others, are viewed with considerable concern, but usually with different degrees of importance on the part of our two countries.

I am not going to review this lengthy report because I believe that the matters discussed therein have been very clearly set out. I would like to say that, while I have indicated that we might feel some disappointment at the lack of tangible results, this is really what is expected of these meetings. The objective is to give a thorough airing to the views of the people of both countries, with the hope that, with a complete understanding, parliamentarians will in due course deal with the issues more effectively and more sympathetically than would otherwise be the case.

I said I would not be long and I now want to terminate these few remarks. In doing so, I should tell you that my term as co-chairman under the Canada-U.S. Group's Constitution is for two years, and this term has already been exceeded. In fact, our political timetable these last years has caused me to chair three meetings with the United States congressmen. It has been a very interesting experience, and I would like to express my appreciation for the co-operation and interest of the co-chairmen with whom I have served, Mr. Herb Breau, M.P., and Mr. Ian Watson, M.P. This message also applies to the members of our group from the House of Commons. At the same time I want to record my sincere gratitude to the honourable senators for their active participation and continued support. They have made my task relatively easy.

The staff work by the Parliamentary Relations Secretariat has been absolutely first class, and the arrangements made by the Parliamentary Centre for Foreign Relations and Trade, the materials brought forth for briefing our members, the preparation of agendas and the planning of the discussions made it possible for our Canadian delegation to carry out their responsibilities effectively.

I recommend this report for your serious examination.

The Hon. the Speaker: As no other honourable senator wishes to participate in the debate, this inquiry is considered as having been debated.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, October 22, 1981

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Report of Canadian Arsenals Limited, including its accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1981, pursuant to sections 75(3) and 77(3) of the Financial Administration Act, Chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970.

Report by the Tariff Board, pursuant to the Inquiry ordered by the Minister of Finance respecting the petition for safeguard action by Dominion Colour Company Ltd., Safeguard Petition No. 5, Reference No. 158, pursuant to section 6 of the Tariff Board Act, Chapter T-1, R.S.C., 1970.

Order in Council P.C. 1981-2186, dated August 19, 1981, amending the Bankruptcy Rules, pursuant to section 180(2) of the Bankruptcy Act, Chapter B-3, R.S.C., 1970.

VISITORS IN GALLERY

FEDERATED WOMEN'S INSTITUTES OF CANADA

Hon. Martha P. Bielish: Honourable senators, it is with great pleasure that I draw to your attention the presence in the south gallery of the President of the Federated Women's Institutes of Canada, Mrs. Emmie Oddie of Regina, and her entire executive.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, October 27, 1981, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, my question concerns the week of November 9. Remembrance Day, November 11, which falls on the Wednesday of that week, is normally a non-sitting day. I am wondering whether the leader or the deputy leader has made any decisions as to whether the Senate will be sitting that week.

● (1410)

Senator Frith: Other honourable senators have asked, in effect, the same question. With the meeting of first ministers taking place at the very beginning of the first week of November, there are a number of permutations and combinations that could mean we will find one particular day named in the other place, and a different day named here requiring us to sit at some time that week.

Therefore, I am in the position of having to answer that I do not know because all the information is not yet in. If it were not for the possibility I have just referred to, we could agree to sit on Monday and Tuesday or, perhaps, Thursday and Friday. I do not think we can risk making such definite plans as would not, for example, require us to sit on the Tuesday and Thursday. I do not think that is likely, but I think we should hold ourselves open at least until next week, when we will have a better feel for what might happen.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am quite sure that, if the prospective agenda for the week of November 11 were the same as for next week, it would be easy for the deputy leader to say that the Senate would not sit. I think that this week has lived up to the expectations that were indicated by the deputy leader. In fact, we received no legislation and we could easily have dispensed with sitting. I suppose that we are facing the same prospect for next week.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, that is substantially right. As far as legislation is concerned, I am informed that the other place will be dealing with Bill C-48 almost exclusively for the whole of next week, and perhaps longer. According to my information, they will also try to clean up some fairly advanced non-contentious bills on Fridays. Therefore, it could be that we will have some legislation next week although it is substantially true that we will not be receiving "heavy", material, if I may call it that.

It is virtually for the reasons expressed by the Leader of the Opposition that I feel we should be here next week, and not because of an overload of business.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Is it the view of the Leader of the Opposition that Question Period is unimportant and, therefore, unless we have legislation, we should not sit and permit the opposition to ask questions for an hour or an hour and a half?

Senator Frith: Senator Godfrey has underlined my word "substantially." As far as I am concerned, it is the responsibility of the Leader of the Opposition to decide how important Question Period is. In principle, we should certainly be here always and at the disposal of the opposition for that purpose.

Senator Flynn: The honourable senator said "always", but that would mean Parliament would never adjourn. I am quite sure Question Period would be much more useful if some honourable senators on the government side contributed to it in a substantive way.

I am not aiming my remarks at Senator Godfrey because I know that occasionally he is able to criticize the government—and rightfully so.

Senator Olson: Those aren't the best questions. The sharing of information is what it is all about.

Senator Flynn: I must say that he is an exception.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I quite candidly repeat that, in my opinion and as a matter of general principle, the Senate should be here when the House of Commons is sitting.

Senator Flynn: Five days a week?

Senator Frith: No, but every week they are in session I think we should be in session.

Senator Flynn: That is something else.

Senator Frith: I could be talked out of it on occasion. However, I think the general rule should always be that, if the House of Commons is sitting, we should be sitting that same week, and that the burden should be on those who do not want to sit, rather than the other way around.

Senator Flynn: I must say that I disagree with that perspective because I do not think the Senate should be here just in case and to sit around waiting for everything that might be passed in the other place. I think the Senate has its own responsibilities, time-wise and otherwise, independent of what happens in the other place.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

WESTERN DEVELOPMENT FUND—ALLOCATION— CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question or two to the Minister of State for Economic Development in connection with the Western Development Fund.

As honourable senators are aware, the Minister of Finance stated in his budget speech of last October that he had allocated $4 billion to a Western Development Fund, of which it is expected that $2 billion will be spent over the next three years. Can the minister confirm, almost one year after the presentation of that budget, that the total sum allocated to the Western Development Fund still stands at $4 billion?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, since that declaration or assertion was made by the Minister of Finance, there have been a number of developments, and the Minister of Finance, I think, and certainly a number of other ministers, have indicated that until such time as there was a conclusion to the energy negotiations nothing could be certain. We are happy to say that those negotiations have been completed, but, in any event, it was difficult to be absolutely positive because energy and the energy negotiations have such a large part to play in the revenues of the federal government.

I can advise my friend that if he wants to have more specific details on that fund and the allocations, the time frame, past and current information and projections, he will have to wait until the budget comes down, and we hope that that will be as soon as possible.

Senator Roblin: I have an additional question which I do not think hinges upon the budget. In the estimates tabled last February, the indications were that $350 million was to be spent this year under the heading of the Western Development Fund. Can the minister tell the Senate whether any expenditures have actually been made under that item?

Senator Olson: That information will also be made available to the honourable senator. All that information will be available when the Minister of Finance tables his budget.

The honourable senator must realize that while some commitments were made, qualifications were also attached to them at the same time. It was not until September 1 of this year that an energy agreement was reached.

Senator Roblin: I am not asking my honourable friend to reveal any secrets or information contained in the budget, but as to what has actually happened since February when this allocation was proposed by the government. Have, in fact, any monies been spent under the heading "Western Development Fund", and, if so, could the minister give us the details, please?

Senator Olson: That information will be conveyed to the honourable senator after the budget is brought down.

Senator Roblin: I wish to protest the minister's reply. I am not asking for any budget secrets. This question has nothing to do with the coming budget, but has everything to do with the last budget and the last estimates that came down in February. Why can we not have that information now?

Senator Olson: Because, as was explained by the Minister of Finance and others on a number of occasions, the certainty of a number of things, including the Western Development Fund, could not have been ascertained positively until the energy agreement was signed. The Minister of Finance is fully prepared to deal with that when he brings down his budget.

Senator Roblin: Of course, that was an afterthought with respect to the budget and the estimates, but if my honourable friend is trying to tell me, and I think he probably is, that nothing has been spent under this item, why can he not say so? That is no crime.

● (1420)

Senator Olson: The honourable senator is asking for bits and pieces of a financial analysis of the Government of Canada. He knows very well that all of that comes either in the minister's speech or in the accompanying papers, and he will just have to be patient for a few more days and all of that will be known to him.

Senator Roblin: I will be as patient as I can, but I think the minister is quite unfair and quite inaccurate when he tries to link my question up with the budget matter. It has nothing to do with the budget. The budget has to do with the coming period. I want to know with respect to the period that is almost completed. The least the minister can say in all candour is that he will look into the matter and see if he can provide the information. Why can he not do that?

Senator Olson: If that is a satisfactory answer, I can agree to do that. I should qualify it, in order that I do not raise any false hopes, by saying that it will probably be only after the budget that the information can be obtained.

Senator Roblin: I find that a very poor excuse indeed. I guess I am not going to be able to force the minister to proceed any faster than his customary pace.

I have another question which has to do with consultation with the provinces. Has the government given any consideration to discussing the Western Development Fund with the provinces in order to ascertain what might be the best way of dispensing the moneys if, in fact, any are to be dispensed?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I believe there was a commitment given about a year ago that there would be some consultations, not only with the provinces but also with other interested parties, with respect to the priorities that would be established for the use of that fund.

Senator Roblin: May I ask my honourable friend if any such consultations have taken place?

Senator Olson: I am not sure that any consultations have taken place with that being the only subject on the agenda, but certainly informally, or as an addendum to other meetings, I know that there have been suggestions made by various officials and, indeed, ministers of the provincial governments.

Senator Roblin: I presume those discussions are a matter of public record, and the minister would be able to give us a report as to what transpired.

Senator Olson: I do not think my honourable friend can assume that all of the meetings, both formal and informal, between ministers of the federal government and ministers of the provincial governments are matters of public record. I know I have had a number of meetings across the country, and statements have been made after a meeting. Even if there is a verbatim text of some discussions, I would not like him to assume there is a transcript available of all of those meetings.

Senator Roblin: Taking all of that into account, would the minister give any undertaking that he will give us any report on these discussions?

Senator Olson: Yes, I will be prepared to give not only a report but also a very detailed report on what the government's priorities are and, perhaps, even beyond that in further detail soon after the budget has been announced, but I am not going to pre-empt the prerogative of the Minister of Finance—indeed, his exclusive responsibility—for what he normally says in a budget speech.

Hon. Lowell Murray: What does "exclusive responsibility" mean?

Senator Olson: It means that we follow the traditional practice of having the Minister of Finance, as he has always done, give an analysis of the Canadian economy and the financial condition of the government, either in his speech or in the supporting documents that go along with it.

Senator Murray: I presume the minister and all his colleagues are prepared to stand behind that analysis and that budget in the tradition of collective responsibility?

Senator Olson: In any government that I have been a part of—I believe all governments, with one exception in the last few years—all the ministers have stood behind what the government policies have been.

Senator Roblin: I wish to make a final comment on that. The minister is still fudging this question. I am not asking him for a budget statement. I am not asking him for a forecast. I am not asking him to say anything with respect to the budgetary proposals that come down before us. I am asking him for a report on what has transpired since the last budget. I am asking him for a report on his administrative stewardship in respect to his Western Development Fund, and he tries to tell me it is part of the next budget.

● (1425)

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I gave Senator Roblin an undertaking that I will seek that information, but I can tell him frankly and honestly that if it impinges on the responsibility of the Minister of Finance for what is coming down in the budget, then he will have to wait until that budget speech is delivered for the rest of the details.

THE ECONOMY

PROPOSED CANADIAN ECONOMIC CONFERENCE

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, in today's press it is stated that the Prime Minister has been appointed co-chairman of the North-South Conference.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Phillips: I appreciate the applause from government supporters. I now ask simply—and here I would seek their applause—whether it would be possible to have the Prime Minister remain in Canada long enough to host a Canadian economic conference? God knows we need it. We have high interest rates, unemployment, agricultural and other problems—all matters which are the responsibility of the Minister of State for Economic Development. Could the minister have the Prime Minister stay in Canada long enough to host such a conference?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I do not like the inference contained in the honourable senator's question that no useful discussions will be taking place at that international conference. The date of the conference was known a long time ago. The government endeavoured to bring forward a budget under such terms that would provide for a full debate in both houses of Parliament both on the state of the economy and on matters arising from the budget speech.

The honourable senator knows quite well that the budget speech was scheduled for November 3, and that the provincial premiers asked for a meeting to further discuss the constitutional proposals that same week. The constitutional negotiations are also an important part of Canada's economic development, because the uncertainties connected with those negotiations may have some significant economic consequences. The honourable senator is aware also that all those matters cannot be dealt with the same week.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I thank the minister for his reply. Unfortunately he has left me with the feeling that the government is proceeding on the basis that we cannot have both a Constitution and a sound economy. We on this side of the house consider that we should have both.

THE BUDGET

POSTPONEMENT OF PRESENTATION

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, the minister, in reply to my previous question, spent much time in saying that the budget presentation should be delayed because of the constitutional meeting, but I am puzzled as to why the budget speech could not have been moved ahead. There is no reason why the budget could not have been presented at the end of October, which was the original intention of the government. Will the minister tell the house why the budget cannot be presented on a date late in October?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, there are some very good reasons for that. A number of procedures, such as the printing of budget papers, have to be completed a certain number of days preceding the presentation of the budget.

● (1430)

The reason why the date for the presentation of the budget debate was set by the Minister of Finance as November 3 was obviously because the premiers had asked for an additional meeting dealing with the Constitution, and the dates that were offered were in the week preceding that. It now turns out that the premiers, after their conference in Montreal, have asked specifically to have a meeting with the Prime Minister during the week of November 2—at least on that day, and perhaps more days of that week.

The honourable senator will have to understand that the Prime Minister, in whom he seemed to have some interest a minute ago, cannot be at a conference, with the premiers, responding to their requests, and at the same time deal with the budget and economic matters in the House of Commons.

We have tried to be as accommodating as possible. The dates that are there now are set in train. It is not possible to have all of the budget requirements ready at a date earlier than November 3.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Is that the official reason?

Senator Olson: It is the honest reason.

Senator Phillips: I would remind honourable senators again that the government stated, even promised—though, of course, you cannot take their promises too seriously—that there would be a budget before the end of October. Now, all of a sudden, we cannot have the budget without the constitutional meeting. If the government is going to proceed unilaterally on the Constitution, why can you not proceed unilaterally on the economy? God knows Canada needs unilateral action—or action of any kind—on the economy far more than it does on the Constitution. Now, why can you not get moving on the economy?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, these additional comments add nothing to the original question, and the explanation that I gave a few minutes ago is adequate to cover that, so I have nothing more to add.

EDUCATION

FEDERAL GRANTS TO POST-SECONDARY INSTITUTIONS

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, my question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate relates to one that I asked him more than once during the session before we adjourned. I revert to it now because the situation prompting it has become more acute and more disturbing all across the country. I refer to the threat to post-secondary institutions in this country resulting from what I fear is a wrong-headed, short-sighted and callous decision by the government to curtail drastically the funds available to the institutions of higher learning in this country.

Noting what presidents, students and educators all across Canada are saying, talking in terms of crisis, of diminution of services and of actual closing of universities, can the minister, who is a man of sensitivity, compassion and insight, tell me if in recent months, and during the summer of discontent, in this case, there has been any amelioration of the government's attitude, or can we expect it to go forward harshly and cruelly with this assault on the young people and students of our country?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there is a concerted campaign, an unfortunate campaign, by certain members of the official opposition—I think they do it because of a lack of information—to suggest that somehow the government is withdrawing all of its support from higher education in this country. I hope that soon the facts can be placed squarely on the record to dispel these mischievous allegations. I am not suggesting that the distinguished Senator Macquarrie is engaged in mischievous conduct, but some of those who are participating in this campaign against the federal government have less than noble motives.

● (1435)

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): What are the facts?

Senator Perrault: The fact is that the federal government, in terms of tax points and in terms of grants made to higher education, has been more than generous to institutions of higher education across this country and it is not withdrawing from that responsibility.

I would like to remind honourable senators that education is under the basic constitutional jurisdiction of the provinces. The premiers demand that their constitutional rights be protected, guaranteed and guarded. On the one hand, in their negotiations in relation to the constitutional package, they are demanding more rights, and, on the other hand, they are asking for more money for higher education, which is an area clearly under their jurisdiction. In some provinces we have seen a progressive increase in the amount of grants made by the federal government for higher education, and a progressive diminution on the part of those provinces of their grants to higher education.

We are not in the process of affixing responsibility. Let some of the honourable senators who ask questions of this kind look at the books of their own provinces, and ask of their own provincial governments how they have discharged their responsibility to higher education. They may find that the blame does not rest with the federal government. The federal government is, in effect, indicating to the provinces that it entered into this arrangement in the first instance with a spirit of co-operation, which might have seen both levels of government sharing these costs equally. In some provinces, the federal government is assuming much more than 50 per cent of the cost of supporting post-secondary education.

However, the facts on this entire question will be presented very shortly to the Senate—

Senator Flynn: If you had the facts, you would have been able to reply in one minute.

Senator Perrault: —and then perhaps the official opposition might wish to cancel the advertising campaign that they have launched in all of the universities across the country.

Senator Macquarrie: In the realistic and reasonable atmosphere of this place, I would like to say, noting the minister's reference to having facts, that I, of course, would not presume to be as well informed as the minister on any matter.

Senator Flynn: Oh, I think you can.

Senator Macquarrie: I know my limitations. Above all other things I would not be an immodest man.

However, I would certainly ask the minister if all of the university presidents, the students' organizations, the boards of trustees, the ministers of education are bereft of information? He is not as old as I am—though nearly as old—but he should be able to remember the days when Mr. St. Laurent was the Prime Minister of this country. It should be an inspiration to a Liberal to realize that you can be a Liberal and still govern efficiently, effectively and with sensitivity. It was done in those days. The federal government entered into programs to aid the universities. It made a major contribution.

Now the federal government is pushing forward the diminution of these contributions. I am not at all interested in bashing the premiers. There is far too much of that going on. I am not interested in bashing the Prime Minister, either. I am interested in the young people of this country. Starving them out is not going to be a very smart operation for a Liberal government or any other government. I simply ask whether there is any chance of a second thought?

With regard to people not having information, I noted when I was reading the report of the task force from the other place—a magnificent document—that they laid it right on the line. It is stated therein that the enduring strength of a society ultimately rests more on post-secondary institutions than on economic, industrial or military power. Were they bereft of the facts? I know they were not bereft of compassion. I would like the government to read this document and I would like a favourable reaction to it.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have had conversations with a number of university presidents. Under questioning they have admitted that, at least in some provinces, there has been a progressive withdrawal of provincial government funding for post-secondary education, with the consequence that, on a percentage basis, the federal government is assuming more and more of that cost.

● (1440)

Now, if the premiers, who are going to these constitutional meetings—

Senator Flynn: Oh, come on! Stick to the point!

Senator Perrault: —and are asking for more jurisdiction and for more power—

Senator Flynn: They are not asking for more jurisdiction, for more power.

Senator Perrault: —and are asking for more rights, are going to say, "Heads, we win; tails, you lose!" to the federal government, what kind of game is that?

Senator Flynn: Yours.

Senator Perrault: What kind of game is that?

Senator Flynn: That's your game.

Senator Perrault: No wonder that in a recent poll 25 per cent of Canadians said there is just one government in this country. Of course, I don't agree with that concept, but there is some degree of disenchantment with some of the attitudes of these provincial governments. This is their area of responsibility. Might it not be a logical suggestion that the university presidents, in the first instance, see their provincial governments and ask them why in some cases provincial governments now are only assuming 35 per cent of the cost of higher education, and not the 50 per cent which was agreed to some time ago with the federal government in their negotiations? Those happen to be the facts.

I hope the senator is not suggesting that at some point in time it is not useful to sit down and discuss the future of shared-cost programs to find out whether the taxpayer is getting full value and whether there is a proper allocation of revenue as well as responsibility.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Tell us what is the decision of your government.

Senator Perrault: As I recall, the Conservative government, when it served during that brief and tumultuous time, also talked in terms of renegotiating certain agreements with the provinces.

Senator Flynn: Which ones? Which ones are you talking about?

Senator Perrault: Is that not a constructive idea, to sit down and discuss the future of higher education in this country? But this is a mischievous campaign which has been launched by the Conservative Party in this country on a number of university campuses.

Senator Flynn: Oh, come on!

Senator Perrault: I have copies of the advertisements. You are not aware of the communication program of your own party. It says, "The Liberal Party does not want you to acquire higher education," or words to that effect. That is real mischief. It is anti-intellectual mischief, for anyone to circulate that kind of misleading information.

As I say, I will be prepared to bring to this chamber some of the facts with respect to which level of government is assuming its responsibility for higher education—

Senator Asselin: When? When are you going to do that?

Senator Perrault: —and which governments are not assuming that responsibility.

Senator Macquarrie: The minister is a charming fellow and ebullient, but I hope he is not getting carried away.

Senator Flynn: He is always getting carried away.

Senator Macquarrie: I want to tell him that, if I am in mischievous company when I join the President of the University of Winnipeg, an alma mater of mine, and leading educators all across the country, I am happy to be so joined with these decent people and very fine educators.

I wonder, when I listen to the minister, if it is regarded by this government as a ploy, in getting back at provincial premiers, that they cut down these things. If that is the case, I would ask you to desist from that course and concentrate upon the young people. Forget about these premiers off whom you are trying to score points. The matter is education, the decent development of our youth, and the strengthening of the social and cultural fabric of this country; and I appeal to him to use his eloquence, his fervour to say, "Get away from this matter of a chess game against the premiers and think of the students."

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): That is a mischievous statement.

Senator Perrault: Is the Honourable Senator Macquarrie suggesting to this chamber that the federal government should assume 100 per cent of the costs of higher education in this country?

Senator Flynn: Who said that?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Then what percentage?

Senator Perrault: Isn't it a paradox that this opposition group simultaneously demand that there be massive cutbacks in federal government spending on all fronts—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: —and yet they have now opposed any reduction in VIA Rail, and they want no reduction in grants to higher education. Can anyone name one area in which they have truly expressed any support for cutbacks in anything? This is the old Conservative political mugs' game they are playing, and I don't think it does much for the reputation of that party.

Senator Flynn: Phooey! Phooey! Why don't you try to answer a question instead of speaking of everything else?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Well, we know who the mugs are.

Senator Flynn: A bag of wind!

Senator Macquarrie: I must not indulge in such comments, but I would like to say, since he directed a question to me—and it is a change for an opposition member to be the recipient of a question—that I have no intention of joining in any clamour which will suggest to the present government that they are doing a good thing by backing down from their commitments for educational grants towards the post-secondary institutions in this country. That is not what we want. I have never asked the government to cut down at the expense of the students of this country, nor do I intend to, and if the honourable senator thinks that it is inconsistent, then it will show up on the record.

● (1450)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I would like to ask Senator Macquarrie, in order to clarify precisely where the Progressive Conservative Party stands on this important subject, whether it is the official position—

Senator Flynn: That is not the question.

Senator Perrault: I wish the Leader of the Opposition would learn not to squirm in his seat.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order.

Senator Perrault: We will listen with rapt attention.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government has not replied to the question. Every time a question has been put by Senator Macquarrie, he has made a speech and, on top of it all, put questions to us. He reminds me of the fellow who, when asked, "Why do you always answer a question with a question?" replied "Why not?"

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I seek clarification of the question asked by Senator Macquarrie. I ask this question: Do the Honourable Senator Macquarrie and his colleagues, who have demonstrated such furor over this subject, support the idea that there should be an equal, 50-50 sharing between the provincial governments and the federal government in the matter of funding of higher education?

Senator Flynn: Another question.

Senator Perrault: Does the official opposition support that concept—

Senator Flynn: Again, a question.

Senator Perrault: —and, if so, what percentage would appeal to the Conservative Party today? We would like to hear your answer.

Senator Flynn: We want you to answer questions. This is entirely irregular.

Senator Frith: We are merely asking for clarification.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, once again I am in receipt of questions. I would not presume to speak for my party—it has enough trouble of its own—but I think I can say, without endangering the party, that there are two things we would stand for: one is the decent, honourable acknowledgment of commitments to the provinces on matters of shared costs; and the other is that, surely to goodness, we would look upon education as one of the great priorities in this nation, and we have never deviated from having supported it.

Senator Perrault: But what is the percentage?

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, by way of a supplementary question, may I ask the Leader of the Government whether there has been any change in the announced policy of the government to cut $1.5 billion from established programs financing over the next two years?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, those matters are being negotiated and the policy will be announced in due course.

Senator Murray: Am I to take it, then, that the statement by the Minister of Finance, that $1.5 billion would be cut from established programs financing in the next two years, is now, to use a favourite phrase of the Nixon White House, "inoperative"?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, there is no such gobbledygook. The Minister of Finance said that he would like to effect some savings in the Social Affairs envelope and that he plans to look at transfers of payments to provinces and the established program study. No decision has been taken yet, but honourable senators may not have long to wait.

Senator Murray: Can the Leader of the Government tell us what has happened to the $1.5 billion figure put forward by his colleague, the Minister of Finance? Is that figure now inoperative?

Hon. Jack Marshall: It is inflated.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, all good things come to those who wait.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, may I ask whether the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance was speaking for the government when he attacked the report of the House of Commons committee chaired by Mr. Herb Breau, M.P., in the following terms—and I quote from Carleton University's newspaper. The Carleton, dated October 1, 1981:

"The real problem with the Breau report is that it refused to take into consideration fiscal reality," said Evans, whose riding includes Carleton University. "The huge federal debt has to be reduced and their terms of reference were to go out and establish priorities for reduction.

"They violated their terms of reference. One and a half billion dollars is to be cut in the next two years and what they said was, 'don't do anything' . . . 'that's not a viable alternative.'"

Does that statement, made by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance, Mr. John Evans, M.P., represent the policy of the government?

Senator Perrault: A number of options are being considered and the nation will understand far more about fiscal, monetary and budgetary matters on budget night.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION ON NEWSPAPERS — IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I pose my question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Before doing so, I want to indicate how much I agree with Senator Godfrey and, in particular, Senator Frith who, I am sure, would agree with me, that Question Period is very important to this chamber. I have had occasion to speak to United States senators and congressmen who indicated to me that they wished that this part of our system were in place in their form of government. I feel that Question Period is very basic to our parliamentary form of government.

The catalyst of my question to the Leader of the Government is an Ottawa Citizen report, dated October 20, 1981, which is headed, "Ministers plan tough law: Kent." It reads in part:

A majority of federal cabinet ministers support the Kent commission report on Canadian newspapers and tough legislation to implement its recommendations will likely be introduced early next year, commission chairman Tom Kent said Monday.

This report is datelined Toronto.

May I ask the Leader of the Government whether it is correct that the majority of the cabinet ministers agree with this report and that they intend to introduce tough legislation?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would not wish to anticipate some action which may or may not be taken by cabinet.

Senator Muir: When questioned by the chairman of Canadian Press, Clark Davey, as to whether he had inside information on the subject, Mr. Kent said that he did not, that it was his own diagnosis, but later on in an interview with Southam News he insisted that he is certain legislation will be drawn up soon that will back up the royal commission's findings.

I realize that Mr. Tom Kent has been the fair-haired boy of successive Liberal governments, but may I ask each of the four ministers here, or the Leader of the Government, if he can speak on their behalf: Is Mr. Kent operating the government from either Toronto, Dalhousie University or his cottage in Cape Breton? I would like to know whether he is speaking for the government, or will we hear from the Leader of the Government in the Senate or the Prime Minister on this subject shortly?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I know that Senator Muir would like to be as fair-minded as possible.

Senator Muir: Always.

Senator Perrault: And I know that he would not wish to misquote Mr. Kent. I understand that in that article Mr. Kent stated that he was giving his own opinion. I would appreciate very much if Senator Muir would provide me with the full text of Mr. Kent's remarks. I think that it would be unfair to judge those remarks on the basis of fragmentary newspaper accounts.

Senator Muir: Having had dealings with Mr. Kent over a great number of years, I know he is a fair man and a hard bargainer. Although we had many scraps when he was chairman of the Cape Breton Development Corporation, he and I still get along. However, this article quotes Mr. Kent as saying that he is certain legislation will be drawn up soon that will back up the royal commission's findings, and I am sure that the Leader of the Government—

Senator Olson: Oh, oh.

Senator Muir: When Senator Olson is through giving the Leader of the Government advice, I will proceed. The Leader of the Government, I am sure, is capable of answering for himself. I am sure he does not need the coaching of those around him, and I would like him to answer without a briefing, because on occasion he gets himself into trouble. I think it is erroneous for the Leader of the Government to suggest that I am being unfair to Mr. Kent. I am only quoting what is written in this report, and I have not seen or read a retraction by Mr. Kent in any of the media, either electronic or written. Therefore, we must go by what is here.

Senator Perrault: There are two things which seem to be erroneous in that report. First, Mr. Kent states that he is giving his opinion and that he has no inside information. Then Senator Muir asked whether, in fact, Mr. Kent had some prior knowledge of some action which may or may not be taken by cabinet. He may have psychic talents or gifts which are beyond the capacity of members of cabinet to understand. I can only say that that article surely represents Mr. Kent's opinions, and I have no information to suggest that he has had any other inspiration, guidance or psychic revelation from cabinet.

ENERGY

ALASKA HIGHWAY GAS PIPELINE—FINANCING OF UNITED STATES SECTION COLD LAKE AND ALSANDS OIL PROJECTS—PRESENT STATUS

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, I wish to address two questions to the Minister of State for Economic Development. Firstly, would he be good enough to inform this chamber of the present status of the financing of the Alaska Highway gas pipeline? Secondly, could he advise us if any consultations are presently taking place between the government and the consortia involved in the Cold Lake and the Alsands projects in an effort to get those projects back on track?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I could give a brief review without obtaining further detailed information. However, I think it would be better if I obtained that detailed information and then brought the situation up to date, especially regarding the latter question. However, I will give a brief report on the first question.

The waiver package, as all senators know, has been sent by the United States administration to Congress and, indeed, some hearings began yesterday or the day before. So far as the financing package here in Canada is concerned, I have nothing to add to what was said a number of months ago when the first sections at the southern end were built. At that time I stated that there was not a hard financing commitment in place but that there was a plan which had been accepted by the sponsoring company and their financiers.

I will bring in a more detailed report as soon as I can, which hopefully, will be the middle of next week.

THE ECONOMY

NEWFOUNDLAND—UNEMPLOYMENT RATE

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, my question is for the Minister of State for Economic Development. A few days ago I asked a question pertaining to the unemployment rate in the country, and particularly as it applied to the eastern part of Canada.

I have looked very carefully at the answers I received, and it is my opinion that they do not do a great deal in order to try to tackle the problem. Some of the figures I received were not accurate, but that is not terribly important. What is important is the fact that of the five eastern Canadian provinces, four have more people out of work now than they had a year ago. In Newfoundland, particularly, Statistics Canada tells us that the official unemployment rate is 17.8 per cent. The real rate is tragically higher than that.

The fishing industry in Newfoundland is in complete chaos. Plants are closing all over the place. I have never seen the situation as bad as it is. Would the honourable minister tell us what plans the government has specifically for the eastern part of Canada and specifically for the fishing industry, particularly as it applies to Newfoundland?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I would tell the honourable senator that we are acutely aware of the unfortunate, and unfortunately deteriorating, situation with respect to employment in the fisheries sector. We are presently giving intense consideration to some plans to alleviate that situation. Of course, I cannot announce any plans in advance of the determination being made.

Senator Doody: Would the minister be somewhat more specific? I do not see how responsibility for this matter can be attributed to provincial governments. Fisheries are a federal responsibility.

Over the past year I have heard various senators talking about trading rights for fish and so on. Nothing has been traded and fisheries are still in the hands of the Government of Canada. Unfortunately, they are not in the hands of the plant workers or the fishermen of the province of Newfoundland.

One of the largest and oldest companies has announced the indefinite closure of five of its eight fish processing plants, including the three great, historic plants in Grand Bank, Fortune and Gaultois which were processing fish long before I or even my father could remember. Over 2,000 people have been laid off from trawler plants on the south coast during the past few weeks, some of which have announced that they have no definite plans to re-open.

Would the minister treat this matter with some degree of urgency and report to us as to what plans the government has to try to salvage this vital sector of our economy?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I can only repeat what I have said, that the government has recognized the urgency of dealing with this matter. As to when I will be able to announce any plans, I cannot give any undertaking until a determination has been made.

[Senator Olson.]

TRANSPORT

AIRPORTS—COST OF OPERATION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was asked by Senator Marshall on October 20 concerning the cost of maintaining airports in Canada.

For the 1981-82 fiscal year, there will be a net outlay of $272 million for the operation and maintenance of airports in Canada for 1,000 airports, both public and private. The average taxpayer subsidy works out to an average of $10 per head for all the activities of the air administration because many of the services provided, such as air traffic control and radar services, are cost-recoverable.

A question was asked by Senator Riley on October 20 regarding the Mirabel airport deficit in terms of the cost per passenger ticket.

The total operating deficit for Mirabel airport for 1981-82 is estimated to be $28.5 million, which consists of $10.1 million for the operating deficit and $18.4 million for depreciation. It is estimated that 1.6 million passengers will use Mirabel for the 1981-82 fiscal year. Therefore, the average subsidy at this airport would be approximately $17.81 per ticket.

This compares to an average-per-ticket subsidy of $70 for VIA Rail passengers. The lines that the government is cutting operate at much higher deficits per passenger. For example, the Edmonton-Drumheller line costs the passenger an average of $15. However, the cost of operating the line averages $145 per ticket. The remaining $130 per ticket is paid for by the Canadian taxpayer. The Moncton-Edmundston line costs $154 per ticket to operate, but the cost of an average passenger ticket is only $21. Again, the Canadian taxpayer must subsidize to the extent of $133 per ticket.

I know that later this afternoon honourable senators will be debating the matter of VIA Rail, so I will not go into greater detail at this point.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

MIDDLE EAST—PEACE PROPOSAL OF FIRST DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER OF SAUDI ARABIA

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was asked by Senator Macquarrie regarding an invitation to King Khalid to visit Canada. Canada has issued no specific invitation to King Khalid to come to Canada at the present moment. However, there are outstanding invitations to leading members of the Saudi royal family and leading members of the Saudi government to visit Canada. We hope that those invitations will be taken up in the near future and will provide the opportunity for further discussions on topics of importance to both countries.

Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Macquarrie on October 21 regarding the Saudi peace proposal. The statement issued by the Secretary of State for External Affairs reads as follows:

I am pleased to note this indication of Saudi Arabia's desire to play an increasing role in regional and world affairs and I look forward with interest to developments arising from the proposals. I hope they will prove to be helpful to those most directly involved in the search for peace with justice in the Middle East.

Canada will continue its policy of welcoming any initiative which will bring a negotiated settlement to this most difficult international problem. Our policy includes support for a just, lasting and comprehensive peace settlement based on Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338 including the right of all countries to live within secure and recognized boundaries. We also recognize that for there to be a just peace the legitimate rights and concerns of the Palestinians must also be realized including their right to play a full part in negotiations to determine their future.

Canada does not consider it appropriate to comment on the specifics of the proposal, as this might indicate a prejudgement of the outcome of any negotiations. We believe it is up to the parties directly involved to take up the proposals as they see fit and to negotiate an end to their differences.

YUKON TERRITORY

WATER BOARD—APPOINTMENT OF CHAIRMAN

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State): Honourable senators, Senator Balfour asked a question yesterday concerning the Yukon Water Board. I should now like to reply to that question by advising honourable senators that the prerogative legally exists for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to appoint a chairman from among the nine members of the Yukon Water Board. The minister is currently considering a second nomination for chairman because the first person he nominated resigned shortly after accepting the position.

VIA RAIL CANADA INC.

MOTION TO INSTRUCT TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS COMMITTEE TO MAKE STUDY—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Riley:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications be instructed to inquire into and report upon the national rail passenger service provided to Canadians by VIA Rail Canada Inc. and, in particular to examine

(a) the Federal Government's plans for reorganizing Canada's passenger train services announced by Transport Minister Jean-Luc Pepin on July 27, 1981;

(b) the changes in passenger train services effected by Order in Council P.C. 1981-2171, dated August 6, 1981, made pursuant to subsection 64(1) of the National Transportation Act; and

(c) the procedure followed by way of Order in Council P.C. 1981-2171 in varying the Canadian Transport Commission's Orders and Decisions respecting Canada's passenger train services.

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, first of all I wish to say how sorry I am that, because of an appointment in my office yesterday, I was unable to hear the remarks made by Senator Charbonneau, and also that I support Senator Riley's motion that this matter be referred to the appropriate Senate committee.

Part of my interest in this matter is because not only was my grandfather a CPR railwayman but he was one of four brothers from Winnipeg who went into the railway business. I suppose it is a marvellous commentary on the egalitarian nature of our society that two of those brothers ended their careers many years later as conductors on railway passenger trains, and the other two rose to become presidents of railways, one the Santa Fe and the other in South America. So, I was brought up in Vancouver listening fondly for the sound of the steam train in the hope that my grandfather and my grandmother would be coming home that particular night.

The rhetoric we are hearing today relative to the proposals put forward by the minister for VIA Rail cuts reminds me of an experience I had some 25 years ago when I was living in Whitehorse. At that time the airplane was just coming into its own so far as regular passenger service to distant points, such as Vancouver, was concerned. As a result, the CPR steamship service which had plied the coast of British Columbia to Skagway, Alaska, serving the Yukon since the days of the goldrush, was losing a great deal of money because of lack of support. As a result of that, it was announced that the service would be discontinued. Well, there was a terrible outcry in Whitehorse. I had only been living there a few years at that time, but I recall that the Board of Trade and every other group in Whitehorse gathered together to prepare petitions. The arguments made were remarkably similar to those being made today. They involved everything from the fact that people could not afford to go on the airplane; some people were afraid to go on the airplane; there was no highway to use; and even down to arguments that elderly people preferred to go by ship because they were afraid they would suffer heart attacks on the airplane because of the high altitudes.

One or two of us—and, I might say, we were in the minority—argued that it was not in the best interest of the Yukon to persuade the federal government to come up with massive subsidies to keep the obsolete ships running up and down the coast to service the few people using them, particularly in the winter months, to go outside, as we used to refer to it in those days, because everybody was going on the airplane. We argued that the millions spent on subsidizing the service would be better spent building a water and sewer system for the city of Whitehorse. While I do not have statistical evidence available to me, I suspect that more elderly people were saved from heart attacks because they did not have to go out to their outhouses at 40 below zero than by having to get on airplanes to go down to Vancouver.

Some years ago I was a member of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications. At that time I was in Winnipeg on other business and thought it would be suitable to experience first hand what the situation was relative to passenger rail traffic in western Canada. I quite deliberately took the time to take the train from Winnipeg to Vancouver. That was in the middle of the winter and not the tourist season. It was a fascinating experience for me, at least. I got to the Winnipeg station at 8 or 9 o'clock at night, or whenever the train was leaving. I boarded the train and, I can gladly say, there was a suitable bar car. I had a most enjoyable and illuminating trip. I cannot give you precise figures because people were getting on and off the train, but at one point between two stations I counted all the passengers in the Pullman section of the train where I was. Of a total of 10 passengers, half were travelling on passes. I was on a government pass, another one was on a railway pass, and so on.

The train would stop at a station at 3 o'clock in the morning. Crews would be working outside the train in 30 below zero weather. They would be tapping the wheels with hammers, and so forth. Undoubtedly, they had to be paid a minimum four-hour shift for barely 20 minutes' work.

By the time we got to Vancouver I had made two calculations. I must say that I could not calculate what it had cost the taxpayers of Canada to transport me to Vancouver. It must have been horrendous, but I will get into that later on. A friend of mine who was a director of the CNR gave me a figure in the area of a thousand dollars, or at least said that that was the deficit to go all the way from Toronto to Vancouver. In addition to that cost, my bedroom, meals and tips over this three-day period came to an amount which would have been more than the air fare. So, in spite of the fact that I was on a pass, it was costing me more than I would have spent to take the plane, but I was willing to spend that in the interest of research.

Today we find ourselves listening to the same nostalgic rhetoric that I heard in Whitehorse, without any mention of economics in that rhetoric. The Leader of the Government said a couple of minutes ago, with respect to a matter raised by Senator Macquarrie, that we hear criticism of the federal government and its huge deficit. I have not been backward within my own party to be one of those critics. I also like to applaud the government when it tackles that particular problem. The very people who are the most vociferous critics of the deficit are always the first to leap to the defence of any group that objects to any cut that would reduce that deficit, no matter in what department, or where it is, or how unjustified that particular subsidy might be. One of the most vociferous and articulate spokesmen in criticizing the federal deficit and demanding federal-provincial meetings relative to the federal government monetary and fiscal policies is Premier Lyon of Manitoba, and yet his government was the first in line to present a brief, setting out why these rail cuts should not take place, to the Conservative Party committee which held hearings on the subject.

● (1520)

Similarly, with our friends across the way today, but this is not even a partisan issue. You have people on both sides of the house and all across the country, most of whom never use trains, simply saying that it is dreadful that the steam whistle could possibly be removed—it is not even a steam whistle any more—from any track anywhere in Canada, no matter how inefficient, how little used or how expensive it is to the taxpayers.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Nobody is saying any such thing.

Senator van Roggen: I do not want to sound too facetious, but I am not sure whether I should introduce a bill in this chamber asking for a hundred-million-dollar subsidy for the reintroduction of stagecoaches in western Canada, because you could then get more bang for your buck than if some of these trains were running. They would be a great tourist attraction, and probably the subsidy would be considerably less.

Let us now look at some of the actual facts we are dealing with. I am now referring to the VIA Rail fact sheet which the Leader of the Government in the Senate incorporated in Hansard on Tuesday evening. I have updated some of the figures in this fact sheet, and, if any of these figures are incorrect, the committee can take the necessary evidence and look into those figures in detail. I have been somewhat facetious in my remarks today, but I now say, quite seriously, that it is important that the committee take evidence on these types of figures and see if there is any rational alternative to find the money that is going to be needed if we are going to upgrade the rail services in places where it is rational to do so with the new light, rapid and comfortable trains to be manufactured, as suggested for some of the more densely populated runs of the future.

The projected government deficit for VIA Rail—that is, the amount the taxpayers will be subsidizing it with—by 1983-84 will rise to—and this is under the proposal of the present government—$537 million from this year's $449 million. I am quick to say that that is simply a projection of anticipated inflation, so that VIA Rail will have approximately the same subsidy as today. If the management of VIA Rail did not take specific steps in light of that budgetary ceiling, which is not a reduction of the present subsidy being given to it, their escalation in operating costs, as opposed to new capital equipment, would go up from today's $332 million to a projected $460 million in 1985, which would almost absorb the total subsidy which the government would then be giving in that year to VIA Rail. In other words, you get into a Catch-22 situation where everything is going on an operating subsidy and no money is being spent on new capital equipment to make the system viable in those areas of the country where it can be made viable.

The leader has mentioned today—and I believe he mentioned this the other day—the average government subsidy per ticket of $70. You have heard of the transcontinental service costing much more, namely, half of the total subsidy, and ranging in the area of $160 per ticket, but that includes all the tickets sold on the transcontinental service for short hauls, quite apart from long ones. Therefore, if you consider the Toronto-Vancouver ticket—and the committee might want to look into this—you undoubtedly come very close to the figure given to me by the director of the CNR, as I mentioned a few minutes ago, of almost $1,000 per ticket to haul a passenger across the country. This is money that is yours and mine. This is a subsidy from the taxpayers of Canada to people who, in large measure, are taking that as a form of holiday trip. I have spoken to many who have enjoyed the summer trip on the train across the country, but why should it be at a cost to the taxpayer of $1,000 per passenger?

There has been a good deal said here about Mirabel and the subsidies for other forms of transportation. I will not bore you with all the statistics, as the committee can go into the number of passengers carried, in detail. We all know the numbers are infinitely higher by motorcar, bus and air than by rail. The net government spending for rail is $490 million; for road, $2.5 billion; and for air, $360 million.

Let me deal with those on a per-passenger basis, because total figures are useless if 25 times as many people are using road as are using rail. On rail, as we have already heard, across the board, transcontinental and branch lines cost $70 for every passenger who gets aboard. On road—and this includes both buses and cars—it comes out to $5 as opposed to $70. I asked how they made this calculation and was informed that it is all of the money spent on our highway systems across Canada, provincially, federally and municipally, less the amount of gasoline tax and other taxes collected. That calculation does not include sales tax. If it did, that would drop it from $5 to $4, if you include all the sales tax collected on the sale of automobiles.

We have heard the figure before of $10 per passenger on air. That includes all the costs for operating the airports, the capital costs of the airports, including Mirabel which has a much greater deficit than most, and the cost of the air controllers, the air traffic system and the whole thing, in addition to which—and I totally support this—it is the policy of the department to increase user fees by the airlines in our airports so as to eliminate or reduce substantially that $10. So, I am not sounding prejudiced against rail in favour of air. I believe in user pay. I do not see any reason why the taxpayers of Canada should support me or business commuters or others in this country to the tune of $10 every time we board an airplane.

So that is the size of the problem that we are dealing with: $70 for rail; $5 for road; $10 for air—and the $10 for air being reduced.

When you get to the level of cost recovery, of course it becomes absolutely extraordinary. I have mentioned to you that the transcontinental trains account for half of the $300 million in operating losses we have today, moving up to a projected $460 million by 1985. That is a lot of money; it is almost half a billion dollars.

On the Transcon West, the “Canadian,” the revenue/cost ratio—that is, the amount of the cost of these trains paid by the passengers—is 32 per cent. You and I pay the other 68 per cent.

On the Transcon West, the “Supercontinental,” which is the one being converted to an inter-city mode, it is 30 per cent recovery; namely, $148 for a one-way typical fare where the government pays $343, for a total of $491. When we come to the “Atlantic” and the “Ocean” in the east, about which Senator Riley spoke, the “Atlantic” recovers 27.9 per cent of its costs and the “Ocean” 27 per cent, which is approximately the same. The other 73 per cent is picked up by the taxpayers.

● (1530)

I asked a briefing officer in the department to give me the approximate air fare for a few of the typical routes that would be eliminated by the “Canadian” or the “Ocean”. In both cases the subsidy being provided by Canadian taxpayers to an individual traveller on those lines was approximately double the economy air fare. If we could design a mechanism for locating all those people who travel by train, and they could be separated out from the rest of the travelling public, we would find that we could pay them to travel on the airlines and save as much money as planned by this scheme.

I come now to the west.

Hon. Andrew Thompson: When you say the “Ocean”, you mean what?

Senator van Roggen: The “Ocean Limited” is the name of the train serving the maritimes, just as the “Canadian” is the name of the train serving the west. The “Bullet” was the name given to another train.

Honourable senators could seek similar advice in connection with their own regions. I will not delay them by giving details for Ontario, Quebec and the maritimes. I will give only a few examples as they apply to western Canada.

In the case of the Edmonton-Drumheller line, which was mentioned by the government leader a few minutes ago, only 10 per cent of its costs are recovered. Most of the ones I have mentioned so far have been in the region of 30 or 32 per cent. The figure in this case is 10.3 per cent, and the number of passengers travelling each way each day is approximately 15. Incidentally, it is not a train that runs where there are no roads, buses or airplanes. The cost of the subsidy for each passenger is $130.

The Regina-Prince Albert line is one of those lines, together with the Halifax-Yarmouth line, that was ordered by the CTC to continue as an experiment under some new proposals, because it was thought it might become viable. A new program was instituted, but it made little difference because the cost recovery rate on that line is 5.3 per cent, and, on the average, only six passengers travel that line each way each day.

We come now to Lynn Lake-The Pas, Winnipeg-Churchill, and Wabowden-Churchill. They were not dealt with in the order because they were subject to a CTC hearing, and the CTC has suggested some reorganization of those lines. I will use only the Winnipeg-Churchill line as an example. The department does not suggest abandoning the Winnipeg-Churchill line because there is no highway adjacent to it. But the cost recovery is 9.2 per cent, the fare is $66, and the subsidy per passenger is $651 each time a passenger boards the train. Again, if we could segregate those people from those who travel regularly on the airlines, we could afford to send them to Winnipeg by air each time, pay three days' hotel accommodation, and still be ahead of the game.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Charter them there.

Senator van Roggen: The government says, "No, there is no road there, and that line should remain in operation, despite the cost to the taxpayers."

The Winnipeg-Farlane (Armstrong) line is a good example. It recovers 16.5 per cent of cost and it is a non-stop run between those two cities. That line is being discontinued. However, there is a through train going a greater distance, with more stops, connecting those same two cities, but one has to suffer a couple of extra stops. That will eliminate a subsidy of $66 per passenger or 83.5 per cent of the cost of operating that line.

There are some northern Ontario routes listed, but I shall not refer to them because I am not familiar with the geography. If there is no compatible highway, then I agree that we have to give special consideration to them. Their cost recovery is 4.8 per cent, 4.2 per cent, and so on.

I do not wish to take up the time of honourable senators, but I hope that members of the committee will seek full evidence on this subject and will consider whether or not some writers are correct in saying that the minister has not gone far enough in this program. Edmonton is located on the prairies with, as we all know, Conservative members of Parliament, and many people there are up in arms against the reduction in service. Mr. Rod Ziegler, writing in the Edmonton Journal, says:

My grandfather was a CPR engineer, and a damn good one, too, they tell me.

He goes on to completely support the minister. He ends his article by saying:

Westerners' reaction to the decision is revealing. It will fan the fires of western separatism by increasing resentment against the capricious East, was the consensus.

That's the same type of knee-jerk reaction the Crow freight rate engenders.

I am sorry that Senator Hays and Senator Argue are not in the chamber. I could hold a separate argument with them on the subject of the Crow rate, particularly with regard to shipments of B.C. lumber. However, I will leave that for another day.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I am here and I am following you carefully.

Senator van Roggen: Mr. Ziegler continues:

[Senator van Roggen.]

Just as economics dictates that the Crow must be killed, economics says the life of our transcontinental train should not be artificially prolonged.

And all the history in the world won't change that.

A writer in the Toronto Star refers to a Professor Lukasiwicz who was a critic of cut-backs in the rail service until he did a study of the subject at Carleton University. He reached the conclusion that it was not only an obsolete mode of travel, in most instances—he is not talking about commuter travel—but, says the article:

He congratulates Pepin for doing some of the painful pruning this week, but says the minister's efforts are too modest and come years too late.

He is quoted as saying:

Rather than dismantling it in this gradual expensive manner, I think he should get rid of the whole thing, with the exception of the Quebec to Windsor portion and the few cases where rail is the only link.

"Most Canadians will object to this," he said. "They have this traditional concept that trains are the thing that's keeping this country together. That's nonsense. The country is kept together by air travel."

Hon. Charles McElman: Do you agree with that?

Senator van Roggen: Yes. I would not quote it if I did not agree with it.

Senator McElman: I thought it was with that proviso.

Senator van Roggen: I have with me a chart, which I will not have put into the record, because the committee will get all of this material. It graphically shows how automobiles represent 88.8 per cent of the travelling mode; bus travel, 4.3 per cent; air travel, 5.6 per cent; and rail, 1.3 per cent. So, for 1.3 per cent of our transport, we are suggesting that half a billion dollars per year should not be cut back modestly so that more efficient equipment can be purchased within the budget to operate some rational form of rail transport between those places where there is a population density that warrants it.

I believe that Senator Charbonneau was not in the chamber at the commencement of my remarks, when I said how sorry I was that I was unable to hear his speech yesterday. I have not yet had time to read it, but I shall do so. It was mentioned to me that one of the honourable senator's concerns, and that of other honourable senators, was the saving of a few hundred million dollars per year, $100 million from the maritimes and $100 million from the west, and the fact that the money would end up in central Canada, in the LRC equipment to operate along the Quebec-Windsor corridor.

I am from one of the regions and not from central Canada, and I could give honourable senators several hours' dissertation on the unjust way that certain things are handled in the extremities of this country, such as expenditures in British Columbia on ports and other things. All I can say to you is this, that you cannot justify new capital expenditures and operating subsidies for railways, except between centres where there is some reasonable density of population to justify them—

● (1540)

Senator Frith: And where there is no alternative.

Senator van Roggen: —and apart from those areas—very few—where there is no road running beside them.

People point to Japan, to Europe, to Britain. You should look at the charts of the densities of population that are being connected by trains in those countries, and even then they are running into subsidies.

The Windsor-Quebec corridor is, I think, four times as far as from London to Glasgow. Think of the population being served by that. And the Windsor-Quebec City corridor is the most densely populated part of Canada.

The eastern United States corridor—again, a hundred million people—and that between Tokyo and Osaka are high-density areas. In Japan you have a hundred million people living in a space the size of one of the maritime provinces. Surely, we have to bring some economic rationale to bear on how we approach the subject. I know there is an argument about the process. The committee will undoubtedly go into the question of the process, and see to what extent endless hearings have been held in the past number of years on this whole subject. Should we have another four years of hearings at a cost of $500 million a year, or stay with the $200 million that is being saved?

Quoting Paul Hellyer—and it is a nice, non-partisan quotation, because he has been a leading figure in both of our parties:

It isn't surprising to hear the politicians yell blue murder because that's what the game of politics is like. But when the press climbs aboard, responsible politicians must wonder if there is any hope. Last week, for example, the Globe and Mail attacked government spending as the cause of inflation. Now it condemns the first serious effort the Liberals have made in a long time to cut expenditures. Cynicism is a two-way street.

Well, I have spoken longer than I had intended, honourable senators, but I did want to make it quite clear that there are some of us who are prepared to stand up for some level of fiscal responsibility in this country, even though it is not the most popular thing to do in our own particular region. If there is going to be a diversion of a couple of hundred million dollars of this saving to the Windsor-Quebec corridor, I say, "Hoorah," and I hope it proves to be a successful experiment in light rapid transit, or these new LRC trains. In exchange for that transfer of funds to those areas I can find lots of things to do for the Department of Transport out west—and I am sure you can in the maritimes—that have nothing to do with these railway branch lines, but that have to do with our ports. I refer also to such things as upgrading our track to move freight to the harbours so that we can get it sold abroad. We need to have millions spent in western Canada on our rights of way and double tracking, and that type of thing. We will do much better spending it on that than wasting it on this.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

SEVENTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—MOTION FOR ADOPTION—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Godfrey, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cameron, for the adoption of the Seventh Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.—(Honourable Senator Macdonald).

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I think that Senator Macdonald adjourned this debate in the hope that Senator Charbonneau would make a short statement.

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, I wish to congratulate Senator Godfrey on an excellent report. I certainly agree with the observations of the committee, and hope that the VIA Rail question will go to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications for study.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): I take it that this order is not to continue in Senator Macdonald's name.

Senator Roblin: No. I think we consider that the matter is discharged.

Senator Frith: There is an aspect that I want to speak on, and I ask that the debate be adjourned in my name.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

LAW OF THE SEA

THIRD CONFERENCE—REVISION OF DRAFT CONVENTION—MOTION MODIFIED AND AGREED TO

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Thériault, seconded by the Honourable Senator Marshall:

That the Senate reaffirm the support given by the Canadian people to the basic objectives of the Third Conference on the Law of the Sea and urge the United States Administration to undertake forthwith the revision of the draft Convention in order to increase the chances of concluding the work of the Conference when the Tenth Session resumes in Geneva in August, 1981.—(Honourable Senator Thériault).

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, in view of what transpired in the Senate the other day, and in view of the fact that this conference has been postponed until the spring of 1982, with leave of the Senate and pursuant to rule 23, I wish to modify my motion by striking out "August, 1981" and substituting therefor "the Spring of 1982". I also ask that the equivalent modification be made to the French language version of the motion.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators, to make this modification to the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I want to add this to what I have said. I hope that honourable senators will see fit to adopt the motion. I want to point out that the importance that I attach to this matter is the same as it was when I moved the motion in the first place. I understand, though, unfortunately, that during the last session of the conference in Geneva this house was not represented on the Canadian delegation. I hope that those responsible will rectify the situation when the conference resumes at the United Nations in New York in the spring of next year.

I consider this treaty to be of great importance to our country, and indeed to the whole world. I am glad that the United States of America, which has chiefly been responsible for the delay in the signing of the treaty, is now coming around to some degree. I hope that this treaty will be concluded at the next meeting in the spring of 1982.

I therefore move, honourable senators, the adoption of my motion.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, before its adoption, I would like to say how alarmed I was to hear Senator Thériault say that there was no representation from the Senate at the conference in Geneva. It seems that every time there is a Law of the Sea Conference, regardless of where it is held, we have to stand up and remind somebody within government that we are again being ignored. The government was gracious enough to send Senator Thériault to the Law of the Sea Conference last year in New York, but then nothing was done about the conference in Geneva. I can only underline what Senator Thériault has said. I hope that with regard to the conference that is to take place in New York in March 1982, consideration will be given to representation by the Senate.

Motion, as modified, agreed to.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

CONSIDERATION OF FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Consideration of the First Report of the Special Joint Committee on Official Languages.—(Honourable Senator Murray).

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, several months ago, in my capacity as co-chairman of the Special Joint Committee on Official Languages, I presented our first report. The committee is now preparing to resume its deliberations and hearings. That being the case, I would be disposed to delay any intervention on my part with regard to this matter for at least several months.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): To the first sitting in 1982?

Senator Murray: That would be satisfactory, assuming that this session has not been prorogued by then.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it possible, honourable senators, to set a specific date?

Senator Frith: In that case, so that we are safe, let us keep it to this year. Is Tuesday, December 8 agreeable?

Senator Murray: Yes.

Order stands.

EL SALVADOR

POLITICAL, MILITARY AND SOCIAL SITUATION—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Macquarrie calling the attention of the Senate to

(1) the increasingly dangerous political, military and social situation in El Salvador;

(2) the compelling hazards of third party interventions and the possibility of the escalation of hostile actions within El Salvador;

(3) the further compelling importance of the resolution of the conflict by means of a political settlement rather than through recourse to sustained and bloody armed conflict; and

(4) the value of Canadian encouragement and support of the efforts of those individuals and groups seeking mediation of the conflict in El Salvador.—(Honourable Senator Murray).

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, as I told the Senate at the time I took the adjournment of this debate, I did so, not with any intention to intervene personally, but because I wanted to leave the matter open for any honourable senators who wish to do so. Therefore, I would like to stand the matter again and keep it open. The issue is still current and, as time goes on, some honourable senator or senators may wish to discuss it.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, could I suggest an alternative? Could we consider this inquiry debated, it being understood that we will support the subject being revived in another inquiry, without the fact that we have considered this debated affecting that decision?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I have to raise a technicality, but I wonder whether that might not be construed as debating the same subject twice, which is not entirely proper.

Senator Frith: Perhaps we can look into it, because I do not want to make that mistake. I do not want to close off discussion on this subject. Perhaps we can therefore adjourn it to the date to which we have adjourned the previous order—Tuesday, December 8—on the understanding that, if any senator wishes to speak on it, it can be brought forward.

Senator Murray: Yes.

Order stands.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, October 27, 1981, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, October 27, 1981

The Senate met at 8 p.m., Hon. Renaude Lapointe, Speaker pro tem, in the Chair.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CABINET

ABSENCE OF MINISTERS FROM CHAMBER

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as a preliminary question I would ask the Leader of the Government if there is any reason why we are not blessed with the presence of three of the ministers of the Crown who happen to be senators?

Hon. Martial Asselin: Shame.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, all three ministers were in the city earlier today, and I can only express the hope that at least one or two of them will be here shortly.

Senator Asselin: We share your hope.

Senator Perrault: I know how sorely their presence is missed by the opposition.

Senator Flynn: Their absence is probably explained by the fact that they realize how important our sitting is this evening, with such a heavy load of legislation facing us.

[Translation]

THE CONSTITUTION

PUBLICITY CAMPAIGN OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): My second question, which is less preliminary and in a more serious vein, is directed to the Leader of the Government.

Last week, I asked him what authority or what grounds the government had to conduct its constitutional publicity campaign.

I do not know whether the Leader of the Government received a reply, but I would certainly like to have one, because since the adjournment I was exposed to this campaign and I must say I do not react very favourably to it. In fact, I was wondering whether the campaign was restricted to the French language information media, including television and radio, or whether this program was also being carried by the English-speaking media.

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, when the Leader of the Opposition posed his question last week a number of inquiries went forward. I have been informed that funds for the publicity campaign in Quebec respecting the Constitution are being drawn from the 1981-82 operational budget of the Canadian Unity Information Office. Beyond that I have no information as to a possible extension of the campaign to the other provinces.

● (2010)

Senator Flynn: No doubt the Leader of the Government will take the question as notice and will report. I should like to know if, in the opinion of the government, it is legal, under the authority mentioned by the Leader of the Government, to disseminate what is really partisan propaganda in such a fashion. I would cite, as an example, the fact that the advertisements claim that a charter of rights would afford French-speaking Canadians outside Quebec the same treatment—

Senator Asselin: Wrong.

Senator Flynn: —as anglophones in Quebec. Four instances of decisions made by Liberal governments were mentioned, but they forgot to mention decisions made by the Progressive Conservative government since then. The campaign is really slanted. Is the Leader of the Government satisfied that it is legal to use public funds for what is really Liberal propaganda?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I suppose one interprets what constitutes publicity and what constitutes propaganda depending on one's political views. I do not have the text of the announcements which appear to have offended the Leader of the Opposition, but I will attempt to obtain copies of them. Certainly, from time to time there has been an earnest effort on the part of the government to publicize various programs. The preceding Conservative government sponsored a major publicity campaign. Indeed, I believe a central advertising office was established by the previous government—but not only in relation to constitutional issues, I should add—

Senator Flynn: That's the point.

Senator Perrault: —in order to enhance and expand the publicity efforts of the federal government. I recall that this advertising office became somewhat of an issue. However, I shall attempt to obtain copies of the announcements and will refer the questions asked by the Leader of the Opposition to the minister responsible for this office.

Senator Flynn: In order to be more specific regarding my allegation of slanted propaganda, I should say that in describing the progress or the acknowledgement of the French language in Canada, they mentioned the introduction of bilingual postage stamps in 1927, bilingual money in 1936, and also the Official Languages Act. We could compare the issuing of bilingual postage stamps with the introduction of bilingual government cheques in 1962 and the installation of the simultaneous interpretation system in the House of Commons by the Progressive Conservative government. Both of those innovations could have been acknowledged at the same time, to avoid being partisan.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government. Can he tell the house who drafted this publicity on behalf of the government? Can he give us the names of those concerned?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I regret that I am unable to inform the Senate of the name of the person who exercised his or her creative talents in order to make possible this campaign. I feel sure, however, that had the campaign been prepared by either Senator Flynn or Senator Asselin, the copy would have been somewhat different. I concede that point.

Senator Flynn: I would have been more objective.

Senator Asselin: It would have been much better.

Senator Perrault: An effort will be made to obtain more detailed information.

COMMUNICATION FROM PRIME MINISTER TO PREMIER OF BRITISH COLUMBIA

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourables senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government and is, to a certain extent, along the same lines as the previous questions; there is at least some connection with respect to certain statements which tend to create an impression on the public and which are given a certain bias.

In his telex to the Premier of British Columbia on October 20, the Prime Minister of Canada said as follows:

I regret that, in spite of your repeated statements that we should meet to discuss the constitutional resolution . . . you have turned down my invitation for a First Ministers' Meeting on six different dates since the Supreme Court decision.

Unless I am mistaken, the Leader of the Government also alluded to these six dates. My questions are therefore as follows: First, what exactly were the six dates Premier Bennett turned down on behalf of his colleagues? Second, in what manner were the six dates proposed and in what manner were they rejected?

The purpose of my question is as follows: By mentioning an apparently impressive number of dates that were rejected, the impression is given that the provincial premiers are not being co-operative. Hence, I would like some details on the six dates and on the circumstances in which they were put forward and in which they were rejected.

● (2015)

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not have before me a list of the six dates. Those dates, however, will be obtained from the office of the Prime Minister, and the supplementary questions which the honourable senator has asked will be answered in due time. I think, however, that of some significance is the fact that none of the premiers has disputed the statement in the telex from the Right Honourable the Prime Minister that, in fact, the premiers were offered six dates. Premier Bennett and the other premiers have spoken about many other aspects of that telex message to Premier Bennett, and some points have been disputed, but I have seen nothing, either in public or in private, to indicate that they have disputed the fact that six dates were offered by the Prime Minister for meetings with the premiers to discuss possible changes in the constitutional packages. The information which the honourable senator has requested, however, will be obtained and presented to the Senate.

[Translation]

Senator Tremblay: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary, and perhaps more than a question, a gesture of co-operation with the Leader of the Government. I am now referring to the telex sent by the Prime Minister of Canada on October 14 to the Premier of British Columbia—a telex in which he said:

I shall therefore be expecting you and your colleagues to demonstrate your desire by agreeing to meet with me on October 26, 27 or 28—

After naming the three dates, did the Prime Minister perhaps include these three dates among the six that were subsequently rejected? If that is the case, is this not a case of misrepresentation, at least statistically?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, as I undertook to do earlier, I shall endeavour to bring a list of those dates. The honourable senator may wish to ask further questions after that list has been presented. I think the main point to keep in mind is that there has been an earnest endeavour on the part of the federal government to achieve understanding and agreement with the provinces. The talks which are going to take place very shortly will, I think, indicate the positive nature of the federal government's position and its desire to proceed to Westminster with as much support within this nation as possible, but when the honourable senator talks in terms of an alleged unwillingness of the government to meet with the provincial premiers—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): We did not speak about that tonight.

Senator Perrault: The Leader of the Opposition states that there has been no such suggestion of “unwillingness”. That may be. I do not want to infer, or suggest, that there is an unwillingness to meet on the part of either level of government. Certainly, however, the degree of unity among the premiers has yet to achieve its maximum extent. When the Premier of New Brunswick left the talks the other day, he indicated clearly to the Canadian people the frustrations he felt as a member of that provincial first ministers' group.

● (2020)

Hon. Martial Asselin: Choose another premier!

Senator Perrault: He told Canadians that there were some difficulties on the part of the premiers in arriving at a consensus. Well, perhaps the extra time will serve a good purpose after all.

Senator Flynn: If the Prime Minister is as well disposed as the Leader of the Government is suggesting, he might tell the Minister of Justice to be very careful in what he says until then.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I am not aware that the Minister of Justice has played anything but a constructive role in attempting to achieve agreement.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Where have you been?

[Translation]

INDUSTRY

GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE TO CHRYSLER CORPORATION

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, in the absence of Senator Olson, Minister of State responsible for Economic Development, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. As a very high-ranking member of the cabinet, he should be able to answer my question.

[English]

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has indicated that Chrysler has sought from the government substantial financing in order to resume production in its Windsor engine plant. Could the minister tell us if the government is considering providing this assistance, and, if so, under what conditions?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The question will be taken as notice. At the present time I do not have the Chrysler file on my desk, so I am unable to provide the specific detail the senator has requested.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

IRAN—RECOGNITION OF ROLE OF CANADIAN EMBASSY STAFF IN HOSTAGE-TAKING CRISIS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. We note with interest and pride that Canada has recognized the spouses of the Canadian diplomats who helped the American diplomats escape from Iran. I want to repeat that we note this with pride. However, I am wondering what recognition, if any, has been given to the lower ranks, those who were in danger and who performed duties of a protective nature? Is the Government of Canada recognizing those other members of the staff of the embassy in Iran?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The Honourable Senator Marshall is quite aware, I suppose, that the attainment of perfect justice is at times almost impossible. In war, for example, a platoon may engage in an action which requires the highest efficiency, performance and valour. Not all members of the platoon receive awards, but often the leader of such a platoon is singled out for a citation, which reflects credit on the performance of the entire platoon.

The question will be taken as notice. Certainly, the many awards which have been directed to Kenneth Taylor and others associated with those great acts of Canadian bravery in Iran—such as the two diplomats' wives who received the Order of Canada the other evening at Government House—reflect as well on the members of the staff who demonstrated the highest standard of performance.

● (2025)

Senator Marshall: The leader used a poor analogy when he mentioned a platoon and all of them receiving awards. I did not say that they should be recognized by being awarded the Order of Canada. Every Canadian who served overseas was given a CVSM clasp.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Marshall: It was just a matter of their representing Canada in a particular danger zone. I now ask the leader if he will obtain that information and give us an explanation as soon as possible.

Senator Perrault: Senator Marshall has advanced an interesting suggestion, one which will certainly be passed along to the offices of the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence. Certainly, all of the Canadians at the embassy acquitted themselves very well.

REFUGEES FROM EASTERN EUROPE—ADMISSION TO CANADA—
POSSIBLE INCREASE IN QUOTA—ECONOMIC AID TO POLAND

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have the delayed answer to a question posed by Senator Hicks on October 15. To the reply given on that date concerning Polish visitors to Canada, I should like to add a few words.

Section 9 of the Immigration Act requires that every immigrant apply abroad for admission to Canada and obtain a visa before arriving at a port of entry. However, there are provisions in the act to set aside, in special circumstances, that requirement. Among other provisions, section 115(2) of the act enables the Governor in Council to facilitate the admission of persons for reasons of public policy, or for compassionate or humanitarian considerations.

Reasons of public policy could include those affecting the economic, cultural, social or scientific aspects of life in Canada. Compassionate or humanitarian considerations could involve family dependency, difficulties in returning to the country of origin or long-term commitment to, and de facto residence, in Canada. In that respect, the Minister of Employment and Immigration announced today that there would be some special measures for the Polish people. Under these measures, Polish visitors now in Canada, and with relatives who are able and willing to assist them, may apply to be landed as permanent residents without having to leave Canada as is normally required.

I think that announcement will be of interest to all Canadians.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I am sorry to interrupt the Leader of the Government, but while he was making the announcement concerning the admission of Polish immigrants I recalled that highly dramatic scene in which he made the analogy of the people on the bus and those in the queue. Would he now tell us who was on the bus, and who was standing in the queue?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, this is a special measure. Canada has done this in the past when extraordinary circumstances existed. This will not affect the queue lining up for the bus. We are putting on an "extra bus." I hope that the honourable senator is pleased.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): He would rather take the train.

An Hon. Senator: VIA Rail.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I should like to respond now to a question asked by Senator Marshall on October 20 last, about the immigration requirements for hockey players.

There is no difference between our treatment of hockey player refugees and our treatment of other people classed as refugees. The method of processing reflects the needs of individuals and the circumstances in which they find themselves.

While in Austria, the Stastny brothers made their decision to live outside Czechoslovakia. Due to the concern which existed about their safety, and their own fear of remaining in Austria as high profile defectors, the minister authorized the issuance of permits to facilitate their admission to Canada. What is also important in the Stastnys' case is that, once they had made their decision to defect and had been granted temporary haven in Austria, there was every indication that they would face persecution and hardship if they were returned to their homeland. Canada has traditionally provided sanctuary to persons in such circumstances. Over 5,000 other persons from eastern Europe will enter Canada in 1981 under the provisions of this humanitarian regulation concerning self-exiles.

With regard to the admission of athletes, immigration policy is designed with two objectives in mind: First, to ensure that Canadian teams have access to the best talent anywhere in the world; and, second, to provide, through reciprocity, opportunities for Canadian athletes with teams in other countries. Current immigration legislation supports the free flow of athletes. Consider, for example, the hundreds of Canadian hockey players and coaches who are members of teams in the United States, and those who are on teams in European countries even though they may not be allowed to play on the national team.

• (2030)

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I would like to ask a supplementary question. The Leader of the Government may skate around the issue as much as he wants, but one of the important restrictions is that anyone trying to emigrate to Canada cannot take a job here if there are qualified persons in Canada who would accept that job. This creates a certain inequity, and I am thinking of, not only the Stastny brothers from Czechoslovakia but also other players on other teams.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I trust that Senator Marshall would not penalize the Stastny brothers merely because they are hockey players. Their occupation is high profile and well publicized. The way in which they have been scoring goals for the Quebec Nordiques would seem to indicate that there are very few Canadians who are able to score goals as well as they—

Senator Flynn: Quit while you're ahead.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Next question?

Senator Perrault: I see Senator Marshall's point, but, clearly, from the reply provided by the minister, this was a case where the Stastnys were granted political refugee status and, obviously, there would be some difficulty should they return to Czechoslovakia. In this case it has nothing to do with their occupational talents, which they seem to possess in abundance.

JUSTICE

CONFIDENTIALITY OF MEDICAL RECORDS—JUDGMENT OF SUPREME COURT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to Honourable Senator Haidasz' question of October 21, 1981, concerning the government's reaction to the Supreme Court decision regarding the confidentiality of medical records.

The Solicitor General referred the matter to the Supreme Court of Canada when the decision of the Court of Appeal was received because he felt it was necessary for the RCMP, and all other police forces in Canada as well, to have a privilege in their relationship with informers. The Supreme Court of Canada has upheld that privilege. The government is pleased that the Supreme Court confirmed its belief that such activities are lawful.

THE ENVIRONMENT

ACID RAIN POLLUTION—EMISSIONS OF SULPHUR OXIDES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the reply to Senator Sherwood's question concerning Canadian action in reducing acid rain is rather lengthy. I would be pleased to incorporate the reply in the record of today's proceedings.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

The U.S. emissions of sulphur dioxide are about 29.7 million tons while Canada's are about 5.3 million tons. The U.S. emissions of nitrogen oxides are about 22.3 million tons while Canada's are about 2.2. The differences in the ratios of emissions results from the difference in our industrial bases. In the U.S. approximately 62 per cent of their electricity is generated from coal and oil while in Canada these fuels provide only about 25 per cent of our electricity. The non-ferrous smelting industry is responsible for about 50 per cent of Canada's sulphur dioxide emissions. In the U.S. this sector contributes only 7 per cent.

Since 1970 Canadian emissions of sulphur dioxide have been reduced by about 25 per cent. The recent regulations promulgated by Ontario for the Inco facility at Sudbury and Ontario Hydro and the intention of Quebec to require a 40 per cent reduction in sulphur dioxide emissions from the Noranda smelter will reduce eastern Canadian emissions about 25 per cent below current levels.

My colleague, the Minister of the Environment, indicated on Friday that it is our goal to reduce eastern Canadian emissions of sulphur dioxide by about 50 per cent over the next decade. A reduction of this magnitude coupled with a similar proportionate reduction in emissions in the eastern U.S. would move us a long ways toward resolving the serious problem of acid precipitation which both countries face.

My colleague, the Minister of the Environment, has said that we support many of the recommendations in the report. A number of the recommendations related to control strategies and scientific studies are already underway. Many of the other recommendations are already being addressed by the Department of the Environment and by other agencies involved in the acid precipitation issue. Some of the more complicated ones require further assessment. Still others may, at an appropriate time, need to be brought before Parliament for new amending legislation.

The findings of the subcommittee are most welcome and they are to be commended for their work. They have provided some constructive recommendations that should provide guidance for the days ahead.

EDUCATION

FEDERAL GRANTS TO POST-SECONDARY INSTITUTIONS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have here the reply to questions asked by Senator Macquarrie and Senator Murray on October 22, 1981, concerning federal grants to post-secondary institutions.

I directed the questions to the office of the minister and received this rather lengthy reply in quick order.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Is it as long as the replies you gave the other day?

Senator Perrault: I hope it will be shorter.

Regarding established programs financing (EPF), the post-secondary education financing program is one of the three established programs financed under Part VI of the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Established Programs Financing Act, 1977. Under this act, the federal government makes contributions to provincial and territorial governments for the financing of medicare, hospital insurance and post-secondary education. These contributions take the form of tax transfers and cash payments.

In 1981-82, the government's estimates show that $1.8 billion in cash was transferred to the provinces for post-secondary education, and I am sure that honourable senators will agree that it is a rather generous and necessary program. The 1977 agreement also provides for the transfer of tax points, which have increased the amount available to the provinces for post-secondary education by several billion dollars. These tax transfers and cash grants constitute an extremely large program.

Established programs financing transfers related to post-secondary education are unconditional and escalate automatically from year to year according to a formula linked to GNP. They are not tied to provincial spending. That is, there is no direct link between changes in the size of EPF payments and provincial spending on post-secondary education institutions or on provincial decisions with respect to tuition fees. In fact, provinces have not—and this is worth placing on the record, honourable senators, since this is the issue—been passing all the increasing EPF payments on to the colleges and the universities. As a consequence, EPF represents an ever-growing percentage of post-secondary operating costs. The federal contribution via EPF and the students' contribution via tuition fees together make up much the largest portion of post-secondary financing in Canada.

● (2035)

In addition to EPF, the federal government supports the post-secondary system through adult occupational training, through official languages in education programs, through research support, student loans and many other programs.

The federal government places high priority on a strong post-secondary system and on the development of the trained human resources needed by the economy. The government is, therefore, concerned that federal funds allocated for post-secondary education in fact reach the colleges and universities and that they benefit students and contribute directly to the achievement of the national objectives. The then Secretary of State outlined these national objectives and the need for new policy directions in a presentation to the parliamentary task force on the fiscal arrangements. This presentation also explained the need for a strong federal presence in post-secondary education.

The government is sympathetic with the conclusion in the NUS letter of September 18, 1981 circulated to members of Parliament that:

Before any new funds are channelled into the system, . . . there must be a clearly articulated and realistic role for post-secondary education and an understanding of how this role relates to the other goals of our society.

The government is also sympathetic with the students' conclusion that "any new formula designed to fund education should tie the money to the area for which they are intended."

A review and restructuring of federal support of post-secondary education is a high priority for the Secretary of State. Over the next several months he intends to consult with his provincial counterparts and with interested groups to hear their views on the appropriate directions for federal policy.

Regarding student aid, the NUS letter refers to their submission to the Federal-Provincial Task Force on Student Assistance which pointed out inadequacies in the means test used in the federal Canada Student Loan Program and the associated provincial loan and grant programs and which recommended that all assistance be in the form of non-repayable bursaries rather than the present mix of loans and bursaries. The NUS letter is not entirely accurate in suggesting that the task force rejected their views. The task force presented five alternative programs for further discussion, one of which was the all-bursary program proposed by the NUS. As well, the task force recommended that, regardless of which alternative is chosen, the means test and existing aid ceilings be modified to remove the problems pointed out by the NUS and other groups who made presentations to the task force.

While the task force did not reject the NUS position, it did find that the main problems with existing aid programs were related to the methods used to determine need and to the ceilings placed on aid, rather than on the existence of loans per se. It also reported the results of a survey conducted for the task force by Statistics Canada, which found widespread public support, even among students, for a mix of loans and grants.

The government is also aware of the recommendations of the task force and the NUS regarding the changes needed in student assistance programs. A decision has not been taken with respect to the best methods of delivering aid and on the appropriate balance between loans and bursaries. The Secretary of State will soon be meeting with his provincial counterparts to review the task force's findings and to decide on appropriate action.

Regarding established programs financing arrangements cutbacks, the following paragraph may be of particular interest to honourable senators.

The October 1980 budget indicated the intention to achieve net savings in the social affairs envelope beginning in 1982-83, and that these were expected to include reductions in transfers to provinces in areas under their control. It was widely inferred that this meant reductions in EPF. The other large social transfers are made under the Canadian Assistance Plan.

On February 28, 1981, the Honourable Minister of Finance stated in the other place that the net savings expected were $1.5 billion over the two years 1982-83 and 1983-84. This amount was confirmed in response to questions when he appeared before the Parliamentary Task Force on Fiscal Arrangements.

The $1.5 billion continuous savings are built into the fiscal framework adopted in the last budget. It has been made clear to provinces that we remain committed to this objective.

Specific proposals will be made to the provinces in the near future. The Minister of Finance already indicated to provincial Ministers of Finance that he would like to hold a meeting on the fiscal arrangements shortly after the budget.

It is important to note, honourable senators, that there will be savings in the growth of expenditures rather than cuts in existing levels.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I understand that there will be a further delayed instalment, and I certainly look forward to perusing that. I have the feeling that the government is trying to attain exculpation by excessive verbiage, and I am convinced, further, that this whole matter requires deeper and sustained scrutiny by this particular chamber.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, further information will be provided for honourable senators when it has been made available. I would say, however, that I took a personal interest in determining the degree of support for higher education in Prince Edward Island, and I hope to have that information very shortly. Preliminary reports indicate that the federal government has been a model of generosity.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question which I would direct to the Leader of the Government when his amusement has run its course.

• (2040)

I thought I heard him say something to the effect that it was clear that money furnished to the provinces by the federal government for the purposes of post-secondary education was not in fact used by the provinces for post-secondary education. I wish to ask him, if he makes that assertion, and, if so, upon what grounds.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, this is the response provided by the Minister of Finance.

Senator Smith: That does not answer—

Senator Perrault: Well, honourable senators, I said this evening that I was not in a position to provide a complete reply to the question. I committed myself to providing further information, and I intend to do so. I read what I was sent, and it states:

In fact, provinces have not been passing all—
And I repeat “all”.

—the increasing EPF payments on to the colleges and the universities. As a consequence, EPF represents an ever-growing percentage of post-secondary operating costs.

[Senator Perrault.]

The allegation was not made that all the funds were being withheld by the provinces, but that some of them were being withheld by the provinces.

Senator Smith: I thank the honourable gentleman for his answer. However, I wish to say that if he had paid any attention to the question I had asked—which is doubtful, I suppose—he would not have had any reason to believe that the question concerned all such funds. I am more intrigued than ever as to why he—not knowing anything about it, as he has just told us—should say, as he did during his lengthy answer, that it was worth repeating. He was not content with just reading it, but felt it desirable to read it again. Now I find that he does not know anything about it, so I suppose I can pay as much attention to this as I do to most of his fulminations.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: I have a supplementary question. Are the figures that the Leader of the Government has given us overall figures for all provinces, or is there a breakdown, in terms of provinces, relating to the so-called discrepancies between the growth of the expenses of the provinces for post-secondary education and the growth of the federal transfers for post-secondary education?

Senator Perrault: The question will be taken as notice.

TRANSPORT

VIA RAIL—USE OF COAST GUARD HELICOPTER TO REMOVE DUST FROM TRACKS

Hon. Daniel Riley: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if it is true that the Minister of Transport has decided to remove the Canadian Coast Guard helicopter from Saint John for the purpose of blowing the dust off VIA Rail tracks from Halifax to Montreal via Saint John.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The Minister of Transport is a very innovative minister.

Hon. G. I. Smith: “Destructive” is a better word, I think.

Senator Riley: Do I get an answer to the question?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): He has done his best.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

NEWFOUNDLAND—1981 EVENTS AND ATTRACTIONS DEVELOPMENT FUND—APPLICATIONS

Question No. 54 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

With regard to the applications received from the Province of Newfoundland under the 1981 Events and Attractions Development Fund, (i) how many were received (ii) how many were approved and how many were turned down (iii) who were the applicants and what locations did they come from?

VIA RAIL CANADA INC.MOTION TO INSTRUCT TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS COMMITTEE TO MAKE STUDY—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, October 22, the debate on the motion of Senator Riley:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications be instructed to inquire into and report upon the national rail passenger service provided to Canadians by VIA Rail Canada Inc. and, in particular to examine

(a) the Federal Government's plans for reorganizing Canada's passenger train services announced by Transport Minister Jean-Luc Pepin on July 27, 1981;

(b) the changes in passenger train services effected by Order in Council P.C. 1981-2171, dated August 6, 1981, made pursuant to subsection 64(1) of the National Transportation Act; and

(c) the procedure followed by way of Order in Council P.C. 1981-2171 in varying the Canadian Transport Commission's Orders and Decisions respecting Canada's passenger train services.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with one reservation—a technical one, I might say—I propose to support the motion of Senator Riley, not necessarily for all the same reasons but probably for the same basic reasons. Perhaps I should deal first with the reservation that I have.

Honourable senators will remember that the motion reads:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications be instructed to inquire into and report upon the national rail passenger service provided to Canadians by VIA Rail Canada Inc. and, in particular, to examine

(a) the Federal Government's plans for reorganizing Canada's passenger train services announced by Transport Minister Jean-Luc Pepin on July 27, 1981;

(b) the changes in passenger train services effected by Order in Council P.C. 1981-2171, dated August 6, 1981, made pursuant to subsection 64(1) of the National Transportation Act; and

(c) the procedure followed by way of Order in Council P.C. 1981-2171 in varying the Canadian Transport Commission's Orders and Decisions respecting Canada's passenger train services.

I understand that another committee the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, will be looking at that third subject. I hope that the chairmen of both committees will get together so there will be no duplication.

On the main burden of the motion, I say this obviously is an appropriate matter to be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications so that the various allegations, statistics and points of view can be aired or studied in the terms of the motion by way of an inquiry and a report. I know that under the impeccable objective and non-partisan chairmanship of Senator Smith—and I say that, incidentally, without any sarcasm but with sincerity—that that committee will look into the various allegations, charges, opinions, facts and statistics that the Senate has heard all about in the debate so far, and that the country has been hearing about for some weeks now. I say that because I remember that Marx—and I am speaking of Groucho, not Karl—when someone stated with great conviction an opinion, backed up heavily by statistics, would say, "Unfortunately, the opposite is also true." If we look at the debate that has taken place just in the Senate, let alone the debate in the country, we find that Senator Riley intervened with a number of opinions, views, statistics and facts, followed by Senator Charbonneau, who did the same thing in support of what Senator Riley essentially had said. We then find that Senator van Roggen's opinion was that the opposite was also true, and that Senator McElman supported Senator Riley.

I know that neither Senator Riley, nor Senator Charbonneau, nor Senator McElman, nor Senator van Roggen have any interest in this matter's going forward to the committee except to inquire objectively, as is the Senate's custom, into these various conflicting facts and allegations. Therefore, I do not propose to review everything Senator Riley has said, or what Senator Charbonneau has said. Senator McElman said that he supported Senator Riley. I also do not want to repeat what Senator van Roggen said.

What I do want to do this evening is define the issues, as we say in court proceedings, and focus attention on a few points raised by Senator Riley and some of the points raised by Senator Charbonneau. I shall try not to repeat what Senator van Roggen has already said. I then want to make one comment on a matter that has been the focus of attention in public debate, but not, as far as I am able to find, something covered during the debate in this house.

● (2050)

For example, one question I found in Senator Riley's intervention that was not dealt with by Senator van Roggen—and I hope the committee will deal with it—concerned increased revenues. I asked about increased costs, and was informed that transcontinental trains are inherently more costly because of the full dining and sleeping facilities provided, and that results in less revenue space per train. The information I found was that the transcontinental system alone accounts for one half of VIA Rail's operating loss—$115 million on the Montreal-Vancouver run, and $45 million on the Halifax-Montreal run.

It appears that once the decision is made to reduce the system to a single coast-to-coast transcontinental service, the question then has to be which service to eliminate. The decision was made, and I am sure the explanation will be given. The committee will weigh it, and consider whether or not it is impressed by it. I understand that the decision was that in the east both services have similar financial characteristics, but the "Atlantic" runs largely through United States territory and was, therefore, dropped. In the west the "Canadian", with its southern route, lends itself more to tourism, but the "Super-continental", with its northern route, fulfils an inter-city function and, therefore, the decision was made to convert it into an inter-city train over much of its route. I am sure details of that decision and reasons for it will be given, and the committee will weigh them as well.

I was somewhat stunned by Senator Riley's mention of an occupancy rate of 75 per cent. Therefore, I asked for an answer to that. I was told that the actual occupancy rate on the eastern transcontinental is 53.4 per cent, and that it may climb to 75 per cent or more for short distances. But the feeling of the department is—and I am sure they will tell the committee this too—that the service cannot be justified on that basis.

In moving to the second part of my argument, I wish to mention a few points raised by Senator Charbonneau. He gave cost recovery figures which are to be found at page 2873 of Debates of the Senate. I enquired as to those figures because they too surprised me, and, if correct, would certainly throw some doubt on the allegations being made as to rail cost recovery. I was told that those figures are three to four years out of date. In due course, the committee will find out if that is correct or not.

The level of cost recovery for air in 1980 was 54 per cent; in highway transportation in 1979—this is the latest figure I could get—that level was 55 per cent. From the research material I have available, I believe that figure is debatable, and I am not sure whether it is debatably high or debatably low. However, that is the only figure I could get on highway transportation. I found through research that Senator Charbonneau's figure of 82 per cent on rail could only be correct if it includes freight which, of course, overwhelmingly dominates rail revenue. Rail passenger service alone, on the figures I checked, recovers only 30 per cent of its costs. I could not find anyone who had claimed that the Havelock-Toronto service makes money, although there has been a dispute on the amount that it loses. That is mentioned at page 2872 of Debates of the Senate.

The third point which I found had not been dealt with was raised by Senator Charbonneau at page 2873, and it refers to cuts being made so that money can be spent in central Canada. I was told that the cuts are being made largely to free money for the purchase of additional LRC trains to be used in eastern and western Canada within two years. Those issues, I am sure, will also be considered by the committee.

The third item I hope the committee will focus on is the high cost of rail travel, and the heavy subsidy that is necessary. I do not recall hearing its being discussed in this chamber, but I have seen it discussed in the press and believe it is a rather important item because many of the critics of the proposal to cut rail service in the hope of saving money for better purposes, including better railway transportation purposes, admit the figures insofar as inefficiency is concerned. Those same critics say that it is all very well to talk about the high cost of rail service and the consequent need for a heavy subsidy, but the reason for that is because CN and CP grossly overcharge VIA Rail for the services that they perform.

The formula that is used is a complex one but its principle is, I think, an established one. My father was a railroader. I worked on the railroad during the summers for, I guess, seven or eight years. So I may say, in parenthesis, that I know from my own personal experience and from family life that both in the army and on the railroad everyone seems to know how to do it better than those that are doing it. Sometimes they are right, but I just cannot believe they always are. I cannot believe that those of us that are not in the business know that much more than those who are in the business, but that does not change the fact that anyone can fail to see the forest for the trees. That is the kind of thing I assume the committee will look into.

I do not know about the formula in Europe, but the principle and concept of charging for service in North America, be it provision of track or locomotive power to pull freight cars or passenger cars, is as old as railroading itself. Everyday railroads all across North America are charging each other for hauling freight cars and, in some cases, passenger cars. It is not as if what has happened is that CN and CP have suddenly invented some terribly punishing formula in order to make rail passenger transportation more expensive for VIA Rail than it would otherwise be. The formula is a complex one and I am not going to go into it in any more detail than I have, but I do want to say that I found through research that the costing order has been acknowledged by independent consultants—I hope the committee will call these people as witnesses—to be an adequate and, in principle, an appropriate costing mechanism. If there is still doubt about it, honourable senators, I know the committee will remember that a joint CTC-Transport Canada task force is working on further improvements. In the meantime, the CTC has strengthened its audit capability which, until now, has resulted in long auditing delays. Also, there is the question of disclosure of costing information by the railways to VIA Rail, which is increasing but it is an area that can be improved. I think everyone agrees with that.

On further checking I found that the appropriateness of the methodology with regard to charging of costs to VIA Rail by CN and CP has been substantiated on a number of occasions, most recently during a three-year study completed by the CTC at the request of the then Minister of Transport. I respectfully request that the committee consider that report in order to avoid any duplication, and that they look at it as critically as they will, of course, all evidence that is brought before them.

● (2100)

I have discovered that VIA Rail pays approximately 64 per cent of its total expenditure to the railways. We have to remember, however, that VIA Rail rents daily from the railways a large number of locomotives, and its costs include crew wages and fuel. VIA Rail also pays for its share of track maintenance and station costs, which, as I recall, was a formula that was applied on certain pool services. I worked for CN and I know that CP used some of the CN tracks, and I assume that CN, in the course of its service, used certain of the CP rights of way. The railways also perform all repairs and maintenance on VIA Rail's fleet. So the committee will have to determine what was included in the study by the Canadian Transport Commission and whether or not that figure of 64 per cent is reasonable.

I also found reference to what is called the thirteenth bill. I had not heard it referred to as such here. I discovered that it relates to an annual adjustment invoice, and that it has been the subject of a great deal of criticism concerning the railways. There the procedure is provided for under regulation 6313, and during the past two years the so-called thirteenth bill—namely the year-end adjustment—has represented less than 5 per cent of the total payment to the railways.

I am told, in connection with the costing system, that the CTC has made considerable progress in improving its audit capability and the effectiveness of the costing order and its application to railway passenger services. The costing order recognizes only those costs which are variable with traffic movement over the long term. It does not recognize fixed costs, nor does it provide an allowance for profit. Its suitability to railway passenger service has been demonstrated over approximately 15 years. It was originally intended as a basis for a government subsidy payment of 80 per cent of losses, but it is now used as a basis of payment of 100 per cent of losses as called for under the present railway passenger program.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Operating losses?

Senator Frith: So far as I know, it is operating losses.

Senator Roblin: If you can define "losses".

Senator Frith: I believe it does mean operating losses. That is exactly the sort of thing that I hope the committee will inquire into. I believe that all Canadians would be well served by a committee which, as objectively as possible, will look into these questions and define such matters as losses, percentage of costs, relationship to fixed assets versus operating costs, and so on. I assume that the CTC study covered some of those points, but in my view the matter should be subjected to critical evaluation, review and even update.

I am informed that the railways say that if payment were based on the costing order using replacement value accounting, with an allowance for fixed costs and profit, payment to the railways would be almost double the present level. I did not research that. That is a claim made by the railways. They can make that claim before the committee, and the committee can decide whether or not it is substantiated.

Honourable senators, I support, from information I have received, the position taken by the Minister of Transport. I am sure that many Canadians share a genuine curiosity to have all the conflicting opinions, allegations, charges, statistics, facts and formulas studied by what is recognized as being one of the most useful of Canadian institutions—namely, a standing or special committee of the Senate. We could not have chosen a more distinguished, highly reputable and well staffed committee than that under the chairmanship of Senator Smith. Therefore, I support the motion because I believe that the matter should be referred to committee.

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: May I direct a question to the honourable senator? In the light of his recommendation, is he of the opinion that the minister might stand the order until the Senate brings down its report? The order in council is due to take effect on November 15, and it will certainly take the committee more than two weeks to examine the points raised by the honourable senator. I commend the honourable senator for his remarks and agree that the subject should be referred to committee. Does he feel that the Honourable Mr. Pepin would be prepared to postpone implementation of the order in council until the Senate has made its report?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I am sure the minister would be prepared to appear before the committee to explain his position, but in my opinion, he will not wait for the committee's report.

Hon. Daniel Riley: Honourable senators, I was advised today by other maritime members of the Liberal Party that the Minister of Transport wished to meet with me and several Liberal members of the other place to discuss this problem. I am wondering if the minister wishes us to drop our study of this subject; or is it that, no matter what the committee decides, he will implement the arbitrary, cavalier discontinuance of rail services on November 15?

I will go further and ask, does it mean that the minister will laugh us off, as he did those persons who appeared before him yesterday and today? Does it mean that he is going to tell the people of Canada, and Parliament, that he has made his decision and that he will not engage in any dialogue?

When the Prime Minister first took office he seemed to encourage dialogue. He said that he wanted dialogue and that he wanted decisions to be made based on the results of dialogue. It seems to me that the present situation is simply a brush-off. The Deputy Leader of the Government spoke about the transcontinental passing through the State of Maine. I would remind him that the "Atlantic" travels through the State of Maine, from Vanceboro to Megantic in Quebec. It is a short trip. I do not wish to see the "Ocean Limited," which was referred to by Senator van Roggen, discontinued, but I believe the Halifax to Montreal route, via Moncton and Saint John through Maine, is shorter. For years we in New Brunswick have been screaming for a highway route through Maine to get us into central Canada.

Hon. George van Roggen: Is the honourable senator asking a question or closing the debate?

Senator Riley: I have heard the honourable senator make long speeches instead of asking a question, and I believe I am entitled to the same privilege. If I were to tear apart the speech you made the other night—and I would do it tonight, but I do not want to prolong this debate—I would point out that you got all your information, every bit of it, from the experts, the bureaucrats, in the Department of Transport. What you told us, however, I can refute in the committee.

● (2110)

I can tell you about the CN. My father was not a railroader, nor were my uncles presidents of railroads in Santa Fe and elsewhere in the United States. Also, I never smelled the smoke of a locomotive, as Senator Frith's father did, and as he did himself as a young man. I am, however, telling you this—and I am not going to go on very much longer—that the bureaucrats in the Department of Transport have juggled the accounting of VIA Rail, CN and CP. They will not say what they are charging VIA Rail for the use of their tracks. They will not give any accounting whatever. They just send bills every month.

[Senator Charbonneau.]

Senator van Roggen, I will tell you this, that your experts, your bureaucrats in the Department of Transport, did not tell you, or give you any details of, how they make these charges month by month, and then at the end of the year put an extra charge on the VIA Rail usage of their tracks. What they are doing is to use the tracks, hitting the roadbed hard with their freight trains, and putting the passenger trains into what we call holes, delaying them all over the lines. Your bureaucrats did not tell you this either, Senator van Roggen, that they are charging the same amount for the use of lighter passenger trains as they are charging—

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I think we should have an understanding. I certainly have forgotten the question I was asked, but I think that Senator Riley is entitled to do two things, but that he had better do one first, and then the other.

Senator Riley: Well, all right—

Senator Frith: I am on my feet. Do I have the floor, Madam Speaker?

Senator Riley: No, you don't.

Senator Frith: I think the Speaker decides that.

Senator Riley: The Speaker cannot decide that. I am speaking.

Senator Frith: On a point of order, Madam Speaker—

Senator Riley: I am ending the debate on this motion.

Senator Frith: Oh. That is what I wanted to find out. If Senator Riley is closing the debate, according to the rules, before he does so we should ask if any other senator wishes to speak, and warn senators to that effect, and then of course he can close the debate quite properly. I take it, however, that I do not need to think about the question that I was asked.

Senator Riley: Well, the Speaker did not ask if I was going to close the debate.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: It is understood that Senator Riley is closing the debate.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, in that case I would like to ask a question. I did not know that the senator was closing the debate.

Honourable senators, I would like to ask my leader, or the Deputy Leader of the Government, whether or not they are aware of the writ that was supposedly presented by some of the western provinces with regard to the order in council, and whether they can tell me if this was in order or not. I am not going to go into details, but I feel the leader should know what I am talking about. Apparently, this has taken place just today, and I understand that there are other provinces having similar thoughts.

Could you enlighten me on this particular subject? If it is so, would that delay what Mr. Pepin is trying to do at the moment?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I saw the same stories about the possibility of a writ. I also heard the Minister of Transport say that, of course, if the court granted an injunction he would naturally have to comply with its terms.

As far as the procedure is concerned, if it is the normal procedure leading to an injunction, the steps would be: the issuance of a writ claiming an injunction; an application to the court for an interim injunction, sometimes for a certain period; and then a later application to continue the injunction until trial. So there will be several steps. It may be that the court will accept the application and issue an interim injunction, or it may be that it will not. Certainly, however, according to the Minister of Transport—and I am sure that everyone would agree—if the court does grant an interim injunction it will be obeyed by the government.

Hon. Martial Asselin: When will the case be heard?

Senator Frith: Usually you issue your writ—

Senator Asselin: I know that. But when?

Senator Frith: Well, I am not the lawyer involved. All I can tell you is that normally, when you issue your writ—

Senator Asselin: I know that. What I am asking is, has the case been introduced yet?

Senator Frith: I do not know. All I know is what I have read in the papers. Normally, that first application for an interim injunction would be heard on affidavit evidence before the actual trial. It would also be subject to appeal, of course.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate because there is a short statement I would like to make tomorrow, in view of the fact that this discontinuance of service seriously affects the city in which I live.

Senator Riley: Madam Speaker, I think you have already ruled that I am closing the debate.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: As Senator Riley asked a question, I was under the impression that he just wanted an answer. Otherwise I would have warned honourable senators that Senator Riley was closing the debate.

Senator Riley: Madam Speaker, I asked you if I was closing the debate, and you said yes. You made your ruling.

Some Hon. Senators: No! No!

Senator Riley: I am sorry. The record will show that I was closing the debate.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Surely you can extend a courtesy to another senator?

Senator Riley: Well now, it may be a courtesy to other senators, but I feel that if we continue the debate—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: The Honourable Senator Riley said that he was asking a question, but he made a speech. I did not know that he was trying to close the debate. Therefore, I think I should allow Senator Buckwold to adjourn the debate.

Senator Riley: Madam Speaker, that means the debate goes on for another day. You have already said that I was closing the debate.

Hon. Senators: No.

Senator Riley: Well, the record will show that.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: The honourable senator said he was closing the debate, but that was not understood by the majority of senators, so I will allow Senator Buckwold to move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Buckwold, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, October 28, 1981

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Report of the Superintendent of Insurance for Canada, Volume I, Abstracts of Statements of Insurance Companies in Canada, for the year ended December 31, 1980, pursuant to section 8 of the Department of Insurance Act, Chapter I-17, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the National Museums of Canada, including accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1981, pursuant to section 22 of the National Museums Act, Chapter N-12, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the Department of National Revenue containing Tables and Statements relative to Customs, Excise and Taxation for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1981, pursuant to section 5 of the Department of National Revenue Act, Chapter N-15, R.S.C., 1970.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN GALLERY

THE HONOURABLE CAMERON IRWIN MCINTOSH, LIEUTENANT GOVERNOR OF SASKATCHEWAN, AND MRS. MCINTOSH

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I draw your attention to the presence in the gallery of the Honourable Cameron Irwin McIntosh, Lieutenant Governor of Saskatchewan, and Mrs. McIntosh.

I may say that the McIntoshes are providing distinguished leadership in the office of Lieutenant Governor in Saskatchewan, and we are proud of the Queen's representative in that province.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

REPORT OF CONFERENCE BOARD OF CANADA

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we are pleased to have with us today the Minister of State for Economic Development.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: The Leader of the Government told us last night that the minister would be with us in no time at all, but unfortunately he did not appear.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I merely expressed the hope.

Senator Flynn: The hope, yes.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): The pious hope.

Senator Flynn: As a result the Question Period last night lasted only half an hour.

In any event, I must underline Senator Olson's return to our midst with a question about the Conference Board of Canada, which has just released its seasonally-adjusted index of consumer attitudes, showing that confidence in the Canadian economy has plunged to a new low. Would the minister care to comment on that? I am not asking for a speech, of course.

Senator Roblin: You will likely get one, though.

Senator Flynn: We will try him again.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, first, I should like to thank the Leader of the Opposition and his colleagues for expressing last night the sentiment that they missed me. It was one of the few times that I had missed the Question Period. However, if there was half an hour of good questions and good answers, it was, even in my absence, probably a very productive half hour.

The Conference Board's report indicates there is a low in consumer confidence in the economy, and I suppose that is one way of putting it. I really do not know the nature of the questions or the poll that was taken. I am not questioning it. They have been doing that in the past. However, it seemed to me that at one point the questions they were asking concerned whether Canadians intended to make major purchases in the near future.

An Hon. Senator: That's right.

Senator Olson: I expect anyone would think very seriously about making a major purchase, if a large part of it were to be on a loan basis or a time-payment basis, at a time when interest rates, as has been indicated, are substantially higher than they have been in the past. It seems pretty obvious to me that, if there is a hope in the minds of the Canadian people that interest rates may ease off—and they have eased off a little—the Canadian people would want to make those payments at a lower rate of interest.

Senator Flynn: Would the minister suggest that Canadians might change their attitude once Mr. MacEachen has delivered his budget speech on November 12?

Senator Olson: I think the budget speech on November 12, and its provisions, will give a great lift to Canadians.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jack Marshall: It might lift them right out of their skulls.

● (1410)

Senator Olson: However, I would remind the honourable gentleman opposite that both the members of this house and the members of the other place must live with the reality of the real world.

Senator Flynn: Except during election campaigns.

Senator Perrault: That is your philosophy.

Senator Flynn: Your way of dealing with the situation is to make Canadians believe that you will solve every problem, but once you win the election you do not show the same concern.

Senator Olson: Perhaps the honourable gentleman will find a great deal more expertise in his party than in our party with regard to that subject.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Eighteen cents?

Senator Olson: Usually one becomes an expert in a field where one has had a lot of practice.

Senator Flynn: Certainly, you have better results than we.

Senator Olson: I think enough time has passed that we can go back to the nine months' tenure of the last Conservative administration. There is certainly a lesson there which the honourable gentleman ought to take into account, and that is that the Canadian people passed judgment on the performance of that administration.

Senator Flynn: The only lesson to be learned from that is that, in politics, honesty is not always the best policy.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question arising out of the answer given by Senator Olson. Did I understand him to say that the "dire straits" budget which is anticipated would give Canadians a "lift" or a "blast"?

Senator Olson: I would remind my honourable friend that I have never described the coming budget as a "dire straits" one. That phrase was fabricated by the opposition, and they must take the responsibility for it.

Senator Flynn: The Prime Minister said that.

Senator Olson: He said that he would help people in dire straits.

YUKON TERRITORY

WATER BOARD—APPOINTMENT OF CHAIRMAN

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, may I pose a question to Senator Austin arising out of the response he gave last Thursday to my question regarding the Yukon Water Board? In his response the senator stated that the federal government has the legal prerogative to appoint a chairman from among the nine members of the board. However, if the senator will take another look at the original question, he will discover that at no time did I doubt the right of the federal government to make the appointment.

What is at issue here is that in the case of each appointment since the inception of the elected government in the Yukon, the federal government has adopted the recommendation of the Yukon government for the position of chairman of the Water Board. What I would like to know from the minister is why the federal government has now rejected the initial recommendation of the Yukon government, to the effect that the previous chairman be reappointed, and why it also rejected a supplementary recommendation of that government. At the same time, perhaps the honourable senator could enlighten us as to why the first nominee of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development resigned so soon after accepting the appointment?
